PREFACE TO THE SECOND EDITION

THIS VOLUME IS A REVISED AND EXPANDED EDITION OF THE FIRST COMPREHENSIVE reference work on the history of the American Left to be published. This edition is approximately one-quarter larger than the original, with more than seventy new articles. One entirely new area of coverage consists of entries on the pre-Civil War movements that had the greatest long-term effects on the formation of the post-Civil War Left. Other new articles deal with reformers and reform groups previously dealt with only in passing in the earlier edition. These include entries covering such topics as the Greenback Labor Party, Henry George, the Knights of Labor, and Robert La Follette. In addition, more contemporary figures, such as Tom Hayden and William Kunstler, have been given individual entries.

We have also both enriched and consolidated numerous subject areas already covered in the first edition. The majority of these changes affects the encyclopedia's coverage of the arts. New articles with extensive bibliographies have been commissioned covering writers of science fiction and fantasy, authors of popular fiction, and poets. New material has also been provided on film and television writers and directors. Treatment of ethnic groups has been expanded, with nearly a dozen new entries. All ongoing movements and trends have been updated, and bibliographies for most articles have been expanded to include recent scholarship. Some entries have undergone considerable revision and rewriting to take into account new scholarship.

Additional features have been added to make the encyclopedia more user-friendly. We have included a new directory of contributors showing updated information on all authors. We have significantly expanded the system of cross-referencing. Readers will find both more blind entries, directing the reader to inverted forms or alternative spellings of entry terms, as well as more end-of-article cross-references, suggesting that the reader consult other articles in the encyclopedia for further related information on the topic at hand. Although we included more than thirty individual entries on African Americans and Jewish Americans in the previous edition, we did not incorporate a formal essay on either group. This edition contains overview articles on both groups that serve as guides to more specific entries on these groups.

Although we have incorporated many enrichments and additions into this new edition, we have retained our emphasis on the radical rather than reformist sector of the American Left. This decision is not meant to imply that the broad American constituency for social change consists only of radicals, or that this broad constituency is in any way less important than the more radical elements of the American Left. Our purpose in limiting our coverage is practical rather than ideological: we simply wish to give maximum attention to a vital segment of our political tradition that is routinely ignored or devalued. For this purpose, we have defined reformers as those who believe serious political, social, and economic change can be accommodated into the existing capitalist system and that attaining a viable egalitarian society is primarily a national rather than an international imperative.

For assistance in a variety of ways, such as supplying graphics, suggesting contributors, responding to urgent requests for an entry, criticizing or rewriting drafts, acting as computer consultant, advising with promotions, and contributing entries that did not reach publication, we thank David Montgomery, Linda Gordon, Allen Hunter, Eric Perkins, Elliot Shore, Philip Altbach, Jay Kinney, Immanuel Wallerstein, Ethelbert Miller, Roger Horowitz, Enzo Traverso, Marvin Gettleman, Richard Ellington, Sue Benson, Rebecca Zurier, Dorothy Healey, Morris U. Schappes, Paul Le Blanc, Kate Monteiro, George Scialabba, Gil Green, Mary Boger, Scott Molloy, Chuck Schwartz, Saul Wellman, Max Gordon, Herman Benson, Jack N. Porter, David Roediger, Robert G. Lee, Steve Brier, Michael Smith, Staphanie Ogle, Norma Fain Pratt, Michael Honey, and H. L. Mitchell. For technical assistance, we thank the staff of the Main Branch of the Brooklyn Public Library, and for their help on illustrations, we thank the Charles H. Kerr Publishing Company. Special thanks are due to Kennie Lyman for her guidance on the first edition and to Mark Herlihy for indexing the present edition. We are also grateful to the staff of the Scholarly and Professional Reference Division at Oxford University Press for guidance and support during the preparation of this second edition.

PREFACE TO THE FIRST EDITION

THIS VOLUME IS THE FIRST COMPREHENSIVE REFERENCE WORK ON THE HISTORY OF THE American Left. Defined as that segment of society that has sought fundamental changes in the economic, political, and cultural systems, the subject does not include reformers who believe that change can be accommodated to existing capitalist structures, or who believe that an egalitarian society can be attained ultimately within national borders. By placing a strong emphasis upon radicals—archists, socialists, and communists—the Encyclopedia of the American Left has been able to delve into many topics that are otherwise little known or that are frequently discussed without relation to their actual Left context.

Histories of the United States have, until the 1960s and 1970s, generally treated radical movements and radicals unfavorably (save perhaps as eccentric personalities). By contrasting the Left with more acceptable reform movements and reformers, standard treatments suggested an unpleasant fanaticism, or at least a lack of basic patriotism toward American institutions. Aside from a handful of valuable memoirs and a scattering of monographs, few serious accounts of radicals themselves could be found. Not surprisingly, serious gaps existed in basic reference materials relating to Left topics.

Our project would, therefore, have been impossible only a generation ago. Two contemporary intellectual developments changed the picture. Many activists with peak years of involvement before World War II turned to writing memoirs, often donating their personal papers to existing archives. The waning of McCarthyism and its threats of political intimidation encouraged individuals and organizational leaders to be more specific and candid about past events. Concurrently, many scholars who had come of age within the 1960s political movements embarked upon academic careers or began working as filmmakers, curators, archivists, or librarians. Many of these younger scholars selected radical movements of the past, including the controversial and many-sided history of the Communist Party, as their scholarly specialities.

The newer scholars merged, for the first time, techniques such as oral history with the fresh insights available from feminist, ethnic, and racial studies and popular culture analyses. Combined in turn with traditional scholarly approaches, these efforts produced a substantial recovery of a hitherto lost history, in definitive biographies, monographs, and popular works of various kinds. The present volume draws heavily upon this current. But it also grows out of the neglected traditions of memoirs and in-house histories of American Left personalities and institutions, written in many languages from the late nineteenth century onward. The volume builds upon and from all the layers of the Left's collective autobiography.

Each entry has been written specifically for this encyclopedia, and most entries are based upon primary sources. References have been designed less for definitive documentation—often inaccessible to most readers in archival obscurity, in oral history accounts, or in non-English languages—than for general research on the subject. The terms following See also at the end of each entry lead to discussion of the topic in another context or to an allied subject.

Although we have included numerous biographies, our work is not a biographical dictionary. The overwhelming majority of important people have been discussed under other than personal headings, in the larger political context of their significance. Those with separate biographical entries have not been deemed "more important" but are treated most effectively in this way to discuss a particular historical event, institution, or movement. Such biographical entries do not dwell on personal details (such as family life) unless related directly to political behavior, a limitation dictated both by equity and by space.

Mass movements and organizations wider than the Left, but with substantial Left participation, have been discussed via their particular Left involvements. Unions, civil rights movements, women's issues, environmental currents, and artistic trends—excepting in each case those clearly established and led by the Left—fall under this heading. Similarly, movements and individuals attaining their greatest significance before 1870 have been dealt with only in passing, both because of space limitations and to delineate clearly the modern Left (as opposed to the predominantly religious communitarianism of earlier times).

Ethnic and racial groups have been dealt with most extensively here. Some, very small or only slightly involved in radical activities, have been covered in a single entry under their name. Others, central in a continuing way to radicalism, have been treated in so many places that a main entry has become redundant. In most cases, a main entry is supplemented by many separate references to institutions and individuals. Like the discussion of social and cultural movements, much ethnic or racial material has been drawn from personal interviews, archival collections, and non-English language sources.

We have taken special care with the difficult questions posed by often confusing Left terminology. Some frequently used terms and concepts are discussed in their own separate entries or in the glossary, which also contains brief identifications of frequently mentioned organizations, movements, and people. In the text of entries, we have used capitalization to make political distinctions. Thus Socialism refers to the Socialist Party of Eugene Debs and his successors; Communism refers to the modern Communist Party or its immediate forerunners. In lower case, socialism and communism refer to general principles rather than organizational names. Readers might find a Communist who supports socialist ends or a Christian socialist who supports communist principles. In instances where there is some ambiguity involved in whether or not to capitalize, we have not.

We have adopted Left practices in dealing with racial and sexual identifications. We have preferred the term African American to indicate an American of African heritage, but black, Afro-American, Negro, and person of color will also be found. The particular term used generally relates to the political era under discussion. The term gay is used with two meanings. The general movement for the rights of male and female homosexuals is often referred to as the gay rights movement and reflects what has been the terminology of the 1970s and most of the 1980s. In some contexts there is use of formulations such as gay and lesbian rights, in which case gay refers exclusively to male homosexuals.

Approximately one hundred graphics have been included in this volume, embodying the dominant styles of various Left eras and organizations and providing examples of work by many of the outstanding artists of the Left. For technical reasons, as well as cost, "fine art" and portrait photographs have been minimized in favor of the line drawing.

We have scrupulously avoided favoritism toward any sections of the Left, providing factual and respectful accounts of groups that have sometimes condemned each other as ferociously as they condemned capitalism. Our philosophical view is that, although the Left has had its share of fools and scoundrels, most of its adherents have been motivated by lofty ideals. To paraphrase Ralph Chaplin, one of the American Left's most popular poets, we have sought to give a faithful account of those who saw the world's great anguish and dared to act against the causes of the suffering.

ABORTION/REPRODUCTIVE RIGHTS. Socialist women—in Left groups as well as unaffiliated—played a role in the reproductive rights movement of the late 1960s and 1970s. They (1) supported the right of women to have abortion on demand, (2) opposed the use of “population control” arguments, countering instead a woman’s right to control her own body, and (3) explained how genuine control over one’s own reproductive life meant knowing one’s own body and having the right to be a sexual being (including being a lesbian), the right to decide when and if to have children, and the right to raise one’s children in dignity (with access to health care, housing, child care, etc.). It also meant opposition to sterilization abuse. Although there was scant factual evidence of sterilization abuse before the mid-1970s, the Left made the point that while middle-class women found it difficult to be sterilized, poor women—especially black, Chicano, Puerto Rican, and Native American women—were often sterilized without their knowledge or consent.

Socialist women were active in local abortion-rights coalitions, in the National Organization for Women (NOW), and in the Women’s National Abortion Action Coalition, a New York-based organization (1971–1973) that called nationally and internationally coordinated actions. Speakouts, where women testified about their own illegal abortions, picketing activities against public figures who opposed abortions, demonstrations, and class-action suits challenging the antiabortion laws were the principal methods of action.

The 1973 Supreme Court decision did not guarantee women’s access to abortion, but it did legalize abortions. With passage of the Hyde amendment in 1976, poor women were denied federal funding for most abortions. But hospitals and doctors had never fully implemented the Supreme Court decision. Access to abortion was greatest in urban areas.

Following the 1973 decision, socialist women—particularly through the Committee to End Sterilization Abuse in New York City—were instrumental in spotlighting sterilization abuse by publicizing specific cases of abuse and educating the feminist and labor movements about the need to pass federal regulations requiring “informed consent.” The thirty-day waiting period (between applying for sterilization and the operation) imposed by the federal government in 1977 as a result of such pressure inhibits doctors from sterilizing women without their knowledge.

The most successful right-wing attacks on abortion have been against the most vulnerable women: poor women, women facing racial oppression, teenage women. Socialist women organized with other women to oppose the passage of the Hyde amendment, first through local coalitions, then through the Reproductive Rights National Network (R2N2, 1979–1984). In fact, R2N2 was modeled on the New York-based Committee for Abortion Rights and Against Sterilization Abuse, which was created in 1976 out of the need to oppose the Hyde amendment. (Although it threw most of its energy into fighting for passage of the Equal Rights Amendment during this period, NOW also opposed the Hyde amendment.) But demonstrations, speakouts, and a broad-based legal challenge were ultimately unsuccessful in forcing the Supreme Court to rule the amendment unconstitutional.

Especially since 1989 and the Webster decision limiting abortion in certain ways, most activity for abortion rights has taken a distinctly defensive character. The appearance of Operation Rescue evoked a determined response as the nationally organized and heavily funded antiabortionists encountered local mobilizations to protect patients and health care workers. By the early 1990s, however, the growing number of assorted antichoice bills in state legislatures narrowed, intensified, and politicized abortion rights efforts.

Local and state coalitions energetically promoted political action committees created to elect pro-choice (usually Democratic) candidates, to defeat anti-choice ones (from both parties), and to block detrimental legislation (often concerning “parental consent"). A variety of publications kept tabs on political developments, pro- and anti-choice strategies, from a left-leaning perspective. The election of Bill Clinton in 1992 and, even more, his reelection in 1996, tended to demobilize activists and to dry up contributions. The issue of "late-term" abortions, seized upon by the political Right, made the task of defending women's choice yet more difficult, and a radical (rather than liberal) program daunting.

ABRAHAM LINCOLN BRIGADE. During the Spanish Civil War (1936–1939), twenty-eight hundred American volunteers took up arms to defend the Spanish Republic against a military rebellion led by General Franco and aided by Hitler and Mussolini. To the Abraham Lincoln Brigade, which fought from 1937 through 1938, the defense of the Republic represented the last hope of stopping the spread of international fascism.

The Lincolns fought alongside approximately thirty-five thousand antifascists from fifty-two countries who, like themselves, were organized under the aegis of the Comintern, and who also sought to "make Madrid the tomb of fascism." In keeping with Popular Front culture, the Americans named their units the Abraham Lincoln Battalion, the George Washington Battalion, and the John Brown Battery. Together with the British, Irish, Canadian, and other nationals they formed the Fifteenth International Brigade. ("Lincoln Brigade" is a misnomer originating with an American support organization, Friends of the Abraham Lincoln Brigade). One hundred twenty-five American men and women also served with the American Medical Bureau as nurses, doctors, technicians, and ambulance drivers.

The conviction that made volunteering for a war against fascism possible was born from the economic calamity and political turmoil of the 1930s. Like many during the Great Depression, the young volunteers had an experience of deprivation and injustice that led them to join the burgeoning student, unemployed, union, and cultural movements that were influenced by the Communist Party and other Left organizations. Involvement in these groups exposed them to a Marxist and internationalist perspective and, with their successes in galvanizing people to conscious political action, gave rise to a revolutionary élan.

American radicalism was spurred by the appearance of profascist groups like the Liberty League and the expansion of fascism abroad. With Japan's invasion of Manchuria in 1931, Hitler's ascendance in 1933, and Italy's assault on Ethiopia in 1934—all accomplished without hindrance from the governments of the West—the Communist Party responded with the coalition-building strategy of the Popular Front, attracting thousands of aroused citizens directly into its ranks or into "front" organizations. When four right-wing Spanish generals, with German and Italian support, attacked the legally elected government on 19 July 1936, a desire to confront fascism in Spain swept through the progressive communities in Europe and the Americas. Within weeks, militant German, French, and Italian antifascists were fighting in Madrid. By January 1937, despite a State Department prohibition against travel to Spain, Americans were crossing the Pyrenees.

The Lincolns came from all walks of life, all regions of the country, and included seamen, students, the unemployed, miners, fur workers, lumberjacks, teachers, salesmen, athletes, dancers, and artists. They established the first racially integrated military unit in U.S. history and were the first to be led by a black commander. At least sixty percent were members of the Young Communist League or the Communist Party. Wobblies, socialists, and the unaffiliated also joined. The Socialists formed their own Debs Column for Spain, but open recruitment brought on government suppression.

The reaction of Western governments to the war was ambivalent and duplicitous. They agreed to a non-intervention pact and the United States embargoed aid to the Spanish belligerents, policies intended to de-escalate the war but whose selective enforcement undermined the Republic. While Germany and Italy supplied Franco with troops, tanks, submarines, and a modernized air force (the first to bomb open cities, most notably Guernica), the nonintervention policy only prevented arms from reaching the Republic. General Motors, Texaco, and other American corporations further assisted Franco with trucks and fuel. The Soviet Union and Mexico were the only governments to sell armament to the Republic, although much of it was impounded at the French border. Throughout the war, a vociferous political and cultural movement in America rallied to the Republic by raising money for medical aid and demanding an end to the embargo. Such participants as Albert Einstein, Dorothy Parker, Gene Kelly, Paul Robeson, Helen Keller, A. Philip Randolph, and Gypsy Rose Lee reflected the wide base of support for the Republican cause.

Self-motivated and ideological, the Lincolns attempted to create an egalitarian "people's army"; officers were distinguished only by small bars on their berets and in some cases rank-and-file soldiers elected their own officers. Traditional military protocol was shunned, although not always successfully. A political commissar explained the politics of the war to the volunteers and tended to their needs and morale. The Lincoln Brigade helped ease the pressure on Madrid, giving the Republic time to train and organize its own popular army. The subject of respectful news reports by such writers as Ernest Hemingway, Herbert Matthews, Martha Gellhorn, and Lillian Hellman, the brigade helped strengthen antifascist opinion in the United States. Yet the Lincolns and the Republican military, fighting with inadequate weaponry, could not withstand the forces allied against them. By the end, the Lincolns had lost nearly 750 men and sustained a casualty rate higher than that suffered by Americans in World War II. Few of the members of the brigade escaped injury. In November 1938, as a last attempt to pressure Hitler and Mussolini into repatriating their troops, Spanish prime minister Juan Negrín ordered the withdrawal of the International Brigades. The Axis coalition refused to follow suit and Madrid fell in March 1939.

The Lincolns returned home as heroes of the antifascist cause but enjoyed no official recognition of their deed. Many Lincolns soon aroused bitterness within sectors of the Left when, with the signing of the Hitler-Stalin nonaggression pact in 1939, they supported the Communist Party's call for the United States to stay out of World War II. Once the United States and the Soviet Union entered the war, however, many of the veterans enlisted in the armed forces or served with the merchant marine. In a foreshadowing of the McCarthy period, the armed forces designated the Lincolns "premature antifascists" and confined them to their bases. Many successfully protested and were allowed to see action. Among the core agents of the Office of Strategic Services were Lincoln veterans whose contacts with the European partisans, forged in Spain, were key to agency missions.

In the 1950s most veterans, whether Communist or not, were harassed or forced out of their jobs by the Federal Bureau of Investigation. Communist Lincolns in particular were hit hard by the repressive Subversive Activities Control Board, the Smith Act, and state sedition laws, although over time all but a few convictions were overturned. In the 1950s and 1960s the majority of Lincoln veterans quit the Communist Party but continued to be active on the Left. Notwithstanding its exclusion from American textbooks, the Abraham Lincoln Brigade commands attention as a unique example of prescient, radical, and selfless action in the cause of international freedom.

ABT, JOHN J. (1904–1991). For most of his adult life, John J. Abt was chief counsel for several radical movements, the Amalgamated Clothing Workers of America, and the Communist Party, USA. He like to joke that, although he was born on May Day, his origins were anything but proletariat.

Abt was raised in an affluent German-Jewish household in Chicago's "Freud Hill" neighborhood. His grandparents were founders of Hart, Abt and Marx (which became Hart, Schaffner and Marx), the huge men's clothing manufacturer. An uncle, Isaac Abt, was the city's preeminent pediatrician. Abt's father became the chief negotiator for the clothing industry in its battle to prevent the emerging garment workers' union, under Sidney Hillman, from making inroads.

Educated at the University of Chicago—where he received his law degree at the age of twenty—Abt first turned to corporate law. He would later remark that his first three years of practice were devoted to floating bond issues that, after the Depression hit, he would have to foreclose.

When Franklin Roosevelt was elected president, Abt went to Washington to join the New Deal with his sister, Marion Bachrach. He was hired by Jerome Frank, for whose firm he had worked in Chicago, in the legal division of the Agricultural Adjustment Administration (AAA). A number of his AAA colleagues had joined the Communist Party, and they soon recruited Abt. Their membership was secret, owing to their employment by the U.S. government. Years later, during the Cold War, Representative Richard Nixon and the House Committee on Un-American Activities (HUAC) would accuse them of being the "Ware Group"—so named for Harold Ware, the Communist Party organizer for government employees—engaged in espionage; they all denied the accusation, and no charges were ever filed.

Abt was a friend of Ware and his wife, Jessica Smith, editor of Soviet Russia Today. Ware was killed in an automobile crash in 1936, and later Abt and Smith were married. After leaving the AAA, Abt also held posts in the Works Projects Administration and the Securities and Exchange Commission, and was an assistant attorney general in the Justice Department. In 1937 he became chief counsel to the Senate Civil Liberties Committee, under Senator Robert La Follette, Jr., investigating corporate espionage against—and denial of civil liberties to—the Congress of Industrial Organizations (CIO).

In 1938 Abt became chief counsel to Sidney Hillman, president of the Amalgamated Clothing Workers of America. For the next ten years, Abt was Hillman's main political operative within the CIO. He first conceived the notion of political action committees (PACs) and established CIO-PAC (for which he also served as chief counsel) to build organized labor's political influence. In later years, reflecting on the use of PACs by corporations, Abt regretted his creation. Abt also represented Hillman and the CIO in several international labor congresses.

Following Hillman's death in 1947, Abt left the Amalgamated to become chief counsel of the Independent Progressive Party, the vehicle for Henry Wallace's campaign for president. In 1950, Abt and former congressman Vito Marcantonio were hired by the Communist Party to defend it against the Subversive Activities Control Act, better known for its chief sponsor, Senator Pat McCarran of Nevada. Abt had been an informal legal adviser to the Communist Party during the Smith Act trials that imprisoned the main leadership of the party. The Smith Act made illegal "conspiracy to teach and advocate" the forceful overthrow of the government. The act was eventually declared unconstitutional by the U.S. Supreme Court for essentially outlawing free speech. One of the leading Smith Act defendants was Marion Bachrach, Abt's sister, the party's publicist who died of cancer following her second trial.

Abt and Marcantonio were joined by Joseph Forer of Washington, D.C., in mounting their legal challenge to the McCarran Act, which made it illegal to belong to the Communist Party or any of nearly two hundred organizations found by the government to be "Communist fronts." The act described the party as subversive, engaged in conspiracy, terrorism, sabotage, espionage, and other acts against the state, on behalf of a foreign power. Organizations and their individual members could be ordered to register with the government, in effect admitting guilt in such offenses and subjecting themselves to imprisonment and fines. Refusal to register, however, also was grounds for five years' imprisonment and a $10,000 fine for every day of nonregistration. Among other provisions of the act were those denying passports and outlawing holding office in a trade union or working in a government office or defense facility. Abt called the McCarran Act a "blueprint of American fascism."

When he, Marcantonio, and Forer signed on to represent the Communist Party in litigation, they did not foresee that it would take twenty-five years and eleven separate appearances before the U.S. Supreme Court to dismantle the McCarran Act and its various provisions. Abt regarded this achievement as his foremost accomplishment. But in the years between 1950 and his retirement in 1980, he also represented thousands of individual clients in court and before school boards, union bodies, state and federal agencies, HUAC, and the Supreme Court. In 1973 he represented Angela Davis in her effort to prevent extradition to California after her arrest in New York. He also provided advice and counsel to the defense team in that celebrated case.

Abt died of a stroke in Copiague, New York, on 8 August 1991. He had just completed recording his memoirs.

ADUNATA DEI REFRATTARI. The Italian-language anarchist journal L'Adunata dei Refrattari (The Gathering of the Incurables) began publication in New York City on 15 April 1922 and ceased fifty years later in April 1971. Its name—literally "The Call of the Refractory Ones"—was a defiant, if rather arcane, reference to words—refrattario (It.)/réfractaire (Fr.)—that had been used as a code by European governments before the turn of the century, during the heyday of "the propaganda of the deed," to identify anarchists in laws meant specifically to suppress their movement. The anarchism propagated by L'Adunata reflected the exceptional influence of Luigi Galleani, editor of the suppressed anarchist paper Cronaca Sovversiva (Barre, Vermont, and Lynn, Massachusetts, 1903–1919), who had been deported to Italy in 1919 by the U.S. government. L'Adunata's mixture of Kropotkinesque anarcho-communism, belief in direct action and revolution, and absolute antiorganizationalism continually involved it in many a passionate polemic within the Left and within the anarchist movement itself. It played a major role in anarchist activities not only in America but throughout the world, especially where concentrations of Italians were to be found. At its peak, during the antifascist struggle in the thirties, L'Adunata counted between twelve thousand and fifteen thousand militants as its supporters. It always represented the dominant trend within the Italian anarchist movement in America.

L'Adunata appeared in 1922, shortly after the Red Scare had run its course in the United States and when it was clear that social revolution in Italy, whose coming had seemed so imminent after the war, was not going to materialize. It was founded by anarchists who wanted to carry on the legacy of Cronaca Sovversiva. L'Adunata played a leading role in the abortive struggle to save Sacco and Vanzetti, fellow anarchists who had been caught up in the postwar web of repression and were facing death in Massachusetts. Members of its editorial group were always among the most influential members of the defense committee formed to support the pair, and both Sacco and Vanzetti always considered themselves an integral part of the journal, as they had been part of Cronaca Sovversiva. They accepted the militant ideals of L'Adunata wholeheartedly and wrote for it, particularly Vanzetti, most of whose political writings were smuggled out from prison article by article and appeared in L'Adunata under various noms de guerre—Il Picconiere, the man with the pickax, La Vedetta Solitaria, the solitary steersman. L'Adunata also made several preparations to break the men out of prison, but they never came to fruition. The seizure of power by the fascists in Italy (1922) and the cessation of mass immigration by newly enacted U.S. laws (1924) severely limited the growth of L'Adunata in America and in Italy, its two most natural fields of activity. Because of the determined hostility of both the American and Italian governments, a significant part of the movement also had to become clandestine. Further energy was dissipated in bitter ideological and personal disputes, but L'Adunata managed nonetheless to summon sufficient force to aid political prisoners, to rally fuorusciti (Italian antifascist refugees) throughout the world, and to fight fascism on the streets of Little Italies throughout America.

After the tragic close of the Sacco and Vanzetti case—they were executed on 22 August, 1927—in order to resolve internal personal and political differences the paper called back one of its most experienced and trusted comrades from Europe to assume the editorship. Raffaele Schiavina (1893–1987), who, as administrator of Cronaca Sovversiva, had been deported from the United States in 1919 along with Galleani, was to have one of the most remarkable and least known careers in the story of twentieth-century American radicalism. After his deportation, Schiavina, with Galleani, started to publish Cronaca Sovversiva in Turin, Italy, but after the rise of fascism had halted its publication, Schiavina escaped to France. In Paris Schiavina edited several Italian-language journals, La Difesa per Sacco e Vanzetti (1923) and Il Monito (1925–1928), and was deeply involved in many antifascist activities. When in 1927 Luigia Vanzetti passed through Paris on her way to see her brother in Boston just days before his execution, Schiavina helped to organize a massive demonstration on behalf of his two comrades, both of whom he had known well in America. Because of his earlier deportation and the unrelenting search for him by OVRA, the fascist secret police, Schiavina had to reenter the United States clandestinely in 1928. Despite his illegal status, Schiavina, under his assumed name, Max Sartin, managed to publish L'Adunata week after week for the next forty-three years, until it ceased publication in 1971, and succeeded in eluding all authorities until he died in 1987. He was one of the most incisive, militant, and enduring pens in the service of the anarchist movement; he wrote books, articles, editorials, pamphlets, translations, memorials, obituaries, and maintained a vast correspondence with anarchists throughout the world. His papers contain the fundamental source materials for the as yet unwritten history of the Italian anarchist movement in America. Ironically, for a group with a strong antiorganizational bias, L'Adunatisti managed to sustain one of the anarchist movement's longest-lasting and most regularly published journals. During critical times they were always among the movement's most dependable elements.

AFRICAN AMERICAN ANTICOLONIALISM. During World War II, as European hegemony crumbled, African American anticolonial activists forcefully argued that their struggles in the United States against Jim Crow were inextricably bound to the struggles of African and Asian peoples for independence. From the time of World War I, nationalists and Pan-Africanists had trenchantly critiqued and debunked myths of white supremacy and the civilizing mission as well as challenged the political and economic order on which they rested. In the 1930s especially, the scholarship of C. L. R. James and W. E. B. Du Bois had placed black liberation at the center of world events. As the anticolonial movements gathered momentum, these ideas took on a new urgency and meaning. Anticolonial efforts in Africa and Asia were supported by organizations such as the Council on African Affairs (CAA), founded by Max Yergan and Paul Robeson and also led by Alphaeus Hunton, Eslanda Robeson, Charlotta Bass, and Du Bois; the National Association for the Advancement of Colored People (NAACP), led by Walter White; and the National Council of Negro Women, led by Mary McLeod Bethune. In addition to showing support, activists in these organizations argued that the independence of new Asian and African nations would help black Americans in their struggles for political, economic, and civil rights.

The CAA was founded in 1937 as the International Committee on African Affairs (ICCA). The early ICCA represented a cross-section of interwar Left and liberal politics, including social gospel Christians and corporate philanthropists; the reorganization of the group as the CAA in 1942 and the addition of W. Alphaeus Hunton as its educational director in 1943—he would later become executive director—marked a distinct shift to a militant black international diaspora consciousness as well as a shift to independent black leadership. Anticolonial activists built on and reshaped the visions of Pan-Africanists, from Martin R. Delany to Marcus Garvey and Hubert Harrison as well as reshaped the thought and practice of Left internationalism. Their work also drew on the rich black oppositional politics of the 1930s, including opposition to the Italian invasion of Ethiopia, the Scottsboro defense, and Don't Buy Where You Can't Work campaigns. Invigorated by the portrayal of anticolonial challenges in the pages of a lively international black press—where, for example, the Trinidadian-born George Padmore publicized African anticolonial work, trade union activity, and the work of the London-based International African Service Bureau on a weekly basis in the largest black American newspapers such as the Pittsburgh Courier and the Chicago Defender—activists created a black popular front. Crafted by the Left but embracing the full ideological range of black America, including liberals, church leaders, and professional and middle-class organizations, and steeped in a world of black popular culture, it endured until the dawn of the Cold War. Through W. E. B. Du Bois and the NAACP as well as Henry Lee Moon of the political action committee of the Congress of Industrial Organizations, African Americans participated in and supported the 1945 Manchester Pan-African Congress. During World War II, while lobbying the U.S. government for a stronger anticolonial policy, the CAA organized support for a free India, and following the war, it supported African trade union efforts such as the 1946 Nigerian general strike and the Nigerian fight against the British suppression of the press.

The formation of the United Nations in 1945 provided an especially important focal point for anti-colonial efforts. With the imminent independence of India (1947) and a promise of a number of new Asian and African states in the foreseeable future, the possibilities of winning political and economic rights for black and colonized peoples through international strategies looked very different than they would after the onset of the Cold War. As a host of new international forums and plans for the United Nations emerged in the later years of the war, the possibility of redefining political sovereignty and human rights on an international scale became a reality. African American activists from the CAA, the NAACP, churches, fraternities, and nurses' associations saw these forums as hopeful sites for their own struggles, bringing a profound vision of the rights and responsibilities of citizenship. Alphaeus Hunton and the CAA worked especially closely with South Africans in the South African Passive Resistance Campaign and the African National Congress (ANC), and with the interim government of India in 1946 and 1947 at the United Nations, to challenge the attempts of the South African government to annex South-West Africa (Namibia) and to protest discrimination against Indians within South Africa.

With the onset of the Cold War, the broad anti-colonial alliances of World War II disintegrated as many African American liberals retreated from criticism of U.S. foreign policy, fundamentally altering the terms of anticolonialism and effectively severing the black American struggle for civil rights from the issues of anticolonialism and racism abroad. At the same time, the U.S. government prosecuted the CAA for its ties to the South African ANC, the Nigerian Mine Workers Union, and the Kenya African National Union. Despite the disruptive prosecution, the ties of these African American activists to South African allies such as Walter Sisulu, then secretary general of the ANC, deepened as the CAA supported the South African Campaign for the Defiance of Unjust Laws. As Left anticolonial activists such as Paul Robeson, Alphaeus Hunton, and W. E. B. Du Bois were marginalized in African American politics, and after the disbanding of the CAA in 1955, the American Committee on Africa (ACOA), established in 1953, became the major American political group concerned with Africa. But while decades later the ACOA's politics would come to resemble those of the CAA, at its birth in the Cold War era the organization not only lacked the relationship to the black community and a radical civil rights movement that had characterized the CAA, but also exemplified the new anticommunist anticolonialism.

Through the 1950s, some African American activists continued to fight for the visibility of anti-colonial and antiracist struggles against a bipolar framework that rendered the oppression of black peoples a secondary issue, supporting, for example, the 1955 Conference of Non-Aligned Nations in Bandung, Indonesia. The independence of Ghana in 1957 under the leadership of its first prime minister, Kwame Nkrumah, greatly encouraged the regeneration of African solidarity movements against the constraints of Cold War repression. Drawn to Nkrumah's vision of a democratic, nonaligned, unified Africa and the Organization of African Unity, hundreds of African Americans, including W. E. B. Du Bois and Alphaeus Hunton, relocated to the new nation while thousands more renewed anti-imperialist solidarity efforts on behalf of movements throughout the continent of Africa.

As African American activists protested the complicity of the United Nations and the United States in the 1961 assassination of Patrice Lumumba, prime minister of the independent Congo, new organizations such as the Patrice Lumumba Coalition were formed. Activists in the Student Nonviolent Coordinating Committee and the Black Panther Party increasingly turned toward an anti-imperialist politics, and activists also began to forge new alliances with democratic movements in the Caribbean. Crises such as the 1960 Sharpeville massacre in South Africa provided a catalyst for African Americans to link struggles against Jim Crow with the struggle against apartheid. The presence of South African visitors to the United States—including Bishop Desmond Tutu, general secretary of the South African Council of Churches; Oliver Tambo, president of the ANC; and David Sibeko, Pan-African Congress representative to the United Nations—further encouraged ties between the communities. In the same period of the surge of Black Power in South Africa, a divestment drive in the United States was spearheaded by anti-apartheid students. In the last two decades, organizations such as TransAfrica, the Black United Front, and the National Black Independent Party have worked to support democratic movements and to oppose military dictatorship movements throughout the continent, as well as to oppose U.S. government and corporate opposition to democratic movements. These groups have also supported democratic projects in the diaspora, such as the New Jewel Movement and Maurice Bishop in Grenada and the Michael Manley government in Jamaica. Building on the work of TransAfrica and the efforts of the Black Congressional Caucus to oppose U.S. government and corporate support of apartheid, Jesse Jackson attempted in his 1984 and 1988 presidential campaigns to make U.S. policy toward Africa an issue. With South Africa's first democratic elections in 1994 resulting in an ANC-led government, African American activists had a new ally on the African continent.

AFRICAN AMERICANS. From the founding of the Republic, the condition and status of African Americans have been central concerns of radical thinkers. The Constitution not only failed to abolish slavery or the slave trade but contained the formula that five slaves would count as three nonslaves for purposes of representation and taxation. In intellectual circles, religious organizations, and women's groups, those most concerned about the nature of the new experiment in democracy found this constitutional arrangement immoral and an offense to the spirit of the American Revolution. Although never more than ten percent of the population, the abolitionists drove the dialogue on race by calling for an end to slavery. African Americans were central figures in these struggles, whether as orators like Frederick Douglass and Sojourner Truth or as warriors like Harriet Tubman and Nat Turner. White abolitionists ran the same gamut, with women frequently playing a leading role. Civil disobedience was extensively practiced, most obviously in the Underground Railroad, while John Brown would come to personify armed intervention.

The advent of the Civil War did not resolve the issues at stake. Numerous politicians including Abraham Lincoln were against the spread of slavery but were willing to tolerate it where it existed. Many of them believed African Americans were racially inferior to Europeans or culturally unsuitable for European civilization. Radical Republicans such as Thaddeus Stevens opposed this view, and in the flush of victory following the end of the war they were able to pass the thirteenth, fourteenth, and fifteenth amendments to the Constitution, which outlawed slavery, confirmed full citizenship to all those who had been born on American soil, and guaranteed all citizens equal protection under the law.

The key postwar struggle was over the status of the South. Radicals wished for a radical reconstruction of Southern society so that blacks would receive the land, training, and protection necessary for them to succeed as freed persons. The view that prevailed, however, was that the South be reunited with the rest of the nation as soon as possible irrespective of the needs of African Americans. The triumph of the latter view was assured by the Compromise of 1877, which ended military occupation of the South.

From the end of the Civil War to the turn of the century, the black liberation struggle in the South mainly focused on populism. In some states, such as Georgia, there was a brief moment of cooperation between poor white farmers and their black counterparts. By the end of the century, however, racial identity among whites took precedence over class identity. The Jim Crow system came into existence throughout the South, with most blacks left in the category of sharecroppers.

Although they frequently understood that the success of their organizations depended upon including black workers among their ranks, labor leaders of this era were generally unable to persuade their memberships that racial integration would be beneficial. Founded immediately after the Civil War, the National Labor Union worked with the National Colored Labor Union, but the two groups never met or acted jointly. The Knights of Labor and some units of the Socialist Party occasionally reached out to black workers, but such efforts were limited in scope and timid in spirit. Not until the Industrial Workers of the World came on the scene in the early 1900s would there be integrated unions in the South and a national union that actively sought black members for its locals.

The key radical thinker on race at the turn of the century was W. E. B. Du Bois. In his writing and activism, he shaped the vision that would dominate black liberation thinking in the twentieth century. He further broadened the political perspective of African Americans by encouraging an identification with Africa and coupling African decolonization movements with civil rights for American blacks. Du Bois believed in training the "talented tenth" of his ethnic group to empower it to lead all blacks into what he hoped would be a socialist future.

Founded in the 1920s, the Communist Party proved to be the first predominantly white organization to put the issue of black liberation at the top of its agenda. As the most exploited of all workers in America, African Americans were thought to be the natural leaders of militant class struggle. All subsequent Marxist organizations would take a similar view. They would endlessly debate the relationship of class and race oppression, but, whatever their tilt, Marxist groups provided significant support for black liberation struggles.

A. Philip Randolph's creation of the Brotherhood of Sleeping Car Porters under broad socialist principles was another major achievement of the pre-World War II years. Randolph fought effectively for the presence of African Americans and for issues of concern to them in the American Federation of Labor and later in the Congress of Industrial Organizations. He effectively pressured the Roosevelt administration to deny defense industry contracts to firms practicing racial segregation.

A third hub of radicalism was the Harlem Renaissance. From its ranks came Paul Robeson, destined to be the most famous black man of his era and a champion of Left causes. Numerous artists associated with the movement accepted scholarships for study in the Soviet Union, wrote for radical newspapers, and generally operated in the cultural orbits dominated by the Communist Party.

Following World War II, the modern civil rights movement emerged in the South under the leadership of the Reverend Martin Luther King, Jr., and then spread to numerous centers in the North and the South. The movement succeeded in ending legal segregation and inspired the Voting Rights Act of 1964, changing the electoral landscape of the nation. The black civil rights movement inspired other groups suffering legal discrimination to organize movements of their own, including other ethnic groups, women, and homosexuals. The New Left, a predominantly white movement, was also directly inspired by the civil rights movement.

In the final decades of the century, rather than mounting new assaults against American racism, the civil rights movement found itself primarily in a defensive posture, seeking to preserve the gains achieved from the activism of the preceding decades. No single organization, personality, or strategy dominated the movement as had occurred in the past. Issues such as affirmative action and voting districts drawn to maximize black strength, essentially technical rather than strategic demands, dominated public discourse.

AFRICAN STUDIES. A field of study nourished on international controversy, African studies naturally became an arena of political scholarship. The revolutionary impact of African independence movements, the rise of African socialism, and the continuing influence of imperialism afforded a direct link between revolutionary hopes and intellectual concerns for at least a portion of the Left and of the academy in postwar America.

African studies began in American academia with the work of Columbia-trained anthropologist Melville Herskovits. He published a two-volume study of the kingdom of Dahomey based on his 1931 fieldwork, and went on to establish the first African studies program at Northwestern. Herskovits's best-known work, The Myth of the Negro Past (1941), shows his concern for Africa to have been linked to the issue of blacks' status in American society. This link was evident in earlier work by black writers—W. E. B. Du Bois's remarkable little 1915 survey of Africa (The Negro) makes it clear—and remains a hallmark of African studies in America.

A succession of events from 1950 to 1970 brought African studies from this beginning to a position as an established area of study. The rise of America to world dominance brought government support for area-studies programs in the 1950s. Fulbright programs, the National Defense Education and Foreign Language acts, and private foundations supported this expansion. Second, the independence of African countries, beginning with Ghana in 1957 and including Algeria, Kenya, and the Congo, brought greater American attention to Africa. Third, the later stages of the civil rights movement and the black power movement brought wide demands from black and white students for courses on Africa.

Scholarship in African studies was often regarded as radical by those in other areas, more because of its subject matter than because of the approaches of Africanists. In fact, the early leaders in the field were liberals rather than radicals. What distinguished American (as opposed to European) Africanists was their greater readiness to criticize colonialism and racism.

The emergence of a clearly radical approach in American studies of Africa took place in 1969 at the ninth annual meeting of the African Studies Association (ASA), in Montreal. White radicals brought to the meeting a pamphlet entitled African Studies: The Extended Family, which criticized leading scholars for collaborating with American policymakers on Africa. Community black activists combined with marginalized black scholars to take over some of the sessions. In the end, the Canadians seceded to form their own African studies association, and a predominantly black group seceded to form the African Heritage Studies Association; both these groups thrived.

During the 1970s and 1980s, many studies appeared relying on Marxism or on Immanuel Wallerstein's world-system approach. The new work by Marxists was particularly important in anthropology, but also in economics, history, and sociology. For instance, the critique of modernization theory and the discussion of modes of production were important in all these disciplines in the 1970s. The Association of Concerned Africanist Scholars formed in the 1970s as a political and lobbying arm of radical scholars: it focused efforts on critique of American policies in South Africa, Angola, Mozambique, and Western Sahara.

By the time of the 1984 Washington meeting of the ASA, hosted by Howard University, the battles between black and white Africanists had subsided, as indeed had the polarization between radical and liberal tendencies. Meanwhile, throughout the 1980s the Social Science Research Council sponsored a series of research overview papers by major scholars. Radicals were prominently featured among them, notably Frederick Cooper, author of studies of African workers, including From Slaves to Squatters.

The failure of independent African countries to prosper or to achieve democratic political structures challenged academics to develop a more critical analysis, focusing on internal contradictions in class and gender as well as the critique of imperialism. Radical scholars met this challenge well enough to achieve wide recognition and professional standing, especially as acknowledged in the annual Herskovits Prize for the best book in African studies. The Pan-African Caucus, formed at the 1995 meeting of the ASA, linked Africanist scholars of African descent in a structure that seemed likely to expand their influence in the association.

AGRARIAN RADICALISM. The rural radical movements, rarely outright Marxist or even socialist, have often linked up with the Left by virtue of common enemies and, to a lesser degree, similar aspirations. This ambiguous relationship has hidden a pattern, more usual in labor and reform movements, of agrarian leaders' sophistication in Marxist concepts and has obscured the disproportionately influential role sometimes played by a nucleus of Left activists in rural causes.

isting small-property relations, could be seen as well in contemporary artisanal movements, both immigrant and (especially) native-born, through most of the nineteenth century. Rural and urban workers alike sought to restrain the destruction being wrought by burgeoning capitalism, not only of economic opportunities, but of republican virtues that seemed to make America a unique site. Irredentist demands for the return of stolen lands, by Native Americans and by Mexican Americans, generally followed a different and much less successful course, isolated by a lack of sympathy from the vast majority of white Americans. Yet taken together, the various rural moments of unrest and violent uprisings constitute the most frequent resistance to rising capitalism.

The Civil War accelerated the growth of industrialism enormously and simultaneously made possible (or politically necessary) the partial achievement of a long-standing radical demand through the enactment of the 1862 Homestead Act. As envisioned by printer-agitator George Henry Evans and incorporated in early Republican Party platforms, such an act would encourage emigration from the cities, thereby raising wages, and create a formidable small-property democratic stratum. In practice, the granting of huge tracts to railroads along with other speculators and the rapid monopolization of banking and transportation limited the farmer's influence and subjected him to severe exploitation. In the post-Reconstruction "New South," black and white sharecroppers, still landless in any meaningful sense, faced the same problems and worse.

Out of this dilemma emerged a series of agrarian self-help associations, the Grange and the Farmers' Alliance being the most prominent. The Grange (or Patrons of Husbandry), founded in 1867, grew rapidly during the 1870s into a honeycomb of social, cultural, and cooperative marketing and supply operations. While its ban on politics and its exclusion of blacks vitiated any militant role, the Grange prepared many individuals for other actions. The Farmers' Alliance developed during the 1880s with a speed unprecedented in U.S. protest movements. It sponsored, at the local and regional level but especially in the South, a "subtreasury" plan whereby every county with sufficient agricultural production of basic grains or commodities such as cotton would have a central warehouse sponsored by the government that would issue receipts for farmers' products at a fair price and with an honest grading of quality. As a few contemporary critics have noted, the arguments of the prolific Alliance press often paralleled Marxian thought in identifying key exploiters if not in advocating any collective resolution.

True to the finest traditions of American radicalism, the Alliance went further in relation to blacks and women than any other contemporary movement, labor or socialist movements included. The "Colored Alliance" appeared in 1888 and spread widely through the South, although probably never near the claimed peak of more than a million members in sixteen states. To a greater degree than among whites, within this movement the effort at economic cooperation predominated, difficult work carried on sub rosa in large part. Its story therefore remains shadowy and by no means fully explored. Its most dramatic direct action occurred with a strike of black cotton-pickers in September 1891, inciting a wave of repression that ended the Colored Alliance. But the political ramifications went further, surfacing in a variety of political campaigns that promised an end to lynching and, in some cases, embraced full black participation in government. In all, this was the most important movement of black Southerners between Reconstruction and the civil rights era.

Leading Populist women arose, generally from small towns or cities within farming states, to become leading orators and organizers, chapter secretaries, and writer-editors. They argued for the "cooperative household," where, their common oppressions removed, all members of the family would share the work then done by women. They also established a critique of male privilege as a ruinous principle of American capitalism. Establishing their own newspaper, the Farmer's Wife, and their own National Women's Alliance in 1891, they viewed their participation as crucial to success ("Put 1,000 women lecturers in the field and the revolution is here," as a Farmer's Wife maxim went). Mary Elizabeth Lease (1850–1933), who made her fame calling on Kansas farmers to "raise less corn and more hell," traveled through a variety of movements to become an idol of ordinary Populists and a national leader of their movement. At the end of the 1890s, she joined the Socialist Labor Party for a brief period.

Caught between a drought that persisted through most of the 1890s and continuing low prices, the Farmers' Alliance (now increasingly known as the Populists, or People's Party) elected numerous state legislators, along with a few governors and congressional representatives. The Alliance majority favored, although with considerable ambivalence, solidarity not only of women and blacks but also between farmers and workers. By 1892, then, leaders proffered offers of unity to left-leaning urban coalitions and to the waning Knights of Labor, as well as to the fast-growing but politically ambiguous Women's Christian Temperance Union.

This dramatic bid failed owing to mutual distrust and deep conflicts of interest. Immigrant socialist activists looked with abhorrence on the temperance movement, many of whose supporters sought the illegalization of alcohol; besides, farmers sought higher prices for commodities, while workers needed lower prices or higher wages. The "Omaha Platform" of 1892 attempted to paper over these differences, calling for the subtreasury, government reclamation of lands held on speculation, government ownership of railroads and telegraph services, support for organized labor, the silver standard, and opposition to "any subsidy or national aid to any private corporation for any purpose." Incidents of racial solidarity in the South, and of material support for labor strikes and movements of the unemployed, encouraged hopes that a grand revolutionary change was close at hand.

But over the following few years, the Populist movement disintegrated with alarming speed and thoroughness. Apparent proximity to power emphasized racial, class, and regional differences. Large farmers in particular sought only minor adjustments in social relations. Even some of the most apparently radical figures ("Sockless Jerry" Simpson, for instance) eagerly supported U.S. overseas military and economic expansion in the name of wider markets. Common cause with blacks, let alone racial egalitarianism, proved difficult to sustain. Western Populists in particular enthused over the "free" minting of silver, ostensibly to increase the circulation of money and ease agrarian debts but also incidentally favoring silver-rich districts. In the 1896 presidential campaign, assembled Populists first turned in the direction of railroad-strike hero Eugene Debs, but closed their major political protest by accepting the Democratic Party nominee, reformer William Jennings Bryan. The defeat of Bryan by William McKinley punctured hopes of ordinary Populists and their many radical supporters, rural and urban, of gaining a foothold for change within the political system.

The collapse of Populism and the formation of the Socialist Party in 1901 afforded many former Populists (albeit only a small portion of the Populist movement, mostly in the Southwest and West) an opportunity to cut the Gordian knot that bound them to dreams of merely reforming capitalism. Instrumental in this development was the Coming Nation—and its successor, the Appeal to Reason—which reached tens and perhaps hundreds of thousands who had passed through agrarian radicalism.

That a vast socialist constituency should be organized through an acerbic, folksy newspaper rather than a political movement was characteristic of American radicalism. In a real sense, the lecturers, conventions, and press of the abolitionist and woman's rights movements a half-century earlier had been the true precursors of southwestern socialism. "One Hoss Philosopher" J. A. Wayland, land speculator and entrepreneurial publisher of the Coming Nation and the Appeal to Reason, was famous for his sales-talk of socialist ideas to strangers. The two newspapers served as an extension of this logic. He regarded the victims of capitalism as contributing to their own enslavement, and often said so directly in his column; abolishing wage-slavery and its variants, he believed, would complete the task begun with the American Revolution and advanced with the abolition of black slavery. While the Appeal supported the Socialist Party and urged readers to enlist, it did not focus on inner-party affairs, controversies, or (with a few exceptions such as Eugene Debs, perhaps the most beloved of all living beings to Appeal readers) personalities. It raked the muck of capitalist-created misery, and through a chatty style pointed a way out in the promise of a cooperative society.

The area around the Appeal's home territory of Girard, Kansas, offered a striking example of mixed semirural socialist constituencies. Known as the Little Balkans, southeastern Kansas had a major coalfield with half a dozen immigrant nationalities, at least one ethnic socialist periodical, in Italian, and a powerful United Mine Workers socialist contingent. Beyond the coal patches, pastoral and small-town life dominated the scene. Once established, the Appeal Building, "Temple of the Revolution," was the most prominent feature of the town. Here, socialist and middle-American values (with such characteristic tangents as spiritualism and vegetarianism) found a common meeting ground. Too rarely, however, did socialists notice that the most natural proponents of the synthesis were themselves middle-aged, drawing values from a world already disappearing.

The Socialist Party developed considerable strength in many rural areas, not only in Kansas, but also in Oklahoma, parts of Texas, Arkansas, the Dakotas, and Minnesota. Typically centered in the small towns, where farmers, coal miners, tradesmen, railroad workers, and others shared culture and exchanged information, the Socialist Party local upheld education, in the republican spirit, as training ordinary people to attain their own and common interests. Vast encampments modeled upon the revival-tent form drew thousands, sometimes for almost a week at a time, to listen to socialist messages and be entertained by socialist musicians. Contesting local, state, and national political power, while important, was perceived as a means more than a goal of their mass explanatory effort amid crisis-ridden and doomed capitalism.

Ironically, the Socialist Party national leaders themselves never resolved what the Germans called the "Agarfrage," whether and how future agrarian production would be state- or private-owned. Farm constituents, especially as they grew toward their political apex in 1910–1912, fervently opposed collectivist schemes, eclectically supporting ostensibly "Left" and "Right" positions on various questions within the socialist movement. By and large, the agrarian leaders remained on their own, blessed by a sense of autonomy and the ability to reach formulations acceptable to their constituents.

By 1904, Oklahoma Socialists had scored their first political victory, notably in a mining town of the Choctaw Nation, with the election of a mayor. Many such triumphs followed. By 1910, indeed, Oklahoma had the strongest Socialist Party base in the United States, some 5,482 members, 800 more than New York State. Texans, with far fewer members, could boast of a vigorous press, including the Hallettsville Rebel, with more than 20,000 circulation. Two years later, at the political flood tide, Oklahoma Socialists polled more than 40,000 votes, 16.6 percent of the state's total. Louisiana added more than 5,000, Arkansas more than 8,000, and Texas more than 25,000.

Socialists were limited by legal disfranchisement of black and white small farmers alike, and were virtually crushed by waves of repression that increased after 1912. Especially in Oklahoma, socialists struggled to resist black disfranchisement as they called for female enfranchisement. Direct action by desperate tenants, whose plight most resembled that of the urban proletariat, both heightened the importance of the socialist movement and threatened it with disaster. Oscar Ameringer and a battalion of other socialist editor-agitators participated widely in such organizations as the Oklahoma Farmers Union, the Texas Land Renters' League, and the Working Class Union, but these could not overcome the enormous power of bankers and landlords. Repression spread, lynchings rose, and vigilantism became the rule in many counties as socialists were publicly identified with banditry and virtually outlawed.

The Green Corn Rebellion of 1917, which pitted radical Oklahoma farmers against the selective service system, ended in a military debacle and an open opportunity for government action. Participants received long prison sentences, and the Socialist Party in Oklahoma, while retaining selective strengths, never regained its formidable status as threat to the two-party system.

Meanwhile, the war fell hardest upon the rural Socialist Party press. The U.S. attorney general's suspension of second-class mailing permits, along with a wave of patriotism upon entry into the war and Woodrow Wilson's liberal declarations, destroyed the vast majority of socialist papers. In another sense, the mostly middle-aged rural socialist population finished out its activism in a bold expression of antiwar sentiments. The next generation, less appalled by the "electric light towns" (a rural socialist phrase for the county seats) than fascinated by sophistication, had abandoned the appeals to republican virtues anyway.

In some regions, the radical agrarian movement gained new strengths, however. To some degree, the war had alienated rural German and Scandinavian stock from the political mainstream. Secondly, more workable forms of reformist radicalism could be created in the absence of a viable socialist movement. In North Dakota the Non-Partisan League, founded by A. C. Townley in 1915, soon took over the state government by political maneuvering and instituted a state bank and state grain elevator. In Minnesota a Farmer-Labor Party burst forth to answer the severe decline in farm prices and to accommodate militant populations (such as formerly proletarian Finnish workers, removed by blacklist to rural districts). In Wisconsin the Progressive Party of Robert La Follette lost the support of the urban middle classes but salvaged its prospects by a shift to rural populations and ethnic workers.

The Farmer-Labor Party ventures of the 1920s afforded Communists important new opportunities, and the Socialist Party a last major opportunity, at influencing large rural populations. The Communists gathered pockets of support in Minnesota and such spots as Sheridan County, Montana, where Producers News had been a left-wing socialist weekly with a strong local base of support, and its editor, Charles "Red Flag" Taylor (1884–1967), had become both a Communist and a state legislator. Communists, hamstrung by internal party factionalism and by dependence upon their allies in the Chicago Federation of Labor, resolved first to lead an avowedly radical Farmer-Labor Party (with Taylor as chair) and then virtually abandoned the effort as the La Follette candidacy gathered steam. Opposing La Follette's Progressive Party run, they lost key contacts and most of the nonethnic support they had gathered. Socialists, on the other hand, threw all their remaining energies into the La Follette campaign, but emerged with little to show for their effort.

Perhaps the greatest Left triumph and defeat in the entire rural sector was the Cooperative Central Exchange (CCE), centered in the heavily Finnish iron-mining region around Superior, Wisconsin, and Duluth, Minnesota. Working outward to the small towns of the region, the "cooperators" established some fifty-six stores by 1921 and created their own training school and an educational department that taught Marxism as a facet of the search for a cooperative world. At their peak toward the end of the 1920s, the CCE, the largest single cooperative network in the United States, fell into the miasma of Communist factionalism and the larger reality of Party insistence upon ultimate political controls of hitherto largely autonomous efforts. In 1930, after an overwhelming defeat, the Communist cooperators withdrew their eighteen stores and established their own small-scale network, which dissolved itself in Popular Front days.

Communists thus entered the Depression with only a fraction of their former rural influence. Their main asset, Ella Reeve ("Mother") Bloor, had relocated to be with her new husband, a Left farm leader, and immediately set out upon speaking tours of the desperately impoverished rural districts. Joined by young activists Harold Ware and Lem Harris, Bloor and Charlie Taylor revived the United Farmers League, launching new branches in Montana and the Dakotas.

This small Communist contingent existed within a network of newer farm protest leaders and institutions, radical in immediate demands but far from Marxist. Locked in Third Period logic, Communists found the demands of other organizations, let alone the organizations themselves, extremely difficult to endorse—and tempting to attack, however self-isolating the result. The Farm News Letter, Lem Harris's cautious alternative to the harsh tones of Producers News, took more constructive ground in setting forward a program of farm "holidays" from mortgage payments and federal price supports. Working in a virtual Popular Front manner, Harris and Ware intervened in the series of major conferences farmers themselves held. Their new paper, the Farmers National Weekly, had a brief but impressive success.

The failure of a national farm strike and the beginnings of federal payments badly undercut the rural movement by 1934, and the more sectarian Communist wing took control of the apparatus, ironically just as the Popular Front had begun to take hold in Communist strategy generally. A turnaround brought the Farmers National Committee for Action, directed by Harris, into new friendships and alliances, especially with the antiwar sentiments from many non-Marxist rural activists. The Producers News folded in 1937, but the Farmers National Weekly gained supporters, as Communists battled against Father Coughlin's conservative following (who supported William Lemke in the 1936 election). Communists found a haven in the National Farmers Union (NFU), a New Deal-oriented umbrella protest movement. Hard-core support remained concentrated in the upper Midwest, disproportionately Finnish in character. Communist participation in Minnesota's Farmer-Labor Party, severely damaged when Elmer Benson lost his reelection bid as governor in 1938, remained a factor in state politics for a decade.

The Socialist Party played a notable role, briefly but poignantly, in support of the Southern Tenant Farmers Union, led by H. L. Mitchell. Reclaiming an abandoned socialist political base and building a unique biracial tenant organization, Mitchell won a few important victories for improvement of conditions. Unlike the southern Communists who participated in a shootout at Reeltown, Alabama, Mitchell (sometimes directly helped by Norman Thomas as visiting speaker) chose a more careful course, by garnering federal support for civil liberties. Even the Trotskyist movement made a contribution to the agrarian struggle, through Ernest R. McKinney's and C. L. R. James's participation in a southeast Missouri tenant farmers' action of 1942.

By wartime, the Left had acquired another ally, the New York State-based Dairy Farmers Union, and its paper, Farmers Defender. As in the NFU, to which the Dairy Farmers Union affiliated, the "united front" brought a strong sense of unity, which Roosevelt's death and the emergence of the Cold War thoroughly eclipsed. For a time, the NFU ardently resisted the drift. Identified as Left-linked, it was subject to many attacks, and (to the surprise of Communists as well as others) took no official position of support for the Henry Wallace–Glen Taylor Progressive Party ticket in 1948. A modest recovery of Left strength within the NFU fell to pieces with the Korean War.

The Second World War also had another effect. Mobilizing manpower and providing new avenues of economic opportunity, it scattered familiar Left constituencies, drawing many radical farmers and their descendants into the armed forces or into cities from which they did not return to the land.

What remained of Left influence rested largely in the hands of Iowa's Fred Stover, longtime NFU activist and for a time in the 1940s the organization's foremost leader. His opposition to the Korean War was the last of many defeats within the organization. His new National Farm Organization of the mid-1950s contained a handful of now mostly middle-aged radicals, the monthly Farm News a final radical outpost. Patterned after the Holiday movement twenty years earlier (an organized refusal to market crops at ruinous prices), the National Farm Organization found no strategy for the direct, cooperative marketing that it espoused.

The 1960s brought new and different insurgencies to black southern and Chicano western districts. But most later radical agricultural organizations—with a total potential constituency of less than five percent of the U.S. population—have experienced only sporadic successes against low prices and the steady advance of agribusiness. Organic farmers' co-operatives, from the northwest to central California, wove together networks of quiet base-building, and elsewhere smaller collections of progressives sought to hold on to a share of the increasingly commercialized "health food" market. Meanwhile, the farm economy worsened, especially during the later 1980s, and a chiliastic (often anti-Semitic) armed Right had more success than the Left in responding to the fears of small farmers. New patterns of radicalism, led by such mainstream figures as former Texas commissioner of agriculture Jim Hightower and by Jesse Jackson, had only begun by that time to assume political-economic forms sometimes surprisingly similar to the old cooperative schemes of the Farmers' Alliance.

AIDS COALITION TO UNLEASH POWER.

The leading grass-roots movement in the struggle against AIDS, the AIDS Coalition to Unleash Power (ACT UP) was founded in New York City in 1987 and quickly spread to dozens of cities around the United States. Because of its large-scale, militant demonstrations, ACT UP developed a reputation as the “radical” front of the lesbian/gay and AIDS movements. Nonetheless, for much of its early history, ACT UP focused primarily on producing moderate reforms within government bureaucracies and pharmaceutical companies. While a number of ACT UP/New York members had prior involvements with the New Left and the feminist, gay, and antiwar movements, most of ACT UP’s membership consisted of white, gay, professional men with little or no previous activist experience. ACT UP/New York deliberately kept its focus narrow so as to create a broad coalition, and it fought off early attempts by the New Alliance Party and the International Socialist Organization to seize control of the group’s agenda.

By 1988, however, ACT UP began to expand its focus. Prodded primarily by women and people of color in the group, ACT UP came to recognize the ways in which issues of poverty, sexism, and racism intersected with AIDS (“What good is a cure if people can’t afford it?” members would ask). ACT UP chapters nationwide became involved in the fight for universal health care in the early 1990s, and in 1993 ACT UP/New York released a proposal that challenged the capitalist underpinnings of medical research in this country. The “Barbara McClintock Project to Cure AIDS” called for the centralization of government-sponsored AIDS research, the delinking of such research from private profit, and the seizure by eminent domain of privately funded discoveries whose release was being unnecessarily delayed (e.g., because of market considerations). While ACT UP chapters continued to exist well into the 1990s, by 1995 most had either collapsed or were a fragment of their former size.

ALGER HISS CASE. See Hiss Case.

ALGREN, NELSON (1909–1981). Novelist and essayist of Swedish and German-Jewish ancestry, Algren was born in Detroit, but when he was three his family moved to Chicago, where he remained most of his life. Although he received a degree in journalism (University of Illinois, 1931), the Depression forced him to take odd jobs such as door-to-door salesman, migratory worker, carnival hand, and gas-station attendant. His first published story, “So Help Me,” appeared in Story in 1933. His first novel, Somebody in Boots, was published in 1935 and Never Come Morning seven years later.

Most of Algren’s fiction is about the despised and desperate subproletariat: “life’s other side—men and women who have no alternatives . . . whose lives are nightmares,” “backwoodsmen without a backwoods,” “hitchhikers alone on the nowhere road,” outcasts for whom “everything is hopelessly and forever wrong.” His intense realism, sense of foreboding, pessimism, oneiricism, and dark humor always distinguished Algren from the sentimental socialist authors of his generation.

In the 1930s Algren helped Jack Conroy on the Anvil and worked on the Works Progress Administration (WPA) Writers’ Project, helping to complete the Galena Guide and writing scripts for a WPA radio series on working-class life. He was close to the Communist Party for some years, but he never became a member, finding in it “a certain kind of rigidity” and an “authoritarian attitude” that repelled him. While his own radicalism did not tend to organizational life, he frequently praised figures such as Eugene Debs and Haymarket martyr Louis Lingg. Algren remained devoted to revolutionary ideals long after more orthodox "reds" of the 1930s had accommodated themselves to the postwar conservative backlash.

Algren warmly supported the civil rights movement as "the only movement that sustains the old American radical tradition," and he was an outspoken critic of the war in Vietnam. In the early 1960s, when an interviewer asked him to agree that the United States was "more of an open society than Russia," he retorted, "It's as though I were in a flood in Mississippi and the water is up to my waist and you're saying, 'It really isn't serious, because there are people drowning in the Volga.'" In his later years he acknowledged anarchist leanings, and remarked, "I would like to think I am basically against government."

The Man with the Golden Arm (1949) and A Walk on the Wild Side (1956) brought him a mass audience and movie sales. His stories were collected in The Neon Wilderness (1949) and, together with several essays and a few poems, in The Last Carousel (1973). Less well known than his fiction are Algren's essays, which are among his finest work and embody some of his most provocative criticism of American society. This category includes the merciless Chicago: City on the Make (1951), parts of Who Lost an American? (1963), the savagely ironic "The Cortez Gang," his somber reflections on the 1919 "Black Sox" scandal, and the posthumously published book-length essay Nonconformity.

As the 1960s wore on, Algren stated he did not know of any culture that was as hard on its writers as America. His own experiences with publishers and film producers had not been pleasant. Implacably hostile to the literary establishment, he found himself ostracized by major publishers and book reviewers.

In 1975 Algren relocated to New Jersey and then to New York. He was researching the life of black middleweight boxer and political prisoner Rubin ("Hurricane") Carter for what would be his last novel, The Devil's Stocking. Rejected by mainstream publishers, the novel remained unpublished at the time of Algren's death and only appeared two years later under the imprint of a minor firm. Of this last book Algren said, "I've tried to write about a man's struggle against injustice—that's the only story worth telling."

ALINSKY, SAUL DAVID (1909–1972). Born to orthodox Jewish emigrants from Russia, Alinsky was raised and educated in Chicago and came of age amid the radical ferment of the Great Depression. The "Alinsky method" of community organizing, for which he is best known, was shaped in the late 1930s by his involvement with initial efforts to organize the Congress of Industrial Organizations (CIO), his contact with community efforts sponsored by the Communist Party during its Popular Front period, and his social work with the innovative Chicago Area Project (CAP). In the Back of the Yards Neighborhood Council (BYNC), which he organized with neighborhood resident Joseph Meegan in 1939, Alinsky combined his prior experiences into a blueprint for community organizing: (1) develop a pragmatic "trade union in the social factory" where people at the neighborhood level can bargain, strike, struggle, and advance their interests as they did in the CIO, (2) create a power-oriented community organization willing to use militant, conflict tactics like the Unemployed Councils but without the council's ideology or Party-building orientation, and (3) promote a democratic organization, such as CAP, in which organizers do not lead but rather develop indigenous leaders and in which the process of self-determination—letting the people decide—reveals the progressive nature of grass-roots democracy.

The initial BYNC was a classic project of the Popular Front period. At this time, Alinsky saw himself as a "professional antifascist" and the council as a skillfully organized coalition of all sectors of Back of the Yards—residents, merchants, clergy, and packinghouse union organizers, among whom were Communists. The enemy was outside the neighborhood—factory owners and local officials.

Throughout his life Alinsky was a defender of the downtrodden, a Jeffersonian democrat, a populist antagonist of concentrated power and privilege. Before 1947 this tied him closely with Left efforts. But in the constrained context of Cold War America, the Alinsky method and initial efforts like the BYNC veered Right. The BYNC became a powerful neighborhood organization in Chicago, known as much for its segregationist stands as its progressive victories. Alinsky even sought to assist anticommunist efforts in both France and Italy. By the 1960s, the "professional antifascist" had become an "urban populist," committed to empowering those at the bottom of society with an organizing method and a set of tactics. This "nonideological" organizing, advanced through his Industrial Areas Foundation, became popular in the 1960s among groups seeking a progressive alternative to the turbulence of the era and to Old and New Left models of social change. In the 1970s and 1980s "neopopulist" organizers modified and expanded the Alinsky method, hoping to create a grass-roots, majoritarian, Left strategy more effective than the single-interest, single-group efforts characteristic of the 1960s. Alinsky was a brilliant tactician and demanding organizer whose work, perhaps more than that of any other individual, reflected and advanced the two dominant shifts in organizing since World War II—from the factory to the community as the locus of organizing and from consciously ideological to "nonideological" politics.

ALLERTON AVENUE CO-OPS. Perhaps the most concentrated group of American radicals in a single housing complex, the residents of the Co-ops (pronounced as coops, not co-ops), on Allerton Avenue of the Bronx, lived in a world where the Left set the cultural tone and the bourgeoisie was conspicuous by its absence. During the early 1920s, a small number of young activists experimented with a cooperative housing and restaurant arrangement in Harlem. Most came together with wider circles during the summer, in Camp Nitgedaiget, Beacon, New York. They ambitiously planned a housing development for workers in a section of the Bronx still sparsely settled. With the guidance of architect Herman Jessor (he would later design Co-op City), they designed high ceilings, sunshine in at least one room of each apartment, and a common courtyard facing Bronx Park.

The "Workers Cooperative Colony" managed to complete almost 750 apartments with about 2,000 rooms, and to help maintain a group of small cooperative businesses in the surrounding areas—laundry, tailor, grocery, newsstand, cafeteria, and butcher shop among others—and even engaged a physician dedicated to preventive medicine. The Depression eclipsed most of this effort, however, and after a ten-year moratorium of debt payments the directors accepted a private landlord rather than set a bad political example by raising rents.

The political and social atmosphere through the 1940s emphasized versions (mostly the Communist version) of Jewish socialism. Cultural events in the Vanguard Community Center brought radical films, concerts, and a multitude of classes along with socializing. The International Workers' Order commanded great loyalty, as did Yiddish (and English) shuls for children. The library, with some 75,000 books, served the entire northeast Bronx.

Equally important, "Co-opniks" acted widely upon the world outside their gates. They were the heart of neighborhood rent strikes (although never against the Co-ops), union drives, May Day parades, and fundraising for many causes but especially antifascism and the Yiddish Communist daily Morgen Freiheit. Political gerrymandering split the Co-op vote into two districts to prevent a solid bloc of votes for American Labor Party candidates.

The shift to private ownership, McCarthyism, upward mobility and assimilation of young people, and finally the deterioration of the neighborhood ended the experiment. In 1977 a Co-op reunion was held.

ALLIS-CHALMERS STRIKE. The strike that took place at Allis-Chalmers in 1945 and its aftermath of repression marked a new phase of conservative counterattack against the Congress of Industrial Organizations (CIO), aimed specifically at Communist labor leaders and indirectly aided by CIO chiefs themselves. Workers at Allis-Chalmers, in West Allis (Milwaukee), Wisconsin, had sought to organize themselves, with limited success, until they received a charter from the United Automobile Workers (UAW)-CIO as Local 248. Throughout World War II, the company attempted to provoke a strike, and made quite clear that they would force a strike, to undo the gains, when the war ended. Unwilling to bargain with the union's Left leadership and rejecting arbitration, the company succeeded in promoting a nearly unprecedented campaign of harassment by agents of the Federal Bureau of Investigation, anticommunist congressional investigators, media witch-hunters, and other conservatives against the strikers. Anticommunist unionists in Wisconsin, including some UAW locals led by Walter Reuther supporters, for a time refused to supply strike support.

After eleven months the strike failed, nearly destroying Local 248 as a result of the firing of almost one hundred of its leaders. Harold Christoffel, the local's first president and most noted public Left figure, was later sent to prison for perjury before the Taft-Hartley Committee. The strike and its defeat—spuriously described by Walter Reuther as a “political” strike in consonance with European Communist-led strikes—delivered a serious blow to the Left in the UAW. Although progressive unions had lent their support to the strike and its leaders (and although Local 248 itself managed to rebuild under Taft-Hartley), the workers had become strategically weaker in the face of the increasingly coordinated repression.

AMALGAMATED CLOTHING WORKERS OF AMERICA. Born out of the great risings of needle-trades workers that erupted between 1909 and 1913, the Amalgamated Clothing Workers of America was officially founded in 1914 as a new industrial union. Samuel Gompers and the leadership of the American Federation of Labor (AFL) condemned it as an illicit dual unionist breakaway from the Federation's craft affiliate in the men's clothing industry, the United Garment Workers (UGW).

In fact, the Amalgamated originated earlier, during a 1910 mass strike in Chicago against the industry's leading manufacturer, Hart, Schaffner and Marx. The strike was reluctantly endorsed and quickly abandoned by the nativist and corrupt UGW. Like the “Rising of the 20,000” in New York City the year before, the strike had been triggered by accumulated miseries of sweated labor: the petty tyrannies of foremen, the endless hours, the filth and stifling air, the niggardly piece-rates always subject to arbitrary reductions, the precariousness of a livelihood dependent on the wild seasonal and cyclical oscillations of a business subject to the whims of fashion. The strike enlisted the help of middle-class progressives like Jane Addams and the Women's Trade Union League, who were both repelled by the medievalism of the industry and worried that if these abuses were left unchecked the new immigrants of the “rag trade” would become permanently estranged, a chronic source of social instability and even revolution.

Indeed, the rank-and-file garment workers who actually led the strike and the institution to which it gave birth were, without exception, political radicals for whom trade unionism was but part of larger designs for social transformation. Among its founding cadre, nearly every variety of left-wing politics was represented: Lithuanian revolutionary nationalism, Bohemian free-thought, Italian syndicalism, the revolutionary unionism of the Industrial Workers of the World, Jewish and Italian anarchism, the orthodox socialism of the American Socialist Party and Second International, and the tactically bolder socialism of the Jewish Bund. The Wobblies were particularly conspicuous during the Hart, Schaffner and Marx strike and continued to exert influence during the union's formative years. But organized Jewish socialism, in both its Second International and Bundist versions, actually dominated the evolution of the Amalgamated—not surprising for an industry where Jewish workers constituted a plurality of the labor force and included within their ranks a disproportionate number of experienced trade unionists and socialists.

All radicals agreed that the AFL was afflicted by a fundamental elitism, craft parochialism, political conservatism, and anti-immigrant nativism. But the Socialist Party, which included such Jewish notables as Morris Hillquit and Abraham Cahan, was also committed to a strategy of “boring from within,” hoping to gradually convert the AFL, if not to socialism, then at least to a position favoring industrial unionism. Cahan and the Jewish socialists who led the trade-union affiliate of the AFL, the United Hebrew Trades, therefore exerted pressure on the fledgling leadership of the Amalgamated to compromise its differences with and rejoin the UGW. But the young men—they were almost all young and male despite the fact that the industry's labor force was nearly half female and, more to the point, that many of the shop-floor leaders at the outset of the Hart, Shaffner and Marx strike were women—were not about to surrender their bitterly contested organizational independence in the higher strategic interests of Abraham Cahan's socialist Tammany Hall on Union Square.

Many, although by no means all, of these founding figures were refugees from the 1905 Russian Revolution, including the new union's president, Sidney Hillman. Like Hillman, they had belonged to the Bund and were familiar both with the tactics of the mass strike and the more centralized discipline of a semi-clandestine political party. Together with a smaller complement of Italian socialists and one-time Wobbly organizers—the Bellanca brothers, Emilio Grandinetti, and others—they fashioned a militant, semi-industrial, and ethnically mixed union that by 1919 managed to consolidate its position in most of the industry's major markets, a remarkable accomplishment when one considers the previous history, stretching well back into the 1890s, of repeated failures to establish a lasting organizational presence among the men's clothing workers.

World War I created an environment conducive to this early success and in several crucial respects was pivotal in the formative life of the union. Because of its wartime concern with labor shortages and unrest, the government sanctioned collective bargaining and actually exerted pressure on uniform manufacturers to negotiate with the Amalgamated. At the same time, echoes of Bolshevism and the radical democratic movements for workers' control, which spread across Western and Central Europe, resonated within the ranks of the Amalgamated. At its founding convention, the union had adopted a militant, class-struggle preamble for its constitution, lifted almost verbatim from the credo of the Socialist Labor Party. (The union's general secretary, Joseph Schlossberg, had in fact until recently been a leading figure in the party.) The risings of soviets in Germany and Hungary, the factory occupations in Italy, and the strikes in France all made the most improbably apocalyptic dreams seem suddenly imminent. The Jewish rank and file, in particular, greeted the overthrow of czarism with delirious enthusiasm.

However, the war also generated countercurrents within the union's hierarchy. Hillman depended on the government's support and developed close relations with officials like Felix Frankfurter, Walter Lippmann, and Louis Brandeis, all of whom were sympathetic to trade unionism, even to industrial unionism, but who were averse to radical working-class politics. Frankfurter and others were ideological proponents of "industrial democracy," an antidote to the pervasive crisis of authority in the workplace that recognized the need for autonomous vehicles of working-class representation, but also sought to incorporate such institutions within a broader collaborative program premised on expanded and efficient production and mass consumption. Hillman embraced "industrial democracy" wholeheartedly as the "British road" to industrial equity and peace; that is, as the preferred alternative to the tyranny of the "Prussian method" and the social chaos of Bolshevism. The Amalgamated was quickly lionized by middle-class progressives everywhere as the pioneer of the "new unionism" with a social conscience. It combined innovations in collective bargaining—especially the creation of an elaborate democratic apparatus of grievance mediation and impartial arbitration—with a broader interest in social welfare. Thus, during the twenties, the Amalgamated was heralded for its introduction of unemployment insurance, cooperative housing, labor banking, and consumer cooperatives.

Even before the Great Depression, then, the contest between reform and revolution was firmly decided in favor of the former. A series of factional battles in the mid-twenties eliminated most anarchist and Communist opposition to the union leadership, an opposition that in any event was itself not always averse to the basic logic of the "new unionism." By 1929 the Amalgamated's "new unionism" foreshadowed the fundamental transformations authored by the New Deal and the Congress of Industrial Organizations (CIO), both in the field of industrial labor relations and in the wider arena of social welfare. The Wagner, Social Security, and Fair Labor Standards acts encoded in federal statutes reforms first enacted in microcosm by the Amalgamated. Orchestrating the diverse motivations of numerous ethno-occupational groups into a coherent movement for industrial justice and economic well-being was the Amalgamated's central accomplishment, one that paved the way for all the new industrial unions of the CIO.

For all these reasons, Sidney Hillman played a conspicuous role during the New Deal and World War II and embodied the critical political link between the CIO and the New Deal Democratic Party. He staunchly defended the New Deal against all its enemies on the Right and Left. As the chairman of the CIO political action committee he helped institutionalize the relationship between the new labor movement and the Democratic Party. Hillman's career and that of the Amalgamated encapsulated the political trajectory of much of the industrial labor movement in mid-twentieth-century America. Beginning as an avowedly socialist union, excluded from the mainstream of American industrial and political life, it had become, by 1945, integrated into a new industrial order, renouncing its more visionary aspirations for a share in the cornucopia of mass production and consumption.

AMERASIA. A monthly magazine (1937–1947) devoted to the Far East and the American involvement therein, Amerasia had a limited but prestigious readership, most of which consisted of Far Eastern specialists in the official and academic worlds. It was started by Frederick V. Field, the secretary of the American branch of the Institute of Pacific Relations, an academic organization, and Philip J. Jaffe, a businessman long a student of the Far East. Both had been editors of China Today, a left-wing journal covering somewhat the same area, which ceased publication in deference to the new venture.

Under the guidance of an editorial board of Far Eastern specialists, Amerasia presented a broad political analysis of the realities of the Far Eastern situation (e.g., the developing Chinese Communist revolution and Japanese imperialist invasion of China) and its implications for American policy. With the coming of World War II, the journal's contents increasingly discussed anticipated postwar problems. At the same time many members of the editorial board resigned to join in the war effort; others withdrew as objections to the founders' left-wing connections were brought into greater prominence.

In June 1945, in one of the government's first noisy salvos into what was later recognized as the Cold War, the Federal Bureau of Investigation arrested the two remaining editors, three officers of the government, and a journalist, accusing them of trying to pass government secrets to a foreign power. Several thousand allegedly confidential papers were seized as evidence. After a few months of sensational headlines, the Amerasia Case, as it became known, petered out. The great bulk of papers turned out to be not so secret. On the contrary they proved to be an embarrassment to the government because they revealed the true situation in China, which the government had gone to great lengths to conceal from the American public. Neither side wanted a lengthy, expensive, and highly publicized trial, so a compromise was reached whereby two of the defendants paid a nominal fine and the government dropped the case.

AMERICAN ARTISTS' CONGRESS. A smaller and less remembered version of the Congress of American Writers, the American Artists' Congress (AAC) rallied a wide variety of greater and lesser notables for an antifascist program. The John Reed Clubs, primarily literary in purpose, had launched numbers of exhibitions in 1933–1934 showcasing political, class-oriented work. With the turn toward the Popular Front and the convocation of the first national Writers Congress in 1935, leading figures of the Reed Clubs sought a more inclusive artistic expression. Stuart Davis, one of the prominent Masses artists twenty years earlier, served as executive secretary for a proposed artists' congress. Committees including Hugo Gellert, George Ault, Louis Lozowick, Ben Shahn, and others put together a planning committee (which also included former Masses artist Henry Glintenkamp). Many notables, such as Moses Soyer, Raphael Soyer, and Max Weber, participated in the "call" for a congress.

The first meetings of the congress, held at New York's Town Hall and the New School for Social Research in February 1936, emphasized solidarity against fascism and war, so much so that the usual Left artists' criticisms of conservative regionalism or American Scene art virtually ceased. With the disappearance of that familiar critical edge, the avid Left promotion of social realist art practically faded from the AAC also. The lionization of the Soviet approach to social art, by Margaret Bourke-White and Louis Lozowick, only hinted at the utility of social realism for U.S. artists. Censorship (such as the effacement of Diego Rivera's Rockefeller Center murals) was viewed as a facet of the imminent danger fascism posed to world culture. Max Weber delivered the rhetorical high note of the congress, connecting art with the revolutionary transformation of society and embracing modern art's innovations as essential. Artist groups' representatives spoke at length about the economic and social conditions of their members and efforts at collective improvement. Leading figures of the congress described it as the greatest event in American art since the Armory Show of 1913.

After the congress, working AAC branches sprang up in New York, Cleveland, Saint Louis, New Orleans, Los Angeles, and Chicago, symposia were widely held, and various shows (including a noted print show, "America—1936") and annual exhibitions were opened. Meanwhile, the congress lobbied for a permanent federal arts program, helped establish an American Artists and Writers Ambulance Corps for Spain, and defended controversial art from suppression.

From 1937 to 1939, the same type of activity continued, with lower-key national meetings and much local politically oriented activity. Meanwhile, critics increasingly charged Communist domination (a prospect that Stuart Davis, promised autonomy, had resisted in practice). Ultimately, the compulsion to defend the Moscow Trials and the Hitler-Stalin Pact proved too much. Davis himself grew weary of Communists' bloc-voting, and sought to reduce the AAC's purview to solely artistic affairs. A 1940 vote to approve a report favoring Russia's invasion of Finland precipitated Stuart Davis's resignation and a minority report charging Communist Party domination of the AAC. The organization limped on, with Henry Glintenkamp as chairman, and a variety of loyalists (including William Gropper, Raphael Soyer, Philip Evergood, and Art Young) in tow. It officially dissolved in 1942.

AMERICAN COMMITTEE FOR PROTECTION OF FOREIGN BORN. For almost fifty years, the American Committee for Protection of Foreign Born (ACFPB) battled the federal government's attempts to deport and denaturalize foreign-born Americans. Founded in 1933, largely on the initiative of Roger Baldwin of the American Civil Liberties Union, the committee came to specialize in the defense of radical aliens. During periods of political repression, the organization's caseload increased, but even during the relatively liberal New Deal years the federal government was under pressure to crack down on the Left; and the ACPFB soon found itself defending Harry Bridges and some other Communist and left-wing labor leaders against deportation. The anticommunist furor of the McCarthy period in the late 1940s and early 1950s inundated the organization with business, especially since mainstream civil liberties organizations refused to defend Communists.

The organization was closely allied with the Communist Party and its conception of its mission drew heavily on the Party's theory of "labor defense," which required a two-pronged campaign to mobilize public opinion against political deportations as well as challenge them in the courts. The ACPFB's success, however, depended more on the overall political climate than it did on the organization's ability to win mass support or on the legal skills of its attorneys. In the early 1940s, during the high point of U.S.-Soviet friendship and tolerance for the Communist Party, the organization was able to win some important legal victories as well as attract the assistance of such eminently respectable Americans as Wendell Willkie, the Republican presidential candidate in 1940, who helped the organization litigate a successful Supreme Court case against the denaturalization of the California Communist leader William Schneiderman.

With the onset of the Cold War, the federal government began an intensive drive against foreign-born radicals. By the beginning of 1947, the Immigration and Naturalization Service had initiated deportation proceedings against more than a hundred people, many of whom it tried to detain without bail. The ACPFB handled most of these cases, litigating several of them all the way to the Supreme Court. The pace of deportation activity increased during the early 1950s with the passage of the McCarran Internal Security Act in 1950 and the McCarran-Walter Immigration Act in 1952. By 1953, Eisenhower's attorney general, Herbert Brownell, was threatening to deport ten thousand "subversive" aliens.

Though a few hundred foreign-born leftists did have to leave the country, most of the people threatened with deportation for political reasons were able to remain. The ACPFB handled many of their cases, though it is unclear how helpful the organization's efforts were. Until the late 1950s, the federal judiciary's reluctance to curb the government's anticommunist campaign meant that ACPFB attorneys were able to win few victories in the courts. Nonetheless, the slowness of the judicial process and the technicalities that the organization was able to exploit kept many otherwise deportable aliens in this country until changes in the political climate ended the danger.

The committee's activities as a mass-action organization were less successful. Its leaders, especially its executive secretary, Abner Green, and the heads of its Detroit and Los Angeles chapters, Saul Grossman and Rose Chernin, labored valiantly, lobbying against repressive legislation and organizing support groups for the people threatened with deportation. But because the organization was considered by the federal government and by those mainstream liberals who knew of its work to be a Communist front, it was never able to broaden the opposition to political deportations from its beleaguered enclave on the far Left.

In addition, the organization was severely handicapped in all its activities by official harassment. Individual leaders were called before congressional committees or were themselves threatened with deportation. Abner Green actually spent three months in Danbury Federal Penitentiary for refusing to give a federal grand jury a list of contributors to a bail fund for Communist Party leaders indicted under the Smith Act; and Rose Chernin had to fight off a Smith Act prosecution as well as an attempt to denaturalize her. The organization was harassed as well. Attorney General Tom Clark put it on his list of subversive organizations. The New York State attorney general revoked its status as a charitable organization, and in April 1953 Attorney General Brownell tried to make it register with the Subversive Activities Control Board as a "Communist-front organization." The ACPFB successfully fought the registration order, but the struggle lasted for thirteen years and severely drained the organization's resources.

Even so, the ACPFB did not fold. Though the pace of politically motivated deportations did begin to slacken by the late 1950s, there were still enough new cases as well as old ones to keep the ACPFB busy throughout the sixties. By the 1970s, however, the political deportations that had been the ACPFB's main concern had largely ended and the group shifted its focus to that of organizing opposition to sanctions against employers of illegal aliens. In 1982 it merged with the National Emergency Civil Liberties Committee and went out of business.

AMERICAN EXCEPTIONALISM. The notion of American exceptionalism is an old one with many meanings. In its strictest form, it refers to the apparent departure of the United States from certain assumed historical norms or laws of development. For one reason or another, so the notion goes, the United States has failed to produce ever-sharper antagonisms between capital and labor (as measured, most commonly, by the rise of a viable socialist movement). Hence, it appears that America is an exceptional historical case, quite different from other capitalist nations. The search for reasons why this is so has taken scholars and pundits in numerous directions, searching for the flaws (or, depending on the writer, the strengths) that are unique to American politics, culture, and social relations. As a result of these searches, observers have often diluted the concept of American exceptionalism to mean something closer to American distinctiveness, concerned with all the ways the United States is different from other countries.

In some respects, claims about American exceptionalism date back to the earliest days of European settlement on these shores—at least as far back as John Winthrop's famous remark to his fellow Puritans in 1630, that they would establish a "city upon a hill," a clear break from the corrupt world they had left behind. Through the age of revolution, travelers, colonists, and home-grown philosophes explored what was special about the North American continent and its inhabitants—inquiries that culminated in Crèvecoeur's Letters from an American Farmer and Jefferson's Notes on the State of Virginia. By the nineteenth century, America had come to loom large in the imaginations of European thinkers as different as Hegel and Tocqueville as some sort of exceptional image of the future. Americans, for their part, proudly proclaimed theirs a unique political society, freed from the shackles of Old World superstition and tyranny.

The coming of industrialism to the United States, the emergence of labor movements from the 1820s to the 1890s, and the demise of slavery forced observers to rethink some of these assumptions, in light of the passing of long-established regimes. Mainstream writers, while foreseeing the closing of the American frontier and the rapid growth of manufacturing, celebrated America's supposedly exceptional lack of fixed social classes and its opportunities for social mobility. American radicals, however, measured some of the new industrial realities against the legacy of the American Revolution, and found that the nation had departed in decisive ways from its highest ideals of personal independence. European radicals, meanwhile, tended to respond ambiguously to American events: while none could deny the liveliness of American labor movements, they also tended to believe that American workers were far more attached to bourgeois political and social ideals than their European counterparts—and therefore proved an "exceptional" kind of working class.

In this century, the notion of American exceptionalism has gathered enormous strength from writings all across the political spectrum. Conservative writers, sometimes mingling nostalgia with analysis, have kindled the ideal of America as a providential nation, set apart from the rest of the world as a bastion of freedom. Liberals have preferred to focus on economic growth and cultural pluralism as the keys to understanding American distinctiveness. Mostly, however, the modern discussion of exceptionalism has revolved around issues first raised on the Left.

The German socialist Werner Sombart's Why Is There No Socialism in the United States? (1906) became a classic statement of the problem. Sombart's answer to the question he posed—that American class-consciousness had been wrecked on "shoals of roast beef and apple pie"—reflected both the economism of the Second International and the German ascendancy within the international socialist movement. The émigré Selig Perlman, a product of the Russian social revolutionary movement, restated matters somewhat in A Theory of the Labor Movement (1928). Perlman stressed both the importance of political citizenship and the power of "pure-and-simple," "bread-and-butter" unionism as major factors undermining American working-class radicalism and assuring American exceptionalism. Somewhat later, the question reappeared in various dissident corners. Of special note were the writings of Leon Sampson, which argued that "Americanism" had become a kind of substitutive socialism for American workers. In a rather different vein, writers grouped around the anti-Stalin Bukharinite opposition of the 1930s—including Bertram Wolfe and Lewis Corey—wrote explicitly of "American exceptionalism" while drawing on Bukharin's general theory of exceptionalism.

Since the 1930s, what had once been a debating point for left-wing intellectuals has entered the mainstream of academic controversy. Young liberal historians and sociologists who had been influenced by the 1930s Left (notably Richard Hofstadter, Louis Hartz, Daniel Boorstin, and Seymour Martin Lipset) refashioned the exceptionalism idea in the 1950s in their explanations for the apparent overriding consensus in American political life. The more celebratory strain in this scholarship lives on today in the writings of historians like Boorstin, as one of the animating concepts behind academic neoconservatism.

The New Left of the 1960s and early 1970s, while arguing against the so-called consensus school, carried on with its own versions of the exceptionalism argument. While insisting that class divisions are central to American life, New Leftists also contended that one or another social or cultural factor (ethnicity, racism, party politics, mass culture) has effectively muffled working-class consciousness. Explanations for what various scholars called "the historical incorporation of the American working class" remained very much a part of New Left historical and sociological writing, whether couched in the Gramscian vocabulary of "hegemony," in borrowings from the Frankfurt School, or in some other idiom.

More recently, the entire concept has come under further scrutiny—and considerable attack. At the core of the exceptionalism problem, some scholars have argued, is a fallacious teleological assumption that the past and present ought to be judged against some preconceived notion of what ought to have happened. Continuing events in Europe and elsewhere have made the United States seem far less "exceptional" than ever before. The criteria for assessing normality—what C. Wright Mills once called a "labor metaphysic," which quickly turned into a socialist metaphysic—no longer appear as self-evident as they once did. Discarding their blinders, several historians have located a powerful, recurrent strain of American working-class consciousness, rooted in the very concepts of democratic equality that older historians misconstrued as "bourgeois." Without denying the obvious differences between the United States and other industrial capitalist countries—the heritage of slavery, the impact of mass immigration, the changing structure of American politics—historians, literary critics, and social scientists have begun looking at class relations and social development without judging them against some predetermined model of supposedly normative results.

Not that the idea of American exceptionalism has entirely disappeared. The picture of America as a shining city on a hill, standing virtually outside of history, retains a powerful cultural appeal. Plainly, the differences between characteristically American ideas and situations and those in other countries are open to comparative study. There are still some scholars and activists who think the exceptionalism question a useful entryway into larger problems of United States and world history. At the moment, however, the whole matter would seem to be more important as a myth that needs analysis than as a fixed historical reality requiring some global explanatory theory.

AMERICAN FUND FOR PUBLIC SERVICE.

Also known as the Garland Fund—after Charles Garland, the Harvard dropout whose inheritance (an eventual $2 million) provided the funding—the American Fund for Public Service was created for the express purpose of bringing about an end to capitalism. Founded in 1922, it operated primarily in the 1920s but continued to function until 1941. Roger Baldwin, the organizer of the fund, chose as board of directors fellow pacifists who had been radicalized by World War I repression and who desired to end war by eliminating capitalism, its perceived cause. Their instrument for this goal was the working class, which they sought to energize and educate by supporting militant labor activities. Board members were also civil libertarians, and many were affiliated with the American Civil Liberties Union, which had been founded by Baldwin in 1920.

Radical pacifist directors included Norman Thomas, Scott Nearing, Robert Morss Lovett, Judah Magnes, Harry F. Ward, Lewis Gannett, Mary McDowell, Freda Kirchwey, Robert Dunn, and Clarina Michelson. The workers' movements were represented through William Z. Foster, Elizabeth Gurley Flynn, Ben Gitlow, Sidney Hillman, Clinton Golden, and H. H. Broach. Morris Ernst, an attorney active in civil liberties causes, and James Weldon Johnson, leader of the National Association for the Advancement of Colored People (NAACP), also served as directors. They collectively represented the Left spectrum from Left-liberal to Communist.

The fund contributed to the defense and organizing activities of the Industrial Workers of the World; the left-wing Federated Press news service; strike relief to miners and to workers in the shoe, clothing, and textile industries; the organization of the Brotherhood of Sleeping Car Porters; institutes to encourage industrial unionization; workers' education to create class consciousness; publications of the American Federation of Labor as well as anarchist, Socialist, and Communist labor publications; anti-reactionary exposés; worker health and safety; research to challenge labor injunctions; and the initial NAACP research and campaign which ultimately led to Brown v. Board of Education in 1954, after the fund's liquidation. Legal defense expenses were paid for Passaic and Gastonia strikers; Communist defendants (including W. Z. Foster) following the government raid on a Bridgman, Michigan, meeting of the Party; Sacco and Vanzetti; Tom Mooney; Palmer Raid victims; the Scottsboro "boys"; and NAACP cases.

Communists received assistance for the Trade Union Educational League, Young Pioneers, the Daily Worker, farmers' and farm workers' unions, and the Workers' School. Socialist organizations including the League for Industrial Democracy, the Rand School, Pioneer Youth, and the Southern Tenant Farmers Union also received grants. New Masses started with fund aid, as did Vanguard Press, which published over one hundred leftist titles before it was sold to its manager in 1932.

The Depression reduced fund assets, and the 1939 Soviet-Nazi Non-Aggression Pact ended cooperative efforts by board members. The fund was liquidated one week before Germany's attack on the Soviet Union nullified the pact. By then, however, the fund and its directors had contributed to activities in support of A. Philip Randolph and his nascent civil rights movement, the NAACP's campaign to end de jure segregation; and workers' education programs that produced the cadre for organizing mass industries in the 1930s.

AMERICAN GUARDIAN. See Ameringer, Oscar.

AMERICAN INDIAN MOVEMENT. Resistance by American Indians had been localized and diffuse until the early 1960s, when struggles over fishing and hunting rights took place in Oklahoma, the Northwest, and other places in Indian country. At that time a new organization called the National Indian Youth Council (NIYC) was formed, primarily by disenfranchised children of the tribal chairmen who functioned as colonial puppets of the Bureau of Indian Affairs. NIYC was the first modern pan-Indian organization not controlled by the United States. The only other significant organization at this time was the Native American Church, whose membership was made up of traditional Indians, many of whom were spiritual leaders of their nations. These groups were limited in their potential, NIYC because of its essentially elitist base, and the Native American Church because of the isolation of its members.

In 1968 Indians who more often than not shared a history of prison and urban poverty formed the American Indian Movement (AIM) to fight for the rights of the Indian community in Minneapolis. The goals of AIM were to combat police brutality and improve opportunities for Indian people. The early leaders were Clyde Bellecourt and Dennis Banks. In 1969 AIM participated in the occupation of Alcatraz Island in San Francisco Bay, and by 1970 AIM had a national reputation among Indians. Most of its membership was composed of younger, alienated, urban Indians, unlike the college-educated NIYC members or the traditionals of the Native American Church. AIM's militant style, its willingness to go anywhere to support Indians in struggle, and the desperate conditions on reservations and in urban Indian communities made AIM attractive to a new generation of activists. Russell Means, Carter Camp, and John Trudell became leaders during this time.

With the "Trail of Broken Treaties" in 1972, a national caravan focusing on treaty rights that ended with the occupation of the Bureau of Indian Affairs in Washington, D.C., AIM became a force to be reckoned with. The U.S. government negotiated an agreement to end the occupation. Documents obtained by AIM during the occupation and later released showed widespread corruption and mismanagement within the BIA.

A year later at the village of Wounded Knee AIM seized worldwide attention when it supported traditional Oglala Sioux residents of Pine Ridge in their struggle against the dictatorial rule of the BIA-supported tribal chairman, Dick Wilson. During the seventy-one day siege Phantom jets, armored personnel carriers, federal marshals, and units from the Eighty-second Airborne Division were arrayed against Indians armed with shotguns and .22s, and the entire operation was directed from the basement of the Nixon White House.

AIM sponsored a conference on the Standing Rock Sioux Reservation in the summer of 1974 that drew thousands of Indians and established the International Indian Treaty Council (IITC) to work for international recognition of Indian treaty rights. By the end of that year the IITC had an office across the street from the United Nations and was pursuing support among Third World and nonaligned countries much as the Student Nonviolent Coordinating Committee had done a decade earlier.

In the years following Wounded Knee AIM organized in Indian communities throughout North America, ran survival schools where political economy was one of the subjects, and held conferences that featured speakers from the African National Congress and Zimbabwe African National Union. Despite these achievements, AIM never coalesced into a strong national organization.

Even at its height of popularity it remained a movement with no formal membership, accountability by its leaders, or clear political agenda. Wounded Knee earned AIM the support of perhaps most Indians in the United States, but the cost was high, as dozens of activists faced trial in Rapid City, Sioux Falls, Cedar Rapids, and Saint Paul over a two-year period. The trials drained most of the movement's resources and placed AIM in a defensive position.

At the same time repression against AIM increased, with activists facing harassment, surveillance, and frame-ups. An aide to AIM leader Dennis Banks whose title was director of security was revealed as an agent of the Federal Bureau of Investigation, a development that was indicative of the level of government infiltration AIM experienced. Political contradictions increased during this time as well, as some leaders adopted a spiritualist approach and denounced alliances with U.S. progressives, and others moderated their views and worked within tribal governments. By the late 1970s AIM ceased to be a major factor in Indian country, and existed only through the rhetoric of national leaders who pretended AIM was still viable and the existence of a few institutions such as the survival schools and the IITC.

AMERICAN LABOR PARTY. The important but short-lived American Labor Party (ALP) was founded in 1936 by an amalgam of hitherto Socialist Party-related trade unions and fraternal organizations. The primary purpose of the ALP's founders—David Dubinsky and Alex Rose—was to provide an electoral line where the traditionally Socialist-voting constituencies could comfortably vote for Franklin Delano Roosevelt. Running only Roosevelt and Herbert Lehman for the U.S. Senate, it achieved its goal: it provided 274,925 votes for Roosevelt, mostly from New York City's working-class Jewish neighborhoods and at the permanent expense of the Socialist Party.

The ALP forwarded a left-leaning non-socialist program. Its 1937 Declaration of Principles stipulated that there should be a "sufficient planned utilization of the natural economy so that coal, oil, timber, water, and other natural resources [that] belong to the American people . . . shall be protected from predatory interests." But in practice the ALP fought harder and louder for the New Deal program. Led by Vito Marcantonio, a radical New York City politician, the Communist-influenced wing had gained ascendancy by 1941, which ultimately caused the Social Democratic wing to exit in 1944 and form the Liberal Party. From 1941 until the ALP's demise, foreign policy issues and black rights became central. What most distinguished the ALP, however, was its open class bias: its name said "Labor" and it used the slogan "Don't Scab at the Ballot Box."

Although the ALP never fostered the national labor party some envisioned, it almost immediately outgrew the narrow confines of its origins in New York State. Its creation coincided with the rise of the Popular Front: New York State's Communist Party at once saw building the ALP as its major electoral priority. The ALP also proved critical to the electoral requirements of Fiorello La Guardia and Marcantonio, both of whom became registered members. In the New Deal era, their political identification as Republicans—regardless of how maverick they were—had become an insuperable obstacle.

In 1937 the ALP polled 482,790 mayoral votes for La Guardia, more than 21 percent of his vote. The new party also provided almost 45 percent of Marcantonio's votes for his 1938 reelection to Congress from East Harlem. Although its main political bases continued to be working-class Jewish neighborhoods (where on occasion its vote reached 50 percent), El Barrio, East Harlem's Puerto Rican community, was the only place where it became the majority party. After World War II, the ALP vote in the black communities exceeded citywide averages. In the nine elections between 1938 and 1949, citywide the ALP averaged 13 percent of the vote, from a low of 9.6 percent during the fractious period of the Soviet-German Nonintervention Pact to 19.2 percent for La Guardia's third mayoral election. Upstate in the six statewide elections contested between 1938 and 1948, the ALP averaged only 3.1 percent of the vote.

The ALP did not fully operate as an independent party. For the most part, it was a satellite party proffering endorsements to candidates of the Democratic Party and to Republicans considered sufficiently progressive. When the major parties forwarded unacceptable candidates, the ALP ran its own. The ALP did, however, win public office. Before the abolition of proportional representation in 1947 it had members on the New York City Council, on occasion it elected state assemblymen and senators, and in a special election in early 1948 it elected Leo Isaacson to Congress from the South Bronx. Without the ALP, La Guardia almost certainly would have been a one-term mayor. At a time when almost every major American city continued to be ruled by a political machine, the ALP allowed a progressive kind of municipal politics to endure in New York City.

But most critically, it provided margins of victory, and after the passage of the Wilson-Pakula Act in 1947 (which effectively abolished the open primary) an electoral line to Marcantonio. The ALP also provided him with its citywide human and financial resources. Furthermore, it traded endorsements so that at first the Republican and then the Democratic parties ran sham or weak candidates and campaigns. In 1948, for example, the ALP endorsed the Democratic Party candidates for the other three congressional seats in Manhattan and in most other state legislative contests. In return, the Democrats ran a lackluster candidate who ran a feeble campaign. Vito Marcantonio, the closest thing to a national spokesman for the Left during this period, was inconceivable without the ALP.

By presenting black and Hispanic candidates, the ALP forced the issue of minority political representation. The first Puerto Rican officeholder in the continental United States, Oscar García Rivera, was elected to the state assembly in 1937 from El Barrio with a majority of his votes garnered on the ALP line. The ALP also ran the first African American candidates for surrogate judge and borough president in Manhattan, forcing the Democratic Party to follow suit with their own African American candidates who became the first to be elected to those posts. The ALP also played a central role in enabling Adam Clayton Powell to become New York City's first African American city councilman in 1941. Most critically, the ALP gave the Left's trade union and organizational work an electoral focus. In part, this accounts for Henry Wallace in 1948 having received one-half his vote in New York, where he ran on the ALP line.

In the postwar period, the press increasingly identified the ALP as "Communist dominated" or "Communist led." Registered ALP voters received solicitations asking them to disavow their connections with a Communist front. The trade union and fraternal organizations that provided the backing for the party were being dismantled. The ALP's voter registration fell by one-half between 1948 and 1950. Nonetheless, Marcantonio conducted a remarkable campaign in 1949 as its mayoral candidate. The party's percentage of the vote actually increased over 1948, and great gains were registered in black-populated areas. Marcantonio's defeat in 1950 to a coalition candidate of the Democratic, Republican, and Liberal parties, however, took much of what remained out of the ALP. By 1953, the Communist Party concluded that fascism was imminent and the ALP simply served to expose its cadre to further legal jeopardy. Acrimoniously disagreeing, a loyal group around Marcantonio persisted. Unable to convince the Communist Party to remain, he resigned in 1953, a year before his death. The ALP ceased running candidates after 1954, when its candidate for governor polled three thousand votes fewer than the fifty thousand necessary to maintain ballot status. In 1956, at the dawn of a historic revival of the American Left, the ALP officially dissolved.

AMERICAN LEAGUE AGAINST WAR AND FASCISM.

The League was formed at a U.S. Congress against War held in New York City in the fall of 1933, and attended by over twenty-six hundred delegates from trade unions and women's, farm, religious, and political organizations. They gathered in response to a call signed by three widely read authors of the time—Sherwood Anderson, Theodore Dreiser, and Upton Sinclair—following an international antiwar congress in Amsterdam in August 1932. It became one of forty-three national committees of a World Committee against War and Fascism centered in Paris and headed by Lord Robert Cecil of Great Britain and Pierre Cot, a prominent French Socialist.

The Japanese invasion of northern China, Hitler's rise to power in Germany at the beginning of 1933, and maneuvers of the Western powers, including the United States, to use international disarmament conferences as screens behind which each participant sought to promote its own military superiority were seen by the Amsterdam and New York meetings as signs of an impending world war that only mass action by all peoples might derail. Since the Nazis had built their movement around the goal of destroying "Bolshevism" within Germany and internationally with at least the tacit approval of the other capitalist powers, the first League program warned that the immediate danger of war proceeded from Western determination to overthrow the sixteen-year-old Soviet government.

In addition, the founding program called on the people "to oppose the policies of American imperialism in the Far East, in Latin America, especially in Cuba" (where thirty U.S. warships were then stationed as threats to the revolutionary movement for democracy). While the initial program reflected the influence of the Communist Party, the need for a coalition that went far beyond traditional peace organizations and left-wing political parties was widely accepted. The rise of an antiwar movement in which Communists were conspicuous participants paralleled what was happening in the anti-Depression activities that led to the passage of unemployment insurance and social security, the rise of the industrial union movement and the founding of the Congress of Industrial Organizations, and the creation of a united student movement, the American Student Union, out of the Socialist-led Student League for Industrial Democracy and the Communist-led National Student League.

Among those who addressed the founding congress of the new League were Devere Allen, editor of the pacifist World Tomorrow; the feminist leader Harriot Stanton Blatch; Communist Party general secretary Earl Browder; National Association for the Advancement of Colored People field secretary William Pickens; American Federation of Hosiery Workers president Emil Rieve; A. J. Muste, head of the Conference for Progressive Labor Action; and Professor Reinhold Niebuhr of Union Theological Seminary. Support by adherents of the Socialist Party was reflected in sponsorship of the League by the Norman Thomas-led League for Industrial Democracy and the naming of J. B. Matthews, a prominent Socialist Party member, as first national chairman. When Dr. Harry F. Ward—professor of Christian ethics at Union Theological Seminary and author of In Place of Profit, based on his sabbatical year in the Soviet Union—replaced Matthews after the latter's resignation some months later, the League began attracting extensive support among Protestant and Jewish religious leaders and organizations.

Besides seeking affiliation of existing organizations that approved of its policies and activities, the League built citywide membership groups through which it conducted such activities as promoting a boycott of Japanese consumer goods, halting the sale of war materials to Japan, and providing assistance to the Spanish Republic and opposition to anti-democratic legislative probes and legislation. Its efforts to bring together trade unionists and members of the largely middle-class peace organizations was reflected in those membership groups as well as in the speakers who addressed its national congresses and wrote for its monthly publication, Fight against War and Fascism, or Fight, as it was generally referred to. These included Congress of Industrial Organizations president John L. Lewis, American Newspaper Guild founder and president Heywood Broun, and A. J. Whitney, president of the Brotherhood of Railway Trainmen. Leading artists including William Gropper, John Groth, Harry Sternberg, Art Young, and Moses Soyner were regular contributors to the magazine, as were prominent American and foreign authors.

Pioneers in understanding that special efforts had to be made to bring young people into the peace movement, the League's founders set up a youth section to do so. This section began its existence by organizing a campaign against proposals to turn the Civilian Conservation Corps, set up early in the Roosevelt administration to provide work for unemployed youth, into military training camps. Despite widespread political and press support for this diversion, it failed. The Youth Section worked against military training in the schools and sent delegates to World Youth Congresses in Geneva in 1936 and at Vassar College in 1938 and participated in student antiwar strikes. The broad constituency the League appealed to was reflected in its organizational structure, which included trade union, women's, and religious committees on national and local levels.

The organization's name was changed to American League for Peace and Democracy in 1936 to emphasize its commitment to "protect and extend democratic rights for all sections of the American people," with special emphasis on defending trade unions from corporate and legislative assault and winning passage of an antilynching law. With the outbreak of war in Europe in the fall of 1939, the American League for Peace and Democracy had lost its reason for existence and folded soon after. Before its end, the organization registered support of over four million people at its annual congresses.

AMERICAN LEAGUE FOR PEACE AND DEMOCRACY. See American League against War and Fascism.

AMERICAN NEGRO LABOR CONGRESS. Formed in Chicago in October 1925 under the auspices of the American Communist Party and the Trade Union Educational League, also a Party organization, the American Negro Labor Congress (ANLC) in effect replaced earlier attempts by the Party to organize black laborers along what might be termed (for lack of space), "Left Pan-Africanist" lines into the African Blood Brotherhood. According to its constitution, the stated goals of the ANLC were to unify the efforts . . . of all the organizations of Negro workers and farmers . . . as well as organizations composed of both Negro and white workers and farmers . . . for the abolition of all discrimination, persecution and exploitation of the Negro race and working people generally; . . . to bring the Negro working people into the trade unions and the general labor movement with the white workers; . . . to remove all bars and discrimination against Negroes and other races in the trade unions; . . . and to aid the general liberation of the darker races and the working people throughout all countries.

The first congress convened on 25 October at the Metropolitan Community Center on Chicago's South Side, under the leadership of Lovett Fort-Whiteman, national organizer; H. V. Phillips, national secretary; and organizing committee members Edward Doty and Harry Haywood. Haywood reported that, although he estimated the opening-night crowd to be around five hundred people, the majority of these were from the surrounding community; the following morning, only forty or so delegates participated in the actual work of the congress. Not too surprisingly, there were no farmer-delegates. Robert Minor claimed that black federal union members of the American Federation of Labor had been scared off by the anticommunist baiting of federation president William Green in the press.

Viewed from a historical perspective, the organizational plan of the ANLC proposed by the October conference is familiar enough: it called for the formation of "united fronts"—dubbed "local councils"—in all centers of black population, with special emphasis on the role played by labor unions. Organizations composed of black and white workers were to be admitted, as were unorganized black workers. "Local councils" were not to compete with existing black or labor organizations, but rather were to help coordinate the work of such bodies. And finally, the councils were to facilitate the admission of black workers into existing trade unions by forming "interracial labor committees," the ultimate purpose of which was to halt practices that divided white and black laborers and to support those that united them: the elimination of trade union discrimination and the undercutting of wages, struggles against lynching and race riots, and the like.

The inauspicious beginnings of the ANLC set the tone for its future work: "Few local units were formed," wrote Haywood, "resolutions and plans were never carried into action. Only its official paper, the Negro Champion, subsidized by the Party, continued [sporadically] for several years." The principal and perhaps only center of "effective" organizing appears to have been Chicago, whose "local council" included some fifty members at the end of 1925. Attempts were made to organize workers as far away as Jamaica, British West Indies, but efforts failed there as well. The ANLC lasted until 1930, and was succeeded by the National Negro Labor Congress the following year.

AMERICAN REVOLUTION. For the Left, the American Revolution has always been problematic. Unquestionably, it opened a new phase of bourgeois republican transformation. It pulsates with upheaval and confrontation, from the Boston shoemaker Ebenezer MacIntosh leading the first Stamp Act protests of 1765 to the farmers' rebellion of 1786 named for his fellow Yankee Daniel Shays. But the Revolution also frustrates. Dr. Samuel Johnson of London posed part of problem with his acid quip of 1776: "How is it that we hear the loudest yelps for liberty among the drivers of Negroes?"

Writing in 1814, Lord Byron caught another dimension of what the Revolution meant. Byron's bitter Ode to Bonaparte bemoaned Napoleon's betrayal of the French Revolution and mocked the emperor's fall. In the last verse, Byron asked where a person could turn for inspiration. He found it in "the first, the last, the best, the Cincinnatus of the West," who "bequeathed the name of Washington—to make men blush there was one but one." That the American Revolution did create an enduring republic, and that the Revolution's greatest military hero did not subvert the republic should not be denigrated. Yet between them these two great figures of English letters, Johnson and Byron, posed the question American radicals have faced ever since—whether to praise the Revolution's achievements and seek inclusion in "the blessings of liberty" that the Federal Constitution promises to secure, or condemn the whole American enterprise for its shortcomings and its outright failures.

Popular hagiography still presents the revolutionaries as bewigged gentlemen in frock coats and knee breeches. But Ebenezer MacIntosh would not have been out of place among Parisian sans-culottes three decades later. In his personality and outlook, the always-political Samuel Adams bears more than a passing resemblance to Robespierre, Trotsky, or Nelson Mandela. The Sons of Liberty, who coordinated direct resistance during the decade-long crisis with Britain, were a genuine popular leadership and seem much like a modern revolutionary party. Anti-monarchical ideas that reached back to Cromwellian England came to the surface during the crisis, especially in New England. Republican thinking inherited elements not only from the English Revolution but also from Renaissance Italy and the ancient world permeated elite culture. On all these counts, participation, leadership, and ideology, we see an event that clearly belongs among the world's great revolutions.

Yet the right-wing interpretation that this was a revolution to conserve has its truth. Nobody, not even Samuel Adams, intended beforehand for the Revolution to happen. It began as simply an ancien régime revolt against unwanted change. Britain, not the colonies, was on the advance. In 1763 the British Empire spread from the Ganges to the Mississippi. Britain itself was well embarked on capitalist transformation. British rulers asserted power a French or Spanish monarch might envy, except that it belonged to the king-in-parliament, not the king alone.

Those rulers' argument after 1763 was that Americans were just as much British subjects as anybody in England, Scotland, Ireland, or Wales. White colonists agreed; the problem was what being a British subject meant. Red, white, or black, everybody east of the Mississippi lived in a world that was premised on human inequality and organized beneath the British crown. Slaves, servants, younger sons, or women might dislike their place in that world. Indians believed that they belonged to it as associates, not subordinates. For all, however, the colonial order did make sense.

Whoever accepted the old order's obligation of obedience also had to claim to some superior's protection. Individuals and social groups enjoyed "liberties," meaning specific privileges that went with their own situations. Such liberties—the House of Burgesses' right to rule Virginians, the College of William and Mary's right to a burgess of its own, New York City's control of its public markets, the right of property-holding individuals to give consent if they were to be taxed, the right of a white person to hold a black one in slavery—were what white colonial males set out to protect against absolute British power.

If the king-in-parliament had recognized those liberties at the first sign of revolt, there would have been no revolution. Revolt became revolution after a decade of dithering, when Britain changed from merely asserting its power over the colonials to an attempt at military suppression of their resistance. That had worked at the Battle of the Boyne in Ireland in 1690 and at Culloden in Scotland in 1746. Retaining the fruits of those victories was one reason why Parliament could not back down now. But the colonies were too far away to send an adequate force. Their people were too dispersed and too well organized for whatever force Britain did send to work.

British power and colonial institutions collapsed between 1774 and 1776. So did the authority of previously accepted rulers, if they chose the British side or tried to stay neutral. American spokesmen, most notably the elite writer Thomas Jefferson and the plebeian Thomas Paine, shifted the terms of argument from defending British liberties to asserting that the issue was human liberty. Both Jefferson and Paine demonstrated how little they had thought the issue through. "Male and female are the distinctions of nature," Paine wrote in Common Sense (1776). What was natural could not be changed. For his part, Jefferson tried to blame slavery on the hapless George III. It was a ludicrous, ill-written charge, and Congress dropped it from the Declaration of Independence. But Jefferson's fevered prose suggests how much slavery was starting to bother his epoch. Samuel Johnson's gibe about "the drivers of Negroes" stung because Jefferson and his like had laid themselves open to it.

The independence crisis took the political Revolution into its most radical phase. Popular committees put power into the hands of artisans and small farmers, Paine's kind of people. The astute conservative patriot Gouverneur Morris noted "with fear and trembling" in 1774 that the "poor reptiles" of "the mob" were beginning "to think and to reason." He was correct: popular ideas about simple, directly responsive government were percolating. After independence these ideas reached institutional form in several state constitutions. But Morris only saw part of the issue.

Breaking the existing structure of power opened challenges to the whole social order. The British offered freedom to slaves, if they had belonged to rebels, and thousands grasped the chance. It marked the first great break in the American monolith of racial oppression. Other black people challenged the revolutionaries with their own rhetoric, and some whites responded. South of Pennsylvania, the challenge was strong but it ultimately failed. But Vermont's immediate abolition of slavery in 1777, Pennsylvania's start toward slow emancipation three years later, and total abolition in Massachusetts in 1783 were signs that the whole institution of slavery was beginning to break up, not just in the United States but in the world.

In the summer of 1776 Abigail Adams of Massachusetts advised her famous husband John to "remember the ladies" as he helped frame the new order. About the same time Mary Hay Burn of New Jersey was asking her very obscure husband, also named John, why she "should not have liberty whilst you strive for liberty." A year later the Cherokee spokesman Old Tassel reminded white Carolinians that the whole dispute between Britain and its white colonists was about Indian land. Few black, female, or Indian people got what they wanted from the Revolution, but that is not the point. Together, their voices helped transform an agenda that turned on being a British subject into one that turned on belonging to a people claiming that it valued equal liberty, even if that people consistently failed to live up to the claim.

By the Revolution's end, an American people did exist where there had been none before. Ideologically, that people was relocating ultimate power from above society to within itself. Institutionally, it had given itself powerful institutions for exercising its will. White Americans were now imperial, "lords and proprietors of a vast tract of continent" (in George Washington's phrase of 1783). Those same white Americans were well on their way to full capitalism, producing and trading within a large market economy where local needs counted less than the stability and predictability that big business required.

Shays's Rebellion in 1786, the more extreme forms of Antifederalism in 1787 and 1788, and the Pennsylvania Whiskey Rebellion in 1794 gave ample evidence that by no means did all white males accept the last change, toward market capitalism. Shaysite farmers revolted when their own sense of what the Revolution had won came into direct conflict with the demands of a hard money economy and long-distance credit. Faced with tax demands and debts that had to be paid in specie and whose collection was firmly enforced by the government in Boston, they understood that going to court would mean a sheriff's sale and perhaps tenancy on land they once had owned. They tried to protect themselves with petitions and town meetings, and when these failed they turned to an uprising in order to close the courts and stave off sales. It was the same means they had used against the punishments Britain imposed on Massachusetts in 1774 for the Boston Tea party. Then, they had enjoyed Boston's cooperation, even leadership. Now they did not. A state army under one of Washington's former generals easily put the rebellion down early in 1787. Later that same year the federal Constitution's supremacy clause, interstate commerce clause, and denial to states of any power to interfere in obligations of contract established that Boston's position in the dispute, not the Shaysites', would be national policy.

Small communities defending their own ways against powerful outsiders still present a powerful theme in American public iconography. But like most public themes, the image is deeply ambiguous. It has justified resistance against faceless corporations. It also has justified slavery and the exclusion of whoever might differ from what the small community happens to think is right. Equally ambiguous, and cutting considerably deeper into the fabric of an American society that has always been multiracial, is the Revolution's still-unresolved significance for the problem of how such a society might conduct itself. Perhaps, however, that very ambiguity remains the Revolution's strength.

AMERICAN SLAV CONGRESS. Organizers of the American Slav Congress (ASC) sometimes traced its origins to a Pittsburgh conference in December 1938 at which four hundred representatives of Slavic organizations in Pennsylvania, West Virginia, and Ohio condemned the recent Munich Accords and laid plans for a new organization to mobilize anti-Hitler protest. However, little evidence exists for any organizing activity from 1939 to 1941 while the Hitler-Stalin Pact was in effect. Soon after the Nazi attack on the Soviet Union in June 1941, the plan was revived and an organizational meeting was held on 7 December 1941 in Detroit with Attorney General Francis Biddle as a keynote speaker. With the United States' entry into the war, labor activists of East European origin supported the idea of an organization to mobilize mass support for the war effort as a whole and for the American-Soviet alliance in particular. They realized that Slavic Americans represented the vast majority of workers in key defense industries such as coal, steel, auto, electrical equipment, and rubber, yet many Slavic groups were torn by dissension over the issue of Soviet claims to certain territories in Eastern Europe and were separated by interethnic conflicts.

The first congress was held in Detroit on 25 April 1942, attended by 2,458 official delegates and over five hundred guests. Prior to this meeting, the Polish Section of the International Workers Order had sponsored a three-month lecture tour by two Polish organizers for the Congress of Industrial Organizations—Stanley Nowak and Boleslaw ("Billy") Gebert—to raise interest in the proposed organization. Twelve ethnic groups sent representatives to the first congress: Bulgarians, Carpatho-Ruthenians, Croatians, Czechs, Macedonians, Montenegrins, Poles, Russians, Serbs, Slovaks, Slovenians, and Ukrainians. The delegates elected Leo Krzycki (vice president of the Amalgamated Clothing Workers of America) president of the ASC and Blair Gunther (a Pittsburgh judge active with the Polish National Alliance, the largest Polish American fraternal) chair. George Pirinsky, a Macedonian, was chosen executive secretary. The convention adopted the slogan "Unity, Production, Speed" and concluded with a victory rally at the State Fair Coliseum at which Paul McNutt, chief of the new War Manpower Commission, spoke.

The first ASC platform called for member organizations to organize war-bond drives, Russian war relief, anti-Nazi propaganda, and demonstrations supporting the Roosevelt administration's alliance with the Soviet Union. On the first anniversary of the Nazi invasion of the Soviet Union, Slavic unity demonstrations were held in sixty-eight cities; the largest, filling Chicago's Soldier Field, commemorated the victory of Polish-Lithuanian forces over the Teutonic Knights in June 1410. The ASC also sponsored radio programs in Slavic languages and published, in English, the Slavic American.

In his memoirs, Boleslaw Gebert, the secretary of the Polish Bureau of the Communist Party, USA, for many years, insisted that although Communists were a minority among officials of the Congress, they were its "motor and driving force." Gebert himself was one of the most experienced organizers in the ASC.

George Pirinsky, also a Party member, served as executive secretary from its inception until 1951.

Although the 1942 congress succeeded in attracting the interest of a broad spectrum of Slavic American fraternal as well as Roman Catholic clergy, by the second congress in Pittsburgh in September 1944, many of those organizations and individuals (including Blair Gunther) had abandoned the ASC. Controversy surrounding visits by the University of Chicago economist Oskar Lange and a Roman Catholic priest, Rev. Stanislaus Orlemanski (both prominent supporters of the ASC), with Stalin in the spring of 1944 had contributed to the decline of the ASC's influence. By 1944 ad hoc leftist organizations created by the founders of the ASC predominated, for example the Kosciuszko Patriotic League (established 1943), the American Polish Labor Council (established 1944), and the United Committee of South Slavic Americans, a pro-Tito coalition organized in 1943 by Louis Adamic, the Slovenian writer, and Zlatko Balokovic, the Croatian violinist and vice-president of the ASC.

Delegations from Bulgaria, Czechoslovakia, and the Soviet Union and Slavic representatives from Mexico and Canada attended the third congress in Pittsburgh in September 1946. A simultaneous mass rally in Madison Square Garden publicized the congress slogan: "Restore Roosevelt's Peace Policy—Maintain Big Three Unity." Henry Wallace addressed the fourth and last congress in Chicago in September 1948 and ASC members promoted his presidential campaign.

As the ASC shifted its focus to supporting pro-Soviet governments in Eastern Europe and protesting the Cold War policies of the Truman administration, it faced increasing pressure. As early as 1946, the Justice Department demanded that performing artists invited from Eastern Europe by the ASC register as foreign agents. By 1947, officers of International Workers Order lodges and other ethnic organizations still friendly to the ASC were being subpoenaed to testify before congressional committees. Some faced deportation proceedings. Foreign language newspapers and radio programs which carried ASC news were forced to close offices. In 1948, the attorney general put the ASC on the list of enemy organizations and George Pirinsky, still executive secretary, was arrested. Leo Krzycki resigned as president in 1950, and with Pirinsky's deportation to Bulgaria in 1951, the ASC disbanded.

AMERICAN-SOVIET FRIENDSHIP. Following the Russian Revolution of 1917, American peace activists, labor organizers, and intellectuals sympathetic to socialism formed a succession of organizations to promote cultural interchange between the Soviet Union and the United States in order to enhance popular understanding of and sympathy for the Soviet Union and to influence official U.S. policy favorably toward the Soviet Union.

The earliest of these was the Friends of Soviet Russia. Formed in 1921 to help the Soviets combat widespread famine resulting from drought and foreign blockade, this organization raised relief, sent tractors, and established children's homes. Between 1924 and 1929 there was a lull in its activities.

Two events catalyzed a new friendship effort. In November 1927 delegates from fifty-one countries including the United States attended a labor congress in Moscow organized to form a world labor league of "Friends of Soviet Russia," whose purpose would be to defend the Soviet Union against an anticipated rhetorical and possibly military attack by united capitalist powers. Then, in 1929, a group of Russian air-men billed as the Soviet Round-the-World Fliers visited the United States. Shortly thereafter, Friends of Soviet Russia was reorganized as the Friends of the Soviet Union (FSU) to follow the aims of the 1927 labor congress. The American Friends of the Soviet Union affiliated itself with similar groups in twenty different countries and with the International Friends of the Soviet Union, headquartered first in Berlin and later, after Hitler expelled it, in Amsterdam. Its first campaign organized mass receptions for the visiting Soviet fliers.

The stated goals of the FSU were (1) to mobilize the masses for militant action against war and in defense of the Soviet state through meetings and organization of FSU Anti-War Committees in all basic industries, (2) to encourage normal trade relations with the Soviet Union, and (3) to popularize the successes of socialism in the Soviet Union through lectures, pamphlets, leaflets, films, and magazines. While the organization saw itself as having a base in the working class, it saw intellectuals and professionals as having an important role in cultural activities.

The Friends sponsored a broad program of activities. Since collectivization of agriculture was just beginning in the Soviet Union, the group raised funds for the purchase of tractors to be sent as a present to the first collective farms. The FSU also sponsored trips by delegations of trade unionists to study the conditions of workers in the Soviet Union, and held mass-action rallies. Its principal publication was Soviet Russia Today, an illustrated monthly first published in February 1931, which contained articles about the Soviet economy, political administration, life, and culture. (This magazine severed relations with the FSU in December 1937, became New World Review in the 1950s, and ceased publication in 1986 as Update/USSR).

In the 1930s the FSU was quite radical, holding mass meetings where speakers denounced religion, advocated defense of the Soviet Union, and urged preparation for class war. Speakers included William Z. Foster and James Ford, former Communist candidates for president and vice president, respectively, and Charles Smith, president of the American Association for the Advancement of Atheism. After 1934, however, meetings became more moderate in tone. To mark the twentieth anniversary of the Russian Revolution, the FSU prepared a Golden Book of American Friendship with the Soviet Union, published in November 1937. Thereafter, the organization was largely inactive, becoming defunct in 1939.

In July 1938 Mary Van Kleeck, associate director of the International Industrial Relations Institute, chaired a dinner conference on Soviet progress at which announcement was made of the formation of a new American council on Soviet relations, whose purpose would be to direct a program to encourage American-Soviet relations. There was some continuity of participation from the Friends organizations to the new council, notably including author and lecturer Corliss Lamont, who had been involved in the previous groups and was an organizer—and in 1941 became national chair—of the new group.

The National Council on Soviet Relations brought together largely professional people desiring to increase understanding of the USSR in the United States and believing that, in the struggle against fascism, American interests coincided with those of the Soviet Union. In response to the German invasion of the Soviet Union in 1941, the council organized a mass meeting in Madison Square Garden in July to promote American-Soviet cooperation against Hitler, and, later that year, another rally to publicize the need for prompt American military aid to the Soviet Union. After the United States entered the war, the council advocated a second front in Europe and a declaration of war against Finland.

In November 1942 the council sponsored a Congress of American-Soviet Friendship at Madison Square Garden that was attended by several thousand people. It featured addresses by Vice President Henry Wallace and the presidents of the American Federation of Labor and the United Auto Workers, and messages of greeting and support from President Franklin D. Roosevelt and General Dwight D. Eisenhower. Mayor Fiorello La Guardia declared 8 November 1942 "Stalingrad Day" in New York. Corresponding meetings were held simultaneously in several other U.S. cities.

The success of the congress affirmed the notion that American-Soviet cooperation was important to the maintenance of world peace and corresponded to American policy and interest. The official sanction of the cause of American-Soviet friendship inspired the leadership of the council to establish a permanent organization, and the National Council of American-Soviet Friendship was incorporated a few months later. The five incorporators included the chair of the congress, Corliss Lamont, Dr. Harry Grundfest, Rev. William Howard Melish, George Marshall, and William Morris, Jr.

Local affiliates sprang up quickly. Some were independently formed language and cultural groups, while others were more political; still others had their origins in local Russian War Relief committees, many of which re-formed as local Councils of American-Soviet Friendship when President Truman cut off aid to Soviet Union in August 1945. By the mid-forties, there were thirty-two active council affiliates across the country.

Three deserve particular mention. In Chicago, leaders of three local organizations—the FSU, the Chicago Forum on Russian Affairs, and Russian War Relief—established a Chicago Society for American-Soviet Relations early in 1943, which affiliated with the National Council and changed its name to the Chicago Council of American-Soviet Friendship later the same year. A Los Angeles Society for Cultural Relations between the United States and the Soviet Union, founded in 1939, and the American-Russian Institute of San Francisco, founded in 1931, similarly affiliated with the National Council around 1943. These three groups, along with the National Council itself, are apparently the only Soviet friendship organizations to have survived from World War II to the present time.

The program of the National Council of American-Soviet Friendship emphasized cultural interchange as a means of strengthening bonds of understanding between the United States and the Soviet Union. The council sought to counteract negative propaganda about the Soviet Union by means of a broad spectrum of public-information activities. These included annual mass rallies, usually in Madison Square Garden in November, in celebration of anniversaries of the Russian Revolution; the publication of numerous pamphlets such as Women in the Soviet Union and The Voice of American-Soviet Friendship; and sponsorship of study tours to the Soviet Union and speakers' tours around the United States. Pictorial exhibits focusing on various aspects of Soviet life and culture were also developed for public view; the most significant of these was the "American-Soviet War Exhibit," shown at the Museum of Science and Industry in New York City in 1943 with the active cooperation of the War Department and the Lend-Lease Administration.

Although the National Council enjoyed widespread support from government officials and business and labor leaders during the early forties under the chairmanship of Corliss Lamont (1943–1946), groups such as the America First Committee, Committee to Defend America, Fight for Freedom, Incorporated, and the Friends of Democracy denounced the council from the outset as the "Voice of Stalin in America." After the war, a radical shift in American foreign policy toward the Soviet Union and the growing hostility of the Cold War brought the organization under increasing attack. The Truman administration moved from its earlier position of support for the National Council to an attitude of outright opposition, and in 1946 the House Committee on Un-American Activities began a formal investigation of its activities. The initial phase of this investigation resulted in the committee's demanding the surrender of all correspondence and financial records of the organization. The council refused on constitutional grounds, and both the council's chair, Corliss Lamont, and its executive director, Richard Morford, were cited for contempt of Congress. The National Council was officially placed on Attorney General Tom Clark's list of subversive organizations proscribed for federal employees in 1947, and in 1954 the Subversive Activities Control Board declared the council to be a Communist front organization.

Much of the energy of the council and its active members during the ensuing decade and a half was absorbed in suits and appeals associated with these actions. Morford was convicted of contempt of Congress in 1950 and served three months in Manhattan's West Street Jail. In 1951, however, the U.S. Supreme Court ruled that the U.S. attorney general had acted in a capricious, arbitrary, and illegal fashion in designating the National Council a subversive organization, and in 1963 the Second District Court of Appeals overturned the council's designation as a Communist front.

In the Cold War atmosphere of the fifties and sixties, public interest in and support for the council declined sharply and the number of local affiliates shrank to three, from a high of thirty-two. Monetary support dwindled similarly. Nonetheless, under the successive chairmanships of Dr. John Kingsbury (1949–1956) and artist Rockwell Kent (1957–1971), the council continued to pursue a program of public information activities aimed at fostering greater cultural understanding between the Soviet and American peoples and closer cooperation between their governments. Rallies and festivals of Soviet Friendship were held periodically, and the council's Committee of Women was one of fourteen cooperating organizations that sponsored an International Women's Exposition for Peace and Friendship in 1952. The council sponsored regular study tours to the Soviet Union and maintained a lending library of literature as well as more than sixty different photographic exhibits of aspects of Soviet life. Other projects included art exhibits, Soviet film festivals, a speakers' bureau, forums, and rallies. During this time the council also actively supported the broader-based U.S. movements for disarmament and a nuclear test ban, and worked against the McCarran-Walter and Smith acts.

A new period of growth for the council began in the early seventies, partly as a consequence of the official abolition of the subversive organizations list. Under successive chairmanships of William Howard Melish (1971–1978), Ewart Guinier (1979–1984), John Cherveney (1985–1987), and actor John Randolph (1988–), twenty-four new local affiliates were formed, making a total of twenty-seven by 1988. The first national convention was held in 1977, and the governing structure was reorganized to provide for more local participation and control. In January 1981 Alan Thomson became the new executive director, replacing Richard Morford, who had served in that capacity continuously for thirty-four years.

The Council's programs included an American-Soviet exchange of teenage youth, in cooperation with the Soviet organization Sputnik; sponsorship of young Americans at Artek, a Soviet youth camp on the Black Sea; a speakers' program, sponsoring lecture tours of Soviet students and professionals at U.S. colleges; and maintenance of a lending library that made available an extensive collection of publications and films to Russian studies programs in the United States.

Improvement in official U.S. relations with the Soviet Union also fostered the creation of other American groups interested in American-Soviet friendship. These represented a very diverse range of endeavors; exemplary were Anniversary Tours, founded by Lem Harris in the early seventies, which specialized in package tours to the Soviet Union; Promoting Enduring Peace, established in Connecticut by Jerome Davis in the late 1970s, which sponsored a Volga Peace Cruise and a Mississippi Peace Cruise in alternating years for joint groups of Soviet and American citizens; and Soviet American Woolens in Kezar Falls, Maine, founded by Marty Tracy and Peter Hagerty, which sold blended skeins of Soviet and American wool marketed as Peace-Fleece through American church and community groups.

The dissolution of the Soviet Union in 1989 suspended many of the friendship and exchange programs that had flowered in the environment of détente. Most of the individuals involved remain active in peace and justice activities, however, often in association with United Nations-related groups.

The National Council of American Soviet Friendship survived the Soviet break-up. In 1993 the council formally changed its name to the U.S. Council for International Friendship and adopted a new statement of purpose advocating peaceful relations between the United States and all nations, specifically including the republics of the former Soviet Union. None of the Friendship Societies previously affiliated with the council remain active in any of the former Soviet republics, however.

The U.S. Council supports friendship with nations whose political systems differ from that of the United States, and especially with nations whose citizens are guaranteed economic, political, and cultural rights. Its program calls for international arms reduction, the establishment of trade relations, and exchanges in science as vehicles for the establishment of world peace. The council is currently focusing its attention on fostering international exchanges of trade union representatives. There are ten active local councils across the United States affiliated with the U.S. Council.

AMERICAN STUDENT UNION. See Student Movements, 1930s.

AMERICAN STUDIES. In most eras of the Left, U.S. history has served as the predominant form of political-scholarly popularization. For the New Left phase of the 1960s–1970s it became the most prestigious form of intellectual expression. The radical interpretations of history have, however, varied enormously era by era.

Left history of the United States began with the somewhat educated newspaper editor/lecturer/political leader seeking to explain current events against the background of American history. From American socialism's earliest days, opinion sharply divided on the history of the Republic. Had American history, from at least the Revolution onward, been acted out as a class drama in deceptively "democratic" packaging? Or alternatively, had the great advances of American democracy been made but subsequently squandered by the consolidation of a class system? Neither immigrant nor native-born socialists had a monopoly on the alternative interpretations, although immigrants leaned toward the former and native-born toward the latter.

The Socialist Party, shortly after the turn of the century, provided encouragement for book-length efforts. Algie M. Simons, who studied with Frederick Jackson Turner, wrote the most popular scholarly study, Social Forces in American History (1911), said to have been used in some four thousand local socialist study classes. Oscar Ameringer's wry Life and Deeds of Uncle Sam (1909), translated into some fifteen languages, reached a readership of a half-million. These two works, along with the first socialist history of American labor, James Oneal's Workers in American History (which grew, similarly, from an agitational newspaper series), leaned heavily upon the muck-raking Progressive historians of the era, above all Charles Beard. Gustavus Myers's Great American Fortunes (1910), which most successfully survived into the next period, summed up the message: "History, in the main, thus far, has been an institution for the propagation of lies. . . . Since the private property system came into existence, an incessant, uncompromising warfare has been going on between oppressors and oppressed."

of the Communist Party's Lithuanian daily, thus gathered The History of the American Working Class (1928) almost directly from the old socialist material, with a sprinkling of "vanguard" concepts. By the mid- and late 1930s, the attraction of a handful of academic writers and the gravitation of the Communist Party toward the Popular Front stress upon "democratic forces" in the nation's past drastically altered the view of American history. The most formidable inspiration, V. L. Parrington, had provided in his Main Currents in American Thought (1928) a model of progressive and reactionary intellectual traditions. Earl Browder's 1938 pamphlet Traitors in American History: Lessons of the Moscow Trials suggested how far along the method could be taken, by the line of the day, into caricature. By 1940, Communists had embraced Charles Beard (who notably disdained class concepts) as the finest example of an American mainstream scholar.

But the Popular Front also promoted black history as had no previous Left tendency. It received W. E. B. Du Bois's monumental Black Reconstruction (1935) with mixed emotions, fearing the author's political popularity and his stress upon the absence of progressive white, lower-class forces in the South. James S. Allen's Reconstruction: The Battle for Democracy (1937) might be considered almost a "correction" from the class standpoint. A young Herbert Aptheker published his first studies of slave revolts under these auspices, in Science and Society. At a broader level, by urging Black History Week, Communists and their allies made a major contribution to the changing perception of race.

During the approaching Cold War epoch and its immediate aftermath, Aptheker and Philip Foner delivered, between them, a veritable library of Marxist historical studies marked by voluminous research and strictest orthodoxy. Only The Bending Cross (1948), a popular biography of Eugene Debs by independent radical Ray Ginger, reached a larger audience with militant tales of the past.

The chief labor and social-historian mentors of the New Left, David Montgomery and Herbert Gutman, grew out of and beyond the Popular Front milieu, attempting to bring a more flexible (but no less radical) view of race, class, and ethnicity into consonance with current methodological advances. Montgomery, a former Communist and longtime machinist, brought to labor history a keen sense of factory details, especially in the work process. Gutman, whose Yiddish-Left background had a sustaining influence on his life, became the magus of social history, discoverer and promoter of hidden history in the submerged life of the masses. These two men dominated the newer, radical views of social history at large. Eugene Genovese, eventually a master scholar of slavery, graduated from Communist Party circles with a Gramscian turn of mind unique for the middle 1960s, and wrote classic works—most notably Roll, Jordan, Roll (1974)—elucidating slave life and the relations between whites and blacks in the antebellum South.

A separate current, no less important but more clearly in the indigenous radical vein, provided the key intellectual inspiration for the antiwar New Left campus movement. William A. Williams's volumes on U.S. foreign policy, and the works of his highly influential graduate students, recuperated a sturdy isolationism with a close (and surprisingly sympathetic) study of early elites so as better to criticize the twentieth-century "corporate" order. This style of history, close to Herbert Marcuse's critique of contemporary America, inspired voluminous Left studies of militarism, advertising, education, prison and mental institutions, even of unions as integrating elements in the tightly woven "system." The precocious New Left journal Studies on the Left (1959–1966) initially spread the evangel of this movement, and its lineal successor, Socialist Revolution (later renamed Socialist Review), especially in its first years emphasized similar themes.

By 1970, an activist movement of mostly current or former graduate students shaped radical history networks within and outside the universities. Regional groups, most prominently the Mid-Atlantic Radical Historians Organization, held conferences and lectures, agitated on questions of common concern, and fostered or encouraged the publication of new journals. Radical America, which grew initially out of a national study group within Students for a Democratic Society in 1967 and maintained informal links with that organization until 1970, urged labor, black, and women's history as critical sources of insight for the spread (soon, the renewal) of the radical movement from the campuses and ghettos into a deeply rooted, powerful force. The Radical History Review, although aimed from its beginnings in 1970 rather more toward academic networks, also urged organizing strategies integrated with the pursuit of knowledge.

By the later 1970s and 1980s, immediate political expectations had diminished, but activity proliferated in several important ways. At the local level, radical historians became extremely active in public history programs ranging from labor history, race and ethnic history, and women's history to urban history and gay history. They held public discussions, mounted exhibitions, worked with filmmakers on prestige documentaries, and by the end of the 1980s found themselves well situated to speak (albeit sometimes in Aesopian tones) publicly about the past lives of ordinary peoples and the often bitter struggles for economic and political democracy. At a national level, they advanced the scholarly dialogue via important forums, such as the Berkshire Women's History conferences, the American Social History Project (which produced classroom visual aids and a landmark textbook of labor and social history), and even the Smithsonian Institution's museum exhibits. In a scholarly sense, such additional "new" areas as Asian American, Native American, and gay history, and environmental studies, among others, have likewise found their Left scholars, often central to the respective fields. Along with such subject areas, methods such as oral history became for the first time major interests of radical scholars. If radical history had once been rare in the authoritative Journal of American History, it now became commonplace.

On the other hand, not even scholarly optimism about the validity and radical uses of class, race, and gender perspectives could be maintained in light of the conservative drift from the White House to undergraduate students. Fields established at great personal cost, such as women's studies and black studies, often found themselves besieged by student disinterest and the long-run effects of insufficient university commitment. The single most notable scholarly success—forcing the concept of class upon an unwilling historical profession—suffered by the late 1980s fresh attacks from scholarly Right and even sections of the Left restive at white racism and the apparent eclipse, with deindustrialization, of the proletarian project. Despite the scholarly elaboration of women's history in particular, and the appearance of such major class- and race-oriented works as Eric Foner's Reconstruction (1988), the momentum of radical history had been decisively slowed.

By the mid-1980s, a growing popular disbelief in historical process and a growing interest in apparently transhistorical or nonsequential cultural subject-matter tended to overshadow and undermine the prestige of historical-minded studies. Some older and younger figures long associated with the Left, Eugene Genovese and a handful of contributors to the New Republic, gradually shifted rightward. The large cohort of 1960s-generation scholars, however, maintained their position and continued to turn out impressively detailed work in fields of gender, labor, ethnic, race, and environmental history.

As the century ended, the scholarly analysis of historical background to developments within popular culture yielded an overlap of interests with American Studies and other fields in some of the freshest areas of interest. Following the lead of George Lipsitz, younger intellectuals wrote studies of vernacular music, ethnic cultural styles and trends, intersections of idioms, and the continuities between political and cultural rebellion.

AMERICAN WORKERS PARTY. During its brief existence as a revolutionary organization (December 1933–January 1935), the American Workers Party, or AWP, strove to offer a thoroughly American radicalism, one "rooted in American soil." The party was headed by A. J. Muste; radical intellectuals James Burnham, Sidney Hook, and V. F. Calverton were AWP leaders, and radical writers Travers Clement, Lillian Symes, and James Rorty were also "Musteites." Prominent labor writers J. B. S. Hardman and Louis Budenz took charge of the group's propaganda and publications. The AWP leadership and rank and file also included a number of young working-class graduates of Brookwood Labor College, which Muste headed from 1921 to 1933. The AWP succeeded the Conference for Progressive Labor Action (CPLA), a Brookwood-initiated insurgent group calling for industrial unionism. Founded in early 1929, the CPLA became actively involved in strikes and organization campaigns, and evolved from reformism to Marxism.

The AWP's brand of radicalism was articulated mainly by Budenz, the editor of the party's weekly newspaper Labor Action. The AWP professed to be more militant than the Socialists, and more practical and flexible than the Communists, its two chief rivals on the Left. Notwithstanding its "American orientation," the AWP attracted small groups of older immigrant Finnish-, German-, Yiddish-, and Italian-speaking radicals who also stood apart from the Socialists and Communists. For example, several predominantly German bakery- and food-trades unions in New York, under the influence of longtime radical editor Ludwig Lore, were in the AWP orbit.

The American Workers Party succeeded in competing with the Socialist and the Communist parties most convincingly in the field of unemployed organizing. The "Musteite" National Unemployed League organized on a township- and countywide basis in areas of Ohio, Pennsylvania, West Virginia, North Carolina, and several other states, and won a number of demands from local and state relief agencies. In the Toledo Auto-Lite strike of spring 1934, Muste, Budenz, and local leaders of the Lucas County Unemployed League organized mass picketing by the unemployed in support of a striking local of the American Federation of Labor, gaining national attention when the National Guard was sent in and the union achieved recognition.

From its beginning, the AWP received overtures from the American Trotskyists, and after the latter led another victorious 1934 strike, of Minneapolis teamsters, merger talks began. In early 1935 the AWP combined with the Trotskyist organization the Communist League of America to form the Workers' Party of the United States. However, the core group of Musteites soon became dissatisfied with the new organization, and left to go in various political directions, Muste himself into radical pacifism, Budenz and others into the Popular Front-era Communist Party, and many AWP rank and file into union work.

AMERICAN WRITERS CONGRESS. In January 1935 a "call for an American Writers Congress" went out from the pages of the New Masses in an effort to mobilize writers into a revolutionary cultural movement aimed at accelerating "the destruction of capitalism and the establishment of a workers' government." The "call," signed and answered by some of America's most prominent literary figures, led to the creation of the League of American Writers, an organization affiliated with the International Union of Revolutionary Writers. Through "collective discussion" among congress and league participants, its organizers hoped to reveal the most effective ways in which "writers, as writers," could function in the "rapidly developing crisis." While the call reflected the desire of the Communist Party to expand its influence and appeal beyond an already committed cadre of revolutionary writers, a practice characteristic of emerging Popular Front policies, the tightly planned and executed congress resembled, to some, an auxiliary organization of the Third Period more than an inclusive Popular Front one.

The birth of the American Writers Congress and the League of American Writers also sounded the death knell for the John Reed Clubs, organizations for aspiring young radical intellectuals. At a 1934 conference of John Reed Clubs, Alexander Trachtenberg, head of International Publishers, the Communist Party-oriented publishing house, instructed the national committee to organize a national congress of writers. Trachtenberg's plans became clearer at a Party caucus when he informed those in attendance that with the advent of the Popular Front policy, the John Reed Clubs would be dissolved. Richard Wright, who was among the small group who attended the caucus, was shocked at the decision. He inquired what would become of the young writers whom the Communist Party had implored to join the clubs but who would be excluded from the proposed new organization composed only of established "writers who have achieved some standing in their respective fields." Wright received no reply and no one seconded his protest. Neglected and abandoned by the Party, some of these young writers would soon leave the movement or go over to the Trotskyists.

The decision to disband the John Reed Clubs and to focus on enrolling writers of "some standing" reflected a new tack but not a complete turnabout. The Party was not yet ready to make the first congress as broad or as popular as some of the organizing committee desired it to be. Many of the sixty-two writers who signed the call—Granville Hicks, Joseph Freeman, Mike Gold, Richard Wright, Joshua Kunitz, Malcolm Cowley, Lincoln Steffens, Theodore Dreiser, John Dos Passos, Erskine Caldwell, James Farrell, and John Howard Lawson—were members or trusted friends of the Party. Two nonwriters joined them—Earl Browder, Communist Party secretary, and Trachtenberg. Trachtenberg restricted invitations to congress membership to "reliable" writers, checked delegates carefully, and screened the outlines of papers to be delivered. Although Waldo Frank, a non-Party writer, was nominated as the league's chairman, most of the seventeen on the executive committee were Party members or fellow travelers. Browder's appearance before the 216 congress delegates only served to signify what was clear to all, the centrality of the Party in the league.

In his speech at the opening session on 1 May 1935, Browder sought to reassure non-Communist delegates that the Party did not intend to put them into "uniform," but rather to provide an organizational means for cooperating with "all enemies of reaction in the cultural field." He went further in clarifying the Party's position that there was no fixed "Party line" about good or bad works of art. The Party, he declared, did not "want to take good writers and make bad strike leaders of them." To serve the Party, Browder argued, the aim of writer-members should be to become "constantly better writers." The delegates welcomed these remarks.

As might well be expected of any gathering of intellectuals, disputes arose during the congress. James Farrell was the harshest critic of the Party's cultural stance, denouncing "that species of overpoliticized and ideological schematized criticism that had been too dishearteningly frequent in the literary sections of revolutionary journals." The greatest disagreements, by far, were aroused by Kenneth Burke's paper on "Revolutionary Symbolism in America." Burke exposed himself as a premature adherent of the Popular Front when he suggested that the symbol of "the worker" be replaced with that of "the people." Such an exchange of symbols, Burke argued, might enlist lower-middle- and middle-class allegiance to revolutionary thought. In making such a suggestion, Burke unintentionally affronted the sectarian thinking habits so well established during the Third Period and was reminded of a similar usage of the term "the people" made by Hitler. In this transitory period to the Popular Front, Burke's comments, while thoroughly criticized, were forgiven.

By the time of the Second American Writers Congress in 1937, the openly pro-Communist tone of the 1935 meeting had vanished. The Second Congress was dominated by the theme of fighting fascism and displayed a noticeable absence of revolutionary rhetoric. Also absent from the list of signers were the Party politicians and intellectuals. The declarations by several participants, in a session on criticism, of support for Trotsky, however, demonstrated the degree to which the league had drifted from the Communist orbit. Defections by members over political issues, the Moscow trials, and Trotsky, as well as the refusal of the New York John Reed Club, and its journal, Partisan Review, to disband, hurt the league. The final blow came with the signing of the Nazi-Soviet Pact in 1939, but by that time many of the most prominent members had left.

AMERICAN YOUTH CONGRESS. See Student Movements, 1930s.

AMERINGER, OSCAR (1870–1943). The “Mark Twain of American Socialism,” socialist literary comedian of an age, raconteur, editor, labor organizer, and occasional Socialist city official, Oscar Ameringer was one of the most colorful characters of the American Left. Born in 1870 in Bavaria, son of a cabinet-maker and a freethinking mother, Ameringer later recalled that he sought out the company of the despised village Jews, studying the forbidden “pulp” literature with them. His parents were told he had a future at the end of a rope—or in America, where they sent him at age fifteen. There he spent his Wan- derjahre as portrait painter, itinerant musician, hobo, and lover. He settled down as a furniture maker, only to be blacklisted after leading a strike. Living as a musician, he studied English by reading Mark Twain's Library of Humor, the finest anthology of its type at that time. He soon submitted his first successful literary humor, a satire on the wedding of a Cincinnati heiress to a British duke, to Puck magazine.

Meanwhile, Ameringer returned to Bavaria in 1890, increasingly interested in the socialist movement. A convinced socialist back in the United States in the first years of the new century, he became editor of a Columbus, Ohio, union weekly and moved from there to attempting to organize New Orleans brewery- and dockworkers, advocating interracial cooperation. In 1907 he moved to Oklahoma, where his socialist sentiment intensified rapidly. There his fame rapidly grew, both for his political talent and for his versatile public appearances for socialism as speaker, impresario, and musician. By 1911 Ameringer himself nearly won the mayoralty of Oklahoma City, and his paper, the Oklahoma Leader, soon had a fervent following across the region, second only, among socialists, to the Appeal to Reason. More than any other intellectual, he mastered the art of explaining socialism in common-sense terms for the lower-class, even agrarian, reader, as in his famous tract, Socialism for the Farmer Who Farms the Farm.

Ameringer's major literary contribution, Life and Deeds of Uncle Sam, first published in 1909, stood in the tradition of satirical histories of America and in the then-current fashion of muckraking. By 1917 it had sold some half-million copies, achieved translation into fifteen languages, and became the favorite book given by the socialist to the nonsocialist prospect for conversion. Its hilarity disguised, to the unwary, the power of its critique (“When somebody talks about carrying the cross, the flag, freedom, or civilization to some heathen nation you bet your bottom boots that that heathen nation has got something the other fellow wants”). A new edition appeared as late as the 1930s.

Fleeing a destructive factional brawl and the anticipation of government repression in the Oklahoma socialist movement, Ameringer moved on to Milwaukee, where he aided the Milwaukee Leader, under pressure for its antiwar positions. He returned to Oklahoma City, helping to defeat a Ku Klux Klan candidate for governor in 1920, and traveled on to Springfield, Illinois, where he edited the Illinois Miner, a dissident weekly aimed at toppling United Mine Workers president John L. Lewis, until 1931.

Returning a last time to Oklahoma, he established the American Guardian that year, directing it for a decade mostly to a constituency of old-time Plains States socialists. For the American Guardian, Ameringer wrote some of his most brilliant satirical essays under the nom de plume "Adam Coal Digger," essays unremitting in their attacks upon American capitalism but somewhat mellow toward the Soviet Union. His autobiography, If You Don't Weaken (1940), recounting his experiences, reached new audiences, and was widely accepted as the most witty and engaging book of its kind ever written by an American radical. Unwilling to countenance socialist support for war, he lost many readers (and even more when his son, taking over the paper for an ill Oscar, announced a pro-war position). The paper closed in early 1942, and Ameringer lived scarcely more than a year longer. The National Guardian (later the Guardian) took its name from Ameringer's paper.

ANARCHISM. The political state has not always existed. Most leftists have believed that the state came into existence when civilization began to produce surpluses controlled by elites who found it useful to create coercive institutions to protect their privileges from internal and external challenges. Many revolutionaries, from the late eighteenth century onward, argued that with the elimination of such privileges, the state might be "transcended" or "abolished." Friedrich Engels, Marx's collaborator, predicted that the state would "wither away" to be placed into "the museum of antiquities, next to the spinning wheel and the bronze axe."

But one sector of radicals began to suggest, especially from the 1840s, that socialists might replace the old state with something yet more oppressive. Pierre-Joseph Proudhon, the first popular French spokesperson for the antistatists, wrote that Marxism in particular was a dogmatic religion that would encourage "the indivisibility of power, all-consuming centralization, systematic destruction of all individual, cooperative, and regional thought, and inquisitorial police." The result would be "the socialism of the barracks." As an alternative, Proudhon urged the creation of local and regional confederations of voluntary associations.

Such views were introduced into the United States as early as the 1850s by Wilhelm Weitling. By the late 1860s and early 1870s, several French immigrant branches of the First International pronounced themselves Proudhonites, and joined with anarchist-minded spiritualists and individualists to establish a short-lived anti-Marx federation. American anarchism gained its foremost advocate in the U.S. translator of Proudhon, polemicist-publisher Benjamin R. Tucker. Tucker drew both upon Proudhon and upon a native tradition of extreme individualism expressed by such varied figures as Stephen Pearl Andrews, Lysander Spooner, and Josiah Warren, as he produced his influential newspaper, Liberty: Not the Daughter but the Mother of Order (1881–1908).

For the majority of anarchists, especially immigrant anarchists, a society based upon communes would be reached by violent struggles against capitalism. The ideas of Mikhail Bakunin and his allies reached U.S. shores through the formation of the Black International, with its American devotees Burnette Haskell and Joseph R. Buchanan, and with the arrival of Johann Most and his incendiary newspaper, Die Freiheit, in 1882. The well-attended Pittsburgh Congress of 1883, although unsuccessful in bringing about a confederation of American anarchists, promoted in its manifesto such goals as "equal rights for all without distinction of sex or race" and "regulation of all public affairs by free contacts between the autonomous (independent) communes and associations, resting upon a federalistic basis."

This anarchist movement, arguably the most influential in U.S. history (especially among workers), reached its apex in 1886. Chicago "social revolutionaries," as they styled themselves, drew upon various sources including Marxism, Bakuninism, and Natural Rights theory as they promulgated doctrine in five newspapers (German-language, Bohemian, and English), directed the Central Labor Union, and played a key role in the movement to win the eight-hour work day. Scattered across the East Coast and Midwest, smaller groups varying in background and doctrine from followers of William Morris to Bakuninites established propaganda groups and likewise sought to intervene in labor.

The suppression of the radical movement following the Haymarket incident reduced anarchism from a mass cause to a collection of groups and publications, predominantly immigrant in origins. Among the groups, Germans (still in control of the Chicago weekly Vorbote), Jews (with their weekly Freie Arbeiter Shtimme, after 1890), Italians (with a proliferation of papers, mostly ephemeral), and Spaniards had a following, and a press that translated classics into various tongues. "Propaganda of the deed" held a special allure in the desperate 1890s and at the turn of the century. Alexander Berkman (1870–1936) attempted to assassinate Henry Clay Frick, plant manager of the steel plant at Homestead, Pennsylvania, after Frick's private guards and the state militia fired on striking workers; and Leon Czolgosz (1873–1901) succeeded in assassinating President McKinley. After the McKinley assassination, most anarchists concluded such activity was ineffective and counterproductive.

Anarchist activity took a number of fresh directions. Emma Goldman established cultural respectability for anarchist ideas in the Little Theater movement and parts of the art world at large. The Yiddish Freie Arbeter Shtimme cultivated the experimental poets of the community, di yunge, and earned itself a niche as avant-garde. Anarcho-syndicalists had wide influence in the Industrial Workers of the World, especially through the Italian Socialist Federation and its weekly, Il Proletario, and through the efforts of individual anarcho-syndicalist leaders such as Carlo Tresca. Anarchism played an independent and important role in linking American and Mexican radicals through the Magón brothers and their newspaper, Regeneración. Anarchists deeply influenced even Labor Zionists, beginning to elucidate their vision of kibbutzim in Palestine. And anarchists provided some of the fiercest opposition to the coming of war, with Luigi Galleani's followers joining in desperate appeals for mass disobedience. The major theorist for many in this period was Peter Kropotkin (1842–1921), a scientist who wrote such works as Factories, Fields and Workshops (1891) and had challenged Darwinian thought in Mutual Aid (1902).

Government repression fell with great severity during World War I. Newspapers closed, foreign-born militants were in many cases deported, and entire groups (Galleani's following in particular) were assaulted. The war also brought internal splintering. Following Kropotkin, a handful of anarchist leaders (most notably, Jewish leaders) endorsed the Allies, provoking wide discouragement and disillusionment. Many anarchists, some initially drawn to the Russian Revolution, found anarchism's status permanently altered by the Bolshevik regime and by Communist parties usurping the space left of the socialist movement. Anarchism's most celebrated event of the 1920s, the trial and execution of Sacco and Vanzetti, was also a terrible defeat. The destruction of Spanish anarchism, in the following period, left anarchists with only propaganda and aid to surviving victims.

Anarchist writers like Goldman continued to uphold "the old-fashioned idea that life without freedom is a monstrous delusion even if 'the trains run on time' and 'our beloved comrade in the Kremlin has made Russia the most comfortable and joyous country on earth.'" American anarchism continued to survive through such institutions as the Modern School in Stelton, New Jersey, from which old-timers continued to publish the Road to Freedom newspaper, various other organs such as the Man, the Italian-language Adunata dei Refrattari and Il Martello, the Yiddish Freie Arbeter Shtimme, and assorted ghetto free-thought societies and clubs. The most influential of quasi-anarchist papers, the Catholic Worker, and its assorted Hospitality Houses, was ideologically anathema to old-time anarchists: religious (even papal) anarchism.

Anarchism enjoyed a mild revival in the 1940s–1950s through a proliferation of pacifist, literary avant-garde, and antistate sentiments and accompanying publications. Especially notable in the Bay Area following World War II, anarcho-pacifism prompted the birth of Pacifica Radio, and encouraged writers later associated with the Beat generation. In New York, Dwight Macdonald published Politics, an approximately anarchist magazine with a small but intensely intellectual (and in the long run, influential) following. In the subsequent era, Liberation magazine, roughly anarcho-pacifist, seeded the ground for the New Left, as did one of its leading figures, Paul Goodman, with his influential tract Growing Up Absurd (1961).

Anarchist ideas continued their revival with the mounting skepticism about both "democratic people's republics" such as the Soviet Union and "free-world governments" such as those of France and the United States, which conducted vicious colonial wars. The largest radical organization of the 1960s, Students for a Democratic Society, advocated an anarchist-influenced "participatory democracy" where people controlled the institutions that concerned their daily lives. Anarchist ideas, as such, found a place in Anarchos, published by Murray Bookchin's circle, and anarcho-syndicalist ideas in Black and Red publications, and in the later Fifth Estate newspaper from Detroit, both heavily influenced by the work of Yugoslav-born Fredy Perlman. Numerous New Left journals, including Radical America, sought to draw upon anarchism's heritage along with other sources.

After the collapse of the New Left proper, anarchism found a new haven in the ecology movement, especially in its militant, direct-action wing among groups such as Friends of the Earth. Murray Bookchin's works did much to inspire this movement, while Edward Abbey's The Monkey Wrench Gang (1975) offered helpful tactical suggestions. Here, as nowhere else, "propaganda of the deed," nonviolently directed against machines to save nature, had a lasting and potentially mass appeal. To a considerably lesser extent, anarchist ideas along with religious-mystical notions and many others influenced feminism's attack upon Marxism and its advocates' effort to establish a theoretical and practical approach to liberation. Punk rock, with its inspired nihilism, more directly and consciously carried anarchist ideas forward.

The results of this history cannot yet be fully assessed. Anarchism is no mass movement, has no stable class base, lacks unified theory, posits uncertain tactics, and has no long-term organizations. Its power resides in its basic critique and the conviction that even if it may never be realized in ideal form, its definitions of liberty can only perish when people have been reduced to robots. Specifically, anarchists have asked whether the future should be deeded to the numerous militaries, privileged bureaucrats, and authoritarian religions. Must agribusiness and collective farms be dominant modes of food production? Must democracy remain an indirect exercise in which casting ballots is the major duty of citizenship? Must the environment be plundered for short-term statist or corporate needs? The search for alternatives continues.

ANARCHIST FICTION, 1870-1914. While fiction was a popular medium for many critics of turn-of-the-century American society, it held particular value for anarchists. For anarchist writers in the late nineteenth and early twentieth century, fiction was crucial in allowing a conceptualization of their theories—which otherwise were frequently criticized for their ethereal quality—in a popularly accessible form and language. Anarchist fiction manifested several popular literary styles. Utilizing the genres of sentimentality, utopian fantasy, and realism, anarchist writers both engaged in and subverted dominant modes of discourse. Anarchist journals, replete with short stories and advertisements for radical novels, were the lifeline of this fiction, often being its sole means of promotion and distribution.

The evolution of anarchist fiction parallels the progression of the anarchist movement in the United States. While many immigrant anarchists brought with them a tradition of radicalism from their native countries, many American-born anarchists came to anarchism through their participation in various reform efforts, particularly women's emancipation. The earliest novels advertised in anarchist journals in the 1880s and 1890s were written in the 1870s and 1880s, and highlight the issues of free love and opposition to institutionalized religion and marriage. Although these authors did not yet self-consciously identify themselves as anarchists, but rather as reformers, their works were embraced by anarchist journals well after their initial publication, and in fact many of the authors became active participants in the anarchist movement by the turn of the century.

Like such works as the patently sentimental Uncle Tom's Cabin, novels by Elmina D. Slenker and Lois Waisbrooker were marked by themes of emotionalism, sacrificial experience, and the distinction between the public and private arenas of society. While resembling the popular sentimental novel, early anarchist fiction operated as satire by playing with the familiar, injecting the absurd or improbable into the basic formulation of the sentimental genre. In so doing, these anarchist fictions encouraged a dissatisfaction with the status quo, the remedy for which was to be found in personal liberation. Early anarchist fiction in the sentimental genre did not advocate a violent revolution. Rather, these novels depict the positive results of individual emancipation from the cultural constraints of religion and marriage. Through individual changes in consciousness and lifestyle, anarchist sentimental authors hoped, a larger cultural transformation would occur.

Domesticity—marriage and motherhood—and religion were key themes addressed in anarchist sentimental fiction, in which the Victorian angel in the house was replaced by a decidedly sexual heroine who rejects the proscriptions of marriage and institutionalized religion. Slenker's The Darwins (1879), John's Way (1884), and Mary Jones (1885) portrayed atheists in a complex and sympathetic manner. Waisbrooker, well-known advocate of free love, spiritualism, and women's rights, and active participant in the anarchist community at Home, Washington, published five major novels: Alice Vale (1869), Helen Harlow's Vow (1870), Mayweed Blossoms (1871), Nothing Like It (1875), and Perfect Motherhood (1890). Each of Waisbrooker's plots revolves around the struggles faced by unwed mothers, and exposes the hypocrisy of the double standard. Marriage is opposed in Waisbrooker's works as the manifestation of hierarchical relations between the sexes, and she presents single parenting as an opportunity for women to gain greater autonomy over their own lives.

In anarchist circles and in the larger society, the sentimental novel gradually gave way to the more fantastic form of the utopian narrative by the end of the nineteenth century. Following the phenomenal success of Edward Bellamy's Looking Backward (1888), anarchists produced their own fictional accounts of the model society, bringing together individual efforts at individual and societal change. While sentimental fiction located change within the individual, the genre of utopian fantasy allowed the exploration of what individual changes would entail for society, and delineated the forms that society could take. Like their popular utopian counterparts, anarchist utopian fictions emphasized social planning and collectivity: however, they differed sharply from their mainstream contemporaries in their emphasis on extreme individualism.

Through this literary genre anarchists focused on their ideal construction of society. J. William Lloyd's The Natural Man: A Romance of the Golden Age (1902) is the account of Forrest Westwood's efforts to resurrect a symbolic past and create "a perfect American Eden." Other anarchist utopias presented themselves as scientific analyses through which a futuristic progressive age was to be realized. Henry Olerich in A Cityless and Countryless World (1893) sought to formulate an "Outline of Practical Co-Operative Individualism." Other utopias, particularly William Windsor's Loma, a Citizen of Venus (1897), Florence Huntley's The Dream Child (1892), and Rosa Graul's Hilda's Home (1899), equated the emancipation of women with progress and highlighted the maternal roles of women in the establishment of the ideal society.

Produced at the outset of the twentieth century, anarchist utopian fiction reflected and proselytized the anarchists' dreams for the new century. With the fading popularity of the utopian genre in the first decade of the twentieth century, anarchist journals ceased to promote novels as consistently and instead published allegorical short stories. Lillian Browne, Sol Davis, Sadakichi Hartmann, Gertrude Nafe, and Grace Potter, among others, popularized these stories in Mother Earth. In euphemistic language, these allegorical stories provided veiled social commentary on favorite themes of the anarchists: revolution, freedom, and sexuality.

In the 1900s and 1910s realism rivaled allegories as the predominant mode of fiction in anarchist publications. Realism avoided the fantastic and extravagant styles characteristic of late-nineteenth-century popular fiction, attempting instead to depict real life in a manner that was true to life. While these works detailed at length the everyday lives of people, the underlying message was usually one of class consciousness and struggle. Labor, industrialization, immigration, and the growth of corporations were common themes in these socioeconomic stories in Mother Earth by Max Baginski, Adeline Chapney, Voltairine de Cleyre, Margaret Grant, Henry May, John Franklyn

Phillips, and Margaret Hunter Scott. This literature increasingly expressed themes of futility and fragmentation: death, individuality, and loneliness fill the pages of these stories. Turning inward, this fiction reflected anarchists' disillusionment with anarchism and their isolation within the larger society.

Fiction, which had constituted a standard feature of anarchist publications, virtually disappeared after 1914. Although the figure of the anarchist would frequently appear in fiction, it was in works about anarchists, not by anarchists.

ANIMAL RIGHTS. Although an extensive literature questioning anthropocentrism and urging greater harmony in the relations between humankind and other animals has existed in the Western world for centuries, the modern movement for animal rights emerged only in the late nineteenth century. At first the notion that animals, too, had rights was little more than a side issue in platforms of other reform movements regarded as major, notably abolitionism and woman suffrage. One of the first Americans to declare that animals, even insects, "have the same right to life that I have" was Unitarian anti-slavery spokesman William Ellery Channing, but he gave little emphasis to this aspect of his thought in his published writings. Similarly, Susan B. Anthony, Elizabeth Cady Stanton, Frances Willard, and many other feminists took up the cause of vegetarianism (a current closely allied to animal rights), but it never became a focus of their agitation.

The American Society for the Prevention of Cruelty to Animals, the first organization in the Western hemisphere devoted to better treatment of other species, was founded in New York in 1866, and like-minded groups soon formed all over the country. Such groups were not concerned with defending animals' rights in the broader sense, but rather in securing legislation against what they regarded as excessive cruelty. A major function of the Humane Society, founded in Chicago in 1877, was to provide public water-troughs for horses in crowded downtown areas.

With the 1892 publication in London of the book Animals' Rights by British socialist Henry S. Salt (a New York edition appeared two years later), animal rights came to be recognized as a distinct movement, and it began to attract the active support of other reformers. Popular feminist author Elizabeth Stuart Phelps Ward wrote tales and tracts depicting the horrors of vivisection. All through the nineties, feminists, dress-reformers, and pioneer conservationists joined animal rights advocates in an eventually successful campaign against the use of stuffed birds and exotic plumage in women's hats.

Significant as it is that the international animal rights movement was founded by a socialist, it is no less significant that Salt's socialism was rooted in the pre-Marxian radicalism of two poets: the militant vegetarian Shelley and that ardent champion of wilderness, Thoreau. The notion of a reconciliation of humans and other animals figured prominently in much utopian literature, notably in Charles Fourier's dream of "universal harmony" (which had reverberated throughout the pre-Civil War United States) and in the works of Edward Bellamy, especially with the publication of his Equality (1897), in which America's greatest utopian made it clear that recognition of animals' rights was a key feature of the new society. As Marxism became the dominant mode of socialism, the question tended to be shoved aside. Neither Marx nor Engels ever troubled to write on the subject in detail, but their scattered references to vegetarians and antivivisectionists are not sympathetic. This seeming indifference on the part of Marxism's founding fathers made it easier for later guardians of Marxian orthodoxy to dismiss any interest in the rights of other species as merely another form of "petit-bourgeois deviation." Of the major figures in the Marxian tradition, only Polish-born Rosa Luxemburg, in some of her letters, approached a conception of animal rights. In this area as in others, utopian dreams survived far from the Marxist mainstream, in various heretical currents such as the Frankfurt School, Wilhelm Reich's "Sex-Pol," and above all in the anarchist movement.

In pre-World War I American socialism, at least in part because of Bellamy's enduring legacy and because of the tolerance of diversity in such mass movements as Eugene Debs's Socialist Party and the Industrial Workers of the World (IWW), animal rights was, albeit marginal, not so taboo a topic as it was in the narrower, more ideology-conscious European movement. In 1906 America's premier socialist publishing house, Charles H. Kerr's cooperative, brought out The Universal Kinship by Chicago high school zoology teacher J. Howard Moore—a work highly praised by Henry Salt himself as a major contribution to the animal rights cause. Moore's book was promoted in the influential International Socialist Review as well as in the IWW press, and Kerr, who was himself a vegetarian, published several other books by the same author. More dramatically, the last work by America's best-known socialist writer, Michael, Brother of Jerry (1917) by Jack London, was a militant animal rights novel, portraying the evils of circus animal-training. In his preface London urged one and all to join the struggle for animal welfare.

But the voices for animal rights never were more than a faint undertone in the Socialist Party's heyday. Many socialists doubtless agreed with Upton Sinclair that "some day" society would be able to get along "without the maintenance of the slaughterhouse," but persuaded themselves, as the author of The Jungle persuaded himself, that the question could safely be postponed till "after the Revolution." For the Communists who seized the mantle of Marxism in the early 1920s and held it for decades, the question did not even exist.

Interestingly, however, as the socialists' involvement in the animal rights movement all but ceased, the movement itself virtually collapsed. Older groups grew increasingly conservative and made their peace with a social order that required the brutal exploitation of animals. Gassing to death stray dogs and cats became the chief work of many "anti-cruelty" societies, and in some states such groups made a business of supplying strays to laboratories for "experimentation." From the Great Depression through the Vietnam War the cause of animal rights in the United States was in eclipse.

Not until the 1970s, after a decade of civil rights New Left, and antiwar agitation, did a new and even more radical animal rights movement arise. An important link between the older struggle for socialism and the new animal rights activism were Helen and Scott Nearing, whose radicalism extended back decades—in Scott's case to Debsian days—and whose later vision of decentralism and "the good life" involved them in a two-person crusade against the "slaughterhouse diet." As they wrote in 1979, "We cannot conceive of kindly, considerate, aware people consuming carcasses of perceptive, defenseless animals who were raised in captivity for slaughter."

Vastly larger than the movement of Salt's day (the Coalition for Nonviolent Food comprises more than four hundred organizations with a membership in the millions), the new animal rights movement has acknowledged a far-reaching range of inspirations, including Salt himself (his Animals' Rights was reprinted in 1980), Thoreau and Gandhi and the whole current of nonviolence, Eastern religions (especially Taoism and Buddhism), and above all radical environmental movements such as Greenpeace and Earth First! These last have provided more recent activists not only with impressive examples of the effectiveness of direct action, but also with a broad, nonanthropocentric, radical ecological perspective. The new movement has tended to be a youthful one, and has readily employed methods of struggle learned from civil rights and student struggles of the 1960s: sit-ins, boycotts, blockades, sabotage, and so on.

Cutting across social classes and conventional political affiliations, the movement continues to be as diverse organizationally as it is ideologically. One of its most prominent spokespersons, longtime radical labor activist Henry Spira, coordinator of many notable struggles (including the successful campaign against experimentation on cats at New York's Museum of Natural History in the 1970s), has expressed an orientation that seems to be shared by a great majority of activists: that the end for which the movement was formed—reduction of the slaughter and suffering of our fellow creatures—should never be obscured by the particular ambitions or needs of any of its constituent groups. Diversity as well as decentralization thus remain essential features of this movement, whose adherents range from traditional antivivisectionists with a focus on education to the clandestine "guerrillas" of the Animal Liberation Front, who conduct "raids" on animal-testing laboratories, filming their cruel procedures, seizing incriminating files, and liberating captive animals (finding homes for them later via an "underground railway").

In lively book, pamphlet, and periodical literature modern animal rights activists set forth polemics against the movement's opponents—the hunting and gun lobby; the fur, meat, and cosmetics industries; the Christian churches; and the scientific establishment—and elaborate their critique of the effects and implications of the mass slaughter of animals in advanced industrial society. The monthly Animal Agenda appeared on popular newsstands. Without abandoning their traditional moral/ethical emphasis, they have carefully detailed the environmental devastation and health hazards wrought by animal abuse. Earlier advocates were often content simply to point out the moral wrong of meat eating and the nutritional superiority of a vegetarian diet. Newer activists tend to be more aggressive, and their view of the larger picture more concrete. In discussing the link between a meat diet and cancer, for example, recent animal rights literature points to the fact that over half the public land in the United States is heavily subsidized by the federal government to promote the billion-dollar cattle industry, thus relating the questions of meat diet and cancer to a wider context of industrial/corporate abuse of the entire planet.

In 1990 the fast-food chain McDonald's sued two activists who had used such terms as "McTorture" and "McMurder" to describe the chain's treatment of animals. Although the suit ended in 1997 in a technical victory for the chain, the judge's ruling scored McDonald's "culpable responsibility for cruel practices" toward animals, and brought enormous publicity to the animal rights cause.

The movement's leading manifesto, Animal Liberation, by the Australian Peter Singer, appeared as a mass-market paperback in 1975 and in a revised edition in 1990. The book popularized the term speciesism (by analogy with racism and sexism) to signify human arrogance toward other species. Its first chapter, titled "All Animals Are Equal," argues that "supporters of liberation for Blacks and women should support Animal Liberation too." Other animal rights activists have adopted the IWW slogan: "An injury to one is an injury to all."

ANTHROPOLOGY. Since the 1960s leftist scholarship has had a positive impact on anthropological discourse by raising questions about how the societies anthropologists study are connected to larger domains of power shaped by colonialism, the articulation of modes of production, and gender. Additionally, it has motivated a self-critical and reflexive line of inquiry into how mainstream anthropology is itself colonialist, classist, and sexist. Hence, in the last two decades, anthropology has recovered at least a part of the critical function it enjoyed at the end of the nineteenth century and the start of the twentieth, when L. H. Morgan was a major shaping influence on socialist thought and when the work of Franz Boas provided a scientific challenge to and refutation of the prevailing racism of the epoch.

After World War II anthropology became above all an academic discipline, and it was only between the demise of McCarthyism and the rise of Reaganism that Marxist anthropologists in U.S. universities could openly unveil a Left perspective. During the 1950s students of Julian Steward, notably Sidney Mintz and Eric Wolf, laid the foundation for an alteration of traditional approaches to community studies by situating the people studied in the broader context of U.S. hegemony and international capitalism. The customary objects of anthropological investigation were recast as colonized and proletarianized subjects rather than as exotic tribes or backward peasants. By the 1970s this perspective was clearly articulated by anthropologists who argued that the societies under study were not being transformed through the value-neutral processes of assimilation and acculturation, but through oppressive and exploitative colonialist and imperialist projects.

Innovative work by dependency and world-systems theorists and French structural Marxists (nonanthropologists and economic anthropologists alike) encouraged a return to the writings of Marx and Engels, above all Engels's Origin of the Family, Private Property, and the State, the four volumes of Capital, and Marx's Grundrisse (translated into English only in 1973). The Marxist concepts of mode of production and social formation assumed a saliency for understanding the societies anthropologists looked at. Marxist anthropologists were able to examine the dependent status of Third World societies in which class differentiation has assumed a variety of trajectories and where people confront different forms of capitalism. In this vein, theoretical and substantive advances have been made toward a historical anthropology, toward understanding the effects of merchant capital in "the periphery," and regarding other topics that much pre-1970s anthropology ignored or refused to problematize.

Some leftist anthropologists have focused less on colonialism as a form of capitalist domination and more on the process of globalization. In this emerging paradigm, anthropologists have sought to analyze the impact of increasingly global capital flows on the relations of power in specific cultures. They are particularly interested in exploring the relationship between a worldwide homogeneous commercial culture on the one hand and assertions of local identity on the other.

Feminist anthropologists have examined how colonialism, imperialism, and different modes of production shaped what was for long a classic topic of anthropological research, relations between men and women. Writers and activists such as Eleanor Leacock have argued that relationships between men and women are historically variable and that gender relations in some noncapitalist societies are more egalitarian than in capitalist societies. At the same time, recognizing that patriarchy antedates capitalism, leftist feminist anthropologists have demonstrated how the interaction of patriarchy with capitalism is particularly oppressive for women. An important line of research has undermined the modernization theorists' assumption that women's status improves with the development of capitalism. Scholars have noted how the entrance of women into the labor market does not lead to an improvement in their status position, since they get the lowest-paying jobs and bear the double burden of having to perform domestic work as well as wage labor.

Feminists have not only developed alternative analytical approaches to mainstream anthropology, but have questioned fundamental aspects of the discipline. Some have challenged anthropology on the grounds of its manifest male bias. This was particularly evident in androcentric kinship studies and analyses of marital alliances, in which women figured as mere tokens of exchanges controlled by men, or in studies of economic contributions to the reproduction of society, where women's roles had been glossed over, underanalyzed, or ignored.

Other Left anthropologists have criticized the way colleagues have wittingly or unwittingly been implicated in colonialist, imperialist, and hegemonic projects. The participation of anthropologists in efforts by the U.S. Department of Defense and the Central Intelligence Agency to undermine popular protest in Chile and Thailand during the 1960s were revealed, and ethical guidelines for the profession were redrawn to condemn anthropological research conducted for the purpose of oppressing and exploiting the people being studied. This has had important consequences for the shape of the discipline and contributed to the creation of an intellectual space within anthropology in which leftist analysis has been able to develop. It is less clear, however, whether Marxist and Left criticism has reshaped mainstream anthropology to the extent some scholars have claimed. While issues of domination and power have secured recognition in anthropological debates, few anthropologists have explicitly politicized their own work. However, those who have no longer simply write about the people they study; they also seek to empower them.

ANTICOMMUNISM. Marx and Engels announced in The Communist Manifesto that communism was a "specter" haunting Europe. If so, anti-communism has been the turning of that specter into a master ideology of the present epoch.

Anticommunism needs to be distinguished from radical criticism of existing "communist" societies, and from the posing of utopian alternatives to the present order everywhere. The distinction is crucial because anticommunism has frequently disguised itself in such modes. Properly speaking, anticommunism knows "communism" only to destroy it. Everything takes a bipolar coding: down with communism Anti-Dies Committee cartoon by William Gropper, c. 1939.

= up with capitalism (or rather, "Freedom" and "Democracy," purportedly realized only under capitalism). No essential complexity, no important evolution of "communist" societies themselves can be accommodated in this system, and above all, no consideration of capitalism as a doomed social order. The traits adduced to demonstrate the evil of communism make up something frozen out of time. Rather than being seen concretely in its real relations, it is seen as a manifestation of deep and fixed essence.

Anticommunism concerns, then, not communism at all but rather its own internal needs. Anticommunism is not a matter of fact, but of how facts are constructed, and the framework in which they are placed. Full-blown anticommunist discourse is notable for the presence of what can be called the "black hole" effect—the sense that communism represents some absolute, infinitely dense standard of evil into the evaluation of which all critical distinctions disappear.

This may also be called the ABC effect: Anything but Communism. Or, in its most pathological form, Better Dead than Red. Its threat outweighs all other considerations, and justifies all acts to combat it, from support of tyrants and the launching of support of actions that cause massive civilian casualties and the devastation of human environments to preemptive nuclear war.

One aspect of anticommunism, its dominant part, is made up of the instrumental activities of ruling elites. Another part, quite separate in origin and functions, is made up of subjective popular dispositions to embrace what may be called anticommunist theology.

Instrumental anticommunism obeys the logic of political calculation. By projecting all sin to the other side, agents of ruling elites can create a climate in which political opposition is effectively silenced and the severe contradictions between democratic ideology and actual behavior apparently nullified. The use of atomic weapons against Japan, nominally to end World War II but actually to announce postwar U.S. hegemony over Asia, offers a striking case in point. Only by portrayal of Stalin's crimes as somehow worse could the contradiction between American ideals and American practices be reconciled.

An understanding of subjective anticommunism, on the other hand, requires a cultural and psychological critique. Cultural, first of all, because anti-communism is contiguous with certain "paranoid" features of American society going back to the colonial era, or earlier, to the roots of Western civilization. The continual repression of religious heretics, the frenzy of the Crusades, the repeated witch trials, among other events, have been persecutory premonitions of anticommunism. In American history, the process has often overlapped with waves of nativism, fears of loss of community and family, reactions against bureaucratization, and unfulfilled religious impulses. Despite the calculations of a less fanatical anticommunism, the demonology frequently breaks loose, blinding policy elites and undercutting their objectives.

The precursors of what crystallized into anticommunism with the emergence of the Bolshevik state can be seen in many forms earlier in American history: in the defense of slavery against allegedly "fanatical" abolitionists; in anti-Catholic agitation; in the racist and xenophobic outbreaks following the Civil War and episodically thereafter (leading to the formation of the Ku Klux Klan and similar movements); and, throughout, in the defense of capital against a rising and militant working class. The police raids on radical organizations following the Hay-market rebellion of 1886, and the resulting execution of innocent anarchists, established the basic plan to be followed.

At least three major Red Scares have exhibited the major symptoms. In 1919–1920, with the Bolshevik Revolution providing the symbolism, the U.S. government, the press, and big business joined forces against a labor movement that had grown strong enough to launch a general strike in the city of Seattle. The resulting hysteria and gross violation of civil liberties set a specifically anticommunist pattern. In the wake of the Second World War, a second Red Scare crushed the progressive wing of the New Deal, integrated the labor movement once and for all into corporate strategy, and legitimized the policy of Soviet containment by any means necessary. This spate combined the zeal of influential Cold War liberals and testimonializing former Communists with the other elements, culminating in massive searches by the Federal Bureau of Investigation, employment blacklisting, union expulsions, the persecution of figures such as Alger Hiss, and the execution of the Rosenbergs.

A third wave of anticommunism coincided broadly with the Reagan administration, and had a basically different character. Though in part a reaction to the new social movements of the sixties, the fundamental thrust was external rather than toward eliminating the internal Red threat. In part this reflected the legacy of previous repression in a weakened Left and labor movement. However, the basic instrumental purpose was twofold: to overcome the "Vietnam syndrome" of reluctance to engage in anticommunist and imperial wars; and to legitimize the monstrous military expenditures that had been undertaken as a Keynesian stimulus to a stagnant economy. As in previous crusades, former liberals and radicals played a role. However, the cultural impetus of this phase was largely provided by a renascent religious Right and its attack on the modernizing sexual forces that had erupted in the sixties.

With the collapse of the Soviet system and the continuing enfeeblement of the domestic Left, anti-communism has seemingly run out of enemies. Clinton was the first president since 1948 to come to power without the aid of this ideology, and the years since 1992 have been marked by an inchoate rather than a focused demonology, as criminals, "narcoterorists," welfare recipients, teenage mothers, Latino immigrants, sexual minorities, people of color, alleged child molesters, and satanic cults have variously been inserted into the circuits of social paranoia. The enduring legacy of anticommunism remains in the loss of political intelligence, critical power, and simple hopefulness that afflicts the nation. Since, however, the basic injustices and contradictions that generated the history of anticommunism remain and indeed grow stronger despite all attempts to deflect consciousness away from them, we may be certain that this saga will continue.

ANTIFASCISM. One of the most important and certainly the most popular policies of the post-1920 Left, antifascism made possible in the late 1930s and World War II years an unprecedented coalition of Left sympathizers, from middle-class intellectuals to blue-collar immigrants. For a short time, it brought Communists a respectability they had not previously sought, one that would remain out of their grasp afterward.

Antifascism actually began more than a decade before the announcement of the Popular Front, in the Italian-American response to Mussolini's 1922 seizure of power. Communists, socialists, anarchists, and Wobblies sought to combine in local coalitions to propagandize against fascism and to mobilize against local pro-Mussolini demonstrations. These coalitions proved difficult to maintain (as did their sister movement, the Sacco-Vanzetti mobilizations of Italian-Americans), owing to internecine differences. Yet a range of participants, including Carlo Tresca and local Italian-American Communists, managed a rough working relationship through much of the 1920s–1930s. More directly, Italian-American antifascists, as individuals or in groups, confronted local fascist paraders with fists and clubs, driving them in many cases into private meetings.

American Socialists urged antifascist mobilizations, especially from the inception of Hitler's regime, but Communists in their ultra-Left phase (1928–1933) generally resisted cooperation and even engaged in sectarian sniping at Socialist events. With the Seventh Congress of the Comintern in 1935 and the articulation of a world antifascist policy, significant changes began. For a few years, Communist sectarianism continued to hold back appeals to fellow immigrants, to liberals, and (more pointedly) to their socialist rivals for antifascist solidarity. By 1936–1937, antifascism had become a defining purpose and a distinctive rhetoric.

When fully adopted, the appeal worked brilliantly. In virtually every eastern European community, it gathered fresh support behind the Communists. Across the intellectual and arts worlds, it gave Communists and their supporters a battle cry. The Spanish Civil War provided, for the moment, the epiphany. But the broad spirit of antifascism also acutely identified antiracism, anti-Semitism, and various xenophobic internal enemies of democracy in the United States as the local variants of fascism.

Antifascism had three great failings for the Left. First of all, it placed antiwar sentiment into abeyance and discredited the widespread mobilization in the early to mid-1930s against war-profiters capitalists and against the system that made them possible. This popular view, once eroded, would be most difficult to resurrect. Second, antifascism as practiced seemed aimed at preservation of the Western democracies in a world of non-whites still largely oppressed by colonialism and neocolonialism. Communists seemed to place aside the anti-imperialist clarion call so obvious in earlier years. Black nationalism within the United States, once seen sympathetically, was viewed as an obstacle to needed unity. Third, as a consequence of these and other shifts, the necessity for a socialist transformation tended to disappear from Communist plans and rhetoric. Once discussed unrealistically as a short-run possibility, socialism now all but vanished as an American prospect in the foreseeable future.

The Hitler-Stalin Pact reversed virtually all these policies, but only briefly and incompletely. Antifascist mobilization fell to others, such as the Socialist Workers Party, able to call successfully for demonstrations against mass meetings of the German-American Bund in New York and elsewhere. But as intellectuals and others deserted Communist ranks, they

Antifascism reached its apparent apex in the Second World War. Communist Party cooperation with the war effort, if not crucial to government success, was nonetheless very important in major industries and many ethnic communities. In the glare of antifascist solidarity, Communists helped to erect new sweeping alliances (such as the American Slav Congress) and revive old contacts. Beneath the surface of events, anticommunist (or Cold War) liberalism began to take shape with an anti-Russian antifascism, however. The return of Republicans to congressional control in 1942 marked the emergence of a conservative-liberal consensus that equated antifascism with free-enterprise "Americanism," linked Stalinsim and Hitlerism, and considered American Communists along with Fascists as potential traitors.

The decisive weakening of antifascist sentiment just following World War II foreshadowed the isolation and destruction of the Left. Communist efforts to point to the integration of erstwhile Nazi officials and collaborators into the governments of North Atlantic Treaty Organization member countries and the European agencies of the Central Intelligence Agency made little popular impression outside Jewish circles, and even here the empowered Cold War liberalism stoutly ignored the implications. Newer European immigrants to the United States, including many Nazi collaborators or sympathizers, helped reverse the tide of ethnic support built in antifascist days. U.S. investigative agencies now included antifascist organizations, present and past, under the rubric of Communist fronts. Spanish Civil War veterans, already known as "premature antifascists," were considered as nothing more than Communists or Communist dupes for opposing a dictator who became a staunch Cold War ally of the United States.

Later attempts to revive versions of anti-fascist style, against U.S. racism, South African apartheid, or even the fascist-sounding rhetoric of America's chosen Third World leaders, proved unsuccessful. Antiracism would prove an intermittently powerful sentiment, but the "lessons" of fascism were mired in a national memory confused with contradictory judgments that were slipping quickly away.

ANVIL/NEW ANVIL. The two Anvils were the most successful and vigorous among a group devoted to proletarian writing in the 1930s. Other such periodicals included Left Front (Chicago), Left Review (Philadelphia), Leftward (Boston), New Force (Detroit), Blast (New York), and Rebel Poet (northern Minnesota). One of the features of the Anvils was that they only published creative work—fiction and poetry—and no criticism. Editor Jack Conroy has written that his magazines were “rough-hewn and awkward, but bitter and alive from the furnace of experience—and from participants, not observers, in most instances.”

The first issue of Anvil (1932–1935) consisted of a thousand copies. While widely read by Left writers, the magazine increased circulation only modestly until an ill-fated merger with Partisan Review. That fusion proved so unsatisfactory to many Anvil contributors that they regrouped to issue twenty-five hundred copies of New Anvil (1939–1940), the first of what would be six issues. Poet-publisher Ben Haggland, who had produced Rebel Poet prior to the founding of Anvil, handprinted both magazines as well as played an editorial role.

The Anvils published many of the Left writers of the 1930s. New Anvil published Richard Wright for the first time and published stories of Erskine Caldwell considered “too hot” for the big-circulation magazines Caldwell had access to. J. D. Salinger had the dubious honor of having a story rejected but commented on the helpful rejection letter sent by Conroy. Among poets published by the magazines were John Malcolm Brinnin, Langston Hughes, Tom McGrath, Kenneth Patchen, and Karl Shapiro. Short story contributors included Nelson Algren, Caldwell, Conroy, August Derleth, Stuart Engstrand, James T. Farrell, Michael Gold, Meridel Le Sueur, William Carlos Williams, and Frank Yerby.

APPEAL TO REASON. No newspaper was as much identified with the early-twentieth-century socialist movement in America as the Appeal to Reason. Published from 1895 to 1922, the Appeal preceded the formation of the Socialist Party in 1901 and, more than any socialist institution, the weekly Appeal gave ongoing life, power, and sense of community to insurgent native-born radicals. Headquartered after 1896 in Girard, Kansas, the Appeal reached a paid circulation of over 760,000 in 1913, a figure that remains greater than any Left publication has reached since in America. During political campaigns and crises, copies of single issues reached 4.1 million—a world record, the paper's staff liked to comment, that broke totals the Appeal itself had earlier set. The Appeal succeeded at a time when millions of people spoke of the “cooperative commonwealth” with hope, expectation, and meaning.

The Appeal's primary purpose was to convert readers to socialism. If “common sense” and “an appeal to reason” had propelled an earlier American revolution, their reapplication, it was thought, would hasten the transition from capitalism to socialism. The Appeal's founder and publisher was J. A. Wayland. Born in Indiana, successively a printer, publisher, land speculator and capitalist, communitarian militant Socialist and propagandist, Wayland was harassed into suicide in 1912. Wayland had been converted to socialism by reading, and he and the Appeal staff explained socialism in a plain, passionate idiom that swelled the socialist ranks. The Appeal publicized all manner of social and economic injustice: if working conditions or a strike needed to be publicized in West Virginia or Colorado, the Appeal was there; if Milwaukee, Schenectady, and Butte were voting Socialist, Appeal correspondents reported the victories and the strategies that could be used elsewhere; and if states were without socialist papers, the Appeal made up and printed individual state and regional editions. A vital political advocate and radical institution rather than simply a newspaper, the Appeal community included an “Appeal Army” of men and women, eighty thousand at its highest point, who sold subscriptions and dropped extra copies at hotels and union halls—wherever the paper could be read. The Appeal published Marx, Engels, and Kautsky; Dickens, Ruskin, and William Morris; Upton Sinclair, Jack London, W. D. Howells, Kate Richards O'Hare, and Eugene Debs; as well as scores of American political and literary writers now little known or unknown to history.

Although never an official vehicle for the Socialist Party, the Appeal was nevertheless dependent on its fate. After Wayland's death and editor Fred Warren's departure, the paper was edited by Louis Kopelin and sold to Emanuel Haldeman-Julius, neither of whom had the editorial capacity, writing skills, or commitment to socialism of Wayland and Warren. When Socialists opposed World War I, American capitalism and its political institutions crushed domestic radicalism. The Appeal initially opposed World War I and America's participation in it, temporarily supported it in the form of the New Appeal, and then, with hostilities concluded, reverted back to its condemnation of World War I as a grim battle for economic supremacy between competing capitalist nations. The Appeal never regained its prewar vitality and closed in November 1922.

APTHEKER, HERBERT (b. 1915). One of the most prolific American historians of the twentieth century and longtime prominent member of the Central Committee of the Communist Party, Herbert Aptheker was born in Brooklyn, New York, and educated at Columbia University, where he received a B.S. in 1936 and a Ph.D. in 1943. He served in the U.S. Army artillery in Europe during World War II and was honorably discharged with the rank of major.

From the beginning of his career, Aptheker has been devoted to Afro-American history. His American Negro Slave Revolts (1943) has attained the status of a classic, and his three-volume Documentary History of the Negro People in the United States (1951–1994) is regarded as a landmark collection.

Into the 1950s Aptheker helped to edit the journal Masses and Mainstream, which was closely associated with the Communist Party. During this period he also attacked intellectual repression in volumes such as Laureates of Imperialism (1954) and Era of McCarthyism (1955). Some of his essays and books of this time were sharply polemical, such as The Truth about Hungary (1957). His World of C. Wright Mills (1960) was a friendly critique of the sociologist's ideas.

By the end of the 1950s, Aptheker began to publish a projected twelve-volume Marxist history of the United States. The series includes The Colonial Era (1959), The American Revolution (1960), and Early Years of the Republic (1976). He also completed books on the abolitionist movement and the Civil War.

During the 1960s, Aptheker was often invited to college campuses to represent the views of the Communist Party. From December 1965 to January 1966 at the invitation of North Vietnam, he took Tom Hayden and Staughton Lynd to North Vietnam. Upon their return from this trip, the group spoke frequently at protests against the war and in numerous forums. Aptheker described this experience in Mission to Hanoi (1966). He founded the American Institute for Marxist Studies in New York and edited its newsletter and series of publications for many years.

The crowning achievement of Herbert Aptheker's career has undoubtedly been his general editorship of the works of his friend W. E. B. Du Bois, for whom he has also served as literary executor. In addition to a bibliography of Du Bois's published work, published in 1973, he edited Du Bois's correspondence in three volumes (1973–1978) and his complete works in forty volumes, a project completed in 1986. Aptheker has continued to defend Du Bois's importance in the Harlem Renaissance, the black scholar movement, and the Pan-African movement, hailing him as "the father of the black intelligentsia."

ARAB AMERICANS. An estimated 100,000 Arabs immigrated to the United States between 1880 and 1910. By the 1980s Arab Americans numbered two to three million. Known as "Syrians," the early immigrants were mostly unskilled, semiliterate males, drawn mainly from the ranks of the landed peasantry in Ottoman-ruled Syria, Lebanon, and Palestine. Information on their involvement in worker movements is scant and subject to filtering by contemporary accounts. The early period is often romanticized by post-World War II accounts that project images of Arab immigrants as dry-goods peddlers or grocery store owners. The reality was that most worked in New England textile factories, Pittsburgh ironworks, and Detroit and Cleveland auto plants. The silk factories of Paterson and West Hoboken, New Jersey, are estimated to have employed eighty percent of the Arabs living in those cities. Arabs also found employment in farming as seasonal workers, truck farmers, and homesteaders in various parts of the country. Philip Hitti, the eminent Princeton historian, determined in 1924 that fully one-fourth of the seasonal agricultural workers in the vicinity of Oneida, New York, were Arabs.

These early immigrants could not have escaped the radical and socialist political currents of the times. This is partially borne out by reports of individual Arabs in various locales. In 1912, for example, an Arab striker was killed in the famous Lawrence strike led by the Industrial Workers of the World. In the 1930s Arab-American George Addes played a major role in the Left coalition within the leadership of the United Automobile Workers (UAW).

Significant waves of Arab organization occurred during the 1970s in Michigan and California, primarily among Yemeni workers, the least literate and skilled group of recent Arab immigrants. In August 1973 Naji Daifallah, a Yemeni farm worker active in the United Farm Workers Union, was brutally gunned down with another union organizer by a county sheriff. California had become, by then, a center for several thousand Yemeni farm workers.

Detroit and its nearby industrial suburbs remained the site of the largest community of Arabs in North America, including a sizable Arab working class. The 200,000-strong Detroit community was composed of Lebanese, Palestinian, Yemeni, Iraqi, and Egyptian immigrants and their descendants. During the October 1973 Arab-Israeli War, two thousand Arab workers protested the purchase of Israeli government bonds by the UAW. On 28 November 1973, a group calling itself the Arab Workers Caucus asked fellow autoworkers to boycott the production lines and attend a mass rally to protest the UAW's Israeli bond purchase. Production at one auto plant was severely hampered and two thousand workers gathered outside a dinner honoring then-UAW president Leonard Woodcock. Embarrassed company and union officials retaliated by disciplining and laying off hundreds of workers. These and other retaliations contributed to a lessening of Arab worker militancy in the 1980s.

Arab Americans in the late 1960s and 1970s formed several ethnic political organizations in response to issues and negative stereotypes emanating from the Arab-Israeli conflict. Headed mostly by professionals and academics, these organizations have become recognized as part of the American progressive community. Prominent among them are the American-Arab Anti-Discrimination Committee (ADC), founded by former senator James Abourezk, and the Association of Arab-American University Graduates. The most notable examples of the continuing tradition of individual activism are Palestinian-American scholar Edward W. Said, who is a member of the Palestine National Council, and ADC activist Alex Odeh, killed in an anti-Arab bomb blast in Santa Ana, California, on 11 October 1985.

ARBEITERBILDUNGSVEREINE, SOZIALISTISCHE SCHULVEREINE, ARBEITERHALLEN.

Characteristically, the German American socialists created many different types of organizations as alternatives to similar activities among nonsocialist groups. From the earliest days of the socialist movement, there were workers' gymnastic societies (Turner), singing societies, amateur theaters, and special organizations for socialist women. Fitting into these attempts at creating an alternative culture were the various efforts to provide educational opportunities compatible with socialist principles, including Arbeiterbildungsvereine (workers education associations), Sozialistische Schulvereine (socialist schools for children and adults), and Arbeiterhallen (large labor lyceums or workers' halls). As in Germany, such institutions represented attempts at self-help and self-education by peers, as well as havens of escape from the religiously and patriotically slanted education offered in the public schools, and opportunities to acquaint participants with the fundamentals of socialism. Networks of socialist schools for children were established by the socialists in most large industrial cities, often in cooperation with groups of Freidenker (free thinkers). For example, in New York there were approximately twelve such "freie deutsche Schulen" in 1890, established by members of the Sozialistische Arbeiter-Partei (Socialist Labor Party) and staffed mainly by women teachers. These schools had a twofold purpose: to familiarize the children of immigrants with German language and literature, thus preserving this part of their cultural heritage; and to acquaint them with basic socialist principles of economic and historical development. To this end, children from the socialist schools frequently participated in socialist festivals, presenting plays, songs, declamations, or gymnastic exercises.

In addition to these educational and recreational activities for children, Arbeiterbildungsvereine and Arbeiterlesezimmer (workers' reading rooms) were founded in most large cities by socialists or trade unionists to provide adults (primarily men) with a chance for further political education and self-improvement. In some cities (New York, Philadelphia) where the German working-class community was large enough to support such an effort, labor lyceums or workers' halls were established as centers for all the progressive workers' groups and unions of the city. Perhaps the largest and most important of these was the Brooklyn Labor Lyceum, which reported in 1889 that it served as a meeting place for twenty-eight various groups with a total of four thousand members. Such lyceums housed socialist schools for children and adults, along with party and trade union sections, and musical, theatrical, gymnastic, and other social groups. Also, they presented their own program of lectures and entertainment and provided space for large meetings and opportunities for socializing and communication.

ARBEITER KRANKEN- UND STERBEKASSE DER VEREINIGTEN STAATEN VON AMERIKA.

The organization called the Arbeiter Kranken- und Sterbekasse der Vereinigten Staaten von Amerika (Workmen's Sick and Death-Benefit Fund of the United States of America) was founded in New York in 1884 by a small group of Germans who had been forced into exile under the anti-socialist laws passed in Germany in 1878. Modeled after a similar fund in Hamburg-Altona, the organization grew from 116 members to approximately fifty thousand in 1937, and it had paid out over $20 million in benefits by that time. In that year, the fund held $4 million in reserve. Its primary purpose was to provide mutual aid for workers and protection from financial disaster in times of sickness and death. After enrolling, members were covered for all illnesses and accidents, pregnancy, and periods of up to one hundred weeks of sickness. Life insurance for adults and children was available, office visits to a physician were fully covered upon payment of a small additional charge, and a special fund protected members who became unable to pay their monthly fee. The fund was administered by officials who were elected every two years by the membership. Men and women of all professions, races, and nationalities were eligible for membership.

The fund was not limited to insurance purposes, for its members also conceived of it as part of the progressive workers' movement of the time. It maintained rest homes (Erholungshäuser) and homes for the elderly in several locations, and summer camps for children such as Camp Solidarity in Columbus, Ohio, and the Recreation Farm in Fosterdale, New York. These establishments functioned as gathering places for people of different ages who shared a common political point of view and commitment. Many branches of Krankenkasse maintained free German schools or participated in popular amateur theaters. The Krankenkasse also gave significant support to the German American working class and socialist press through direct financial support and through advertising. It published its own official organ, Solidarität, as a monthly from 1906 to 1954. This journal printed informational and feature articles and advocated the creation of an adequate social-security system and general measures to improve the situation of lower-income citizens.

ARBEITER-SÄNGERBUND DER VEREINIGTEN STAATEN. Although workers' singing societies were associated with the German American socialist movement from its beginnings in the 1860s and 1870s, it was in 1892 that the Arbeiter-Sängerbund der Nordöstlichen Staaten was formed as a central federation of these societies. It was followed in 1897 by the Arbeiter-Sängerbund des Nordwestens, centered in Chicago. Mid-Northern (Detroit) and Pacific regional organizations also existed. In the late 1920s these groups came together to form regional branches of the Arbeiter-Sängerbund der Vereinigten Staaten (Workers' Singing Societies of the United States). In terms of numbers, these singing societies were the most important cultural organization of the German American socialists. Approximately every three years, until the Second World War, each region held a singers' festival that could attract three to four thousand participants and a much larger audience. The repertoire for these concerts, which before World War I consisted almost solely of the songs of German Social Democracy and songs by German American socialist writers, with time drew more and more from the standard Liedertafel (song society) repertoire—Heimatlieder (homeland songs); Jägerlieder (hunting songs) and Trinklieder (drinking songs). However, although this trend came to dominate the larger national group, there were smaller local societies affiliated with the German American section of the Communist Party in the 1920s and 1930s, whose members continued to emphasize the performance of political, revolutionary workers' songs.

Socialists involved in these singing societies viewed both their repertoire and the close connections to the socialist political movement as necessary alternatives to what they saw as bourgeois or petit bourgeois culture. As was also the case with their theatrical groups, festivals, educational clubs, and schools, socialists found it imperative to break away from nonsocialist German American groups and establish a certain autonomy. With respect to singing societies, which were extremely popular among all classes of German Americans, socialists formed their own rather than join the large, more conservative Nordamerikanischer Sängerbund. In their press, socialists criticized the latter organization for its "philistinism," its indifference to progressive ideas and important social questions, and the presence of religious and non-democratic songs in its repertoire. As an alternative to this type of cultural organization, the workers' singing societies emphasized the singing of Freiheitslieder (freedom songs) within the context of the socialist movement, with the goals of providing alternative leisure opportunities to workers who might otherwise be attracted to the more conservative groups, and thus of winning more participants to the socialist movement. There is scattered evidence that a few singing societies required their members to join one of the parties they were connected to, but this generally does not seem to have been required. However, with their active and passive members in every city with a significant German American population, the singing societies encompassed a wide variety of people beyond the narrow circles of party membership and drew them into socialist political events. This is shown most clearly by the participation of workers' singing societies in festivals or meetings designed to raise money for the socialist press or other activities, and in turn, it was these joint performances that led to the formation of the citywide and regional federations.

Through the performance of Arbeiterlieder (workers' songs), these socialists had two complementary purposes in view, political influence and "aesthetic education." On the one hand, their goal was to expose social contradictions, to invest the working-class singers and audience with a sense of their rights, and to create feelings of solidarity, enthusiasm, and courage. On the other hand, through the artistic experience of performing choral works, socialists hoped to create an aesthetic sensibility, a sense for the "beautiful" and for "higher ideals." They viewed this goal as a viable function of performing music, in particular, which they hoped would then lead to moral and social improvements over the former vices of those people held at the lowest levels of the social pyramid. That is, they viewed the singing societies and their repertoire as a means to an end, as a means of creating a desired political response, but they also saw them as a way of furthering a contemplative attitude of appreciation for art in the participants. After World War I, the latter goal predominated as these singing societies became more and more similar to nonsocialist groups and as the sense of class identification dissipated as the ethnic group became more assimilated into the mainstream of American society.

ARMED STRUGGLE, 1960s–1970s. The organized American Left has always been wary of schemes involving or advocating armed struggle. This view stems from the conviction that political persuasion must be the central focus of radical education, organization, and agitation. Armed struggle, if necessary at all, would be the last stage of conflict, coming when the Left had an overwhelming popular mandate and was being kept from assuming political authority by a self-evident governmental abuse of military power. Short of this unlikely scenario, violence has been judged as likely to have a negative public-relations effect that only serves as a pretext for oppression of the Left as subversive and lawless. The frequent use of agents provocateurs by employers and the state has reinforced this perspective.

Radicals of the 1960s and 1970s largely held to the traditional Left view, but the mass media gave inordinate amounts of publicity to minuscule groups that advocated violent methods of one kind or another, and the media usually obscured the difference between self-defense and aggression. Almost all the violent incidents involving civil rights organizations were linked to self-defense. In the student, antiwar, counterculture, and New Left groups, violent tactics were a distinctly minority activity and mainly emerged as the movement began to wane.

From its onset the civil rights movement spotlighted courtroom battles and nonviolent resistance. Its goals were to fulfill constitutional rights, not to reject legitimate authority. The bulk of the Reverend Martin Luther King, Jr.'s followers may not have shared his philosophical belief in the redemptive power of nonviolence, but they did agree that nonviolent resistance was the most effective political tactic. Even in the face of incredible police and vigilante violence, extending from beatings to bombings and assassinations, the movement retained its nonviolent orientation until the late 1960s.

Although King's views and tactics dominated the movement, they had always been contested. One of the earliest challenges came from Robert Williams, who had served as a marine in Korea and in 1959 was head of the Monroe, North Carolina, chapter of the National Association for the Advancement of Colored People (NAACP). Williams stressed the constitutional right of self-defense and organized armed units to protect civil rights workers. An incident in 1961 moved the debate with King to newspaper headlines. The federal government charged that Williams had kidnapped a white couple during a racial incident. Williams maintained that he saved the couple from an angry black mob. As the dispute unfolded and a long prison term for Williams seemed likely, he fled the United States, finding sanctuary first in Cuba and then in China. From these locations he published a newsletter titled the Crusader, which urged and described various forms of armed struggle that went beyond self-defense to guerrilla war.

Williams's ideas inspired the creation of the semi-clandestine Revolutionary Action Movement (RAM), which advocated an amalgam of black nationalist and Marxist views. RAM had some momentary influence in the Atlanta office of the Student Nonviolent Coordinating Committee (SNCC), among founders of the League of Revolutionary Black Workers, and in various groups in the Philadelphia area. RAM never attracted a large membership and retained a low profile, but it was consistently cited in reports of the Federal Bureau of Investigation as the kind of militant organization that must be kept under the strictest surveillance and destabilized as soon as possible.

The progression made by Williams from self-defense to guerrilla war was not inevitable. The Deacons for Defense, which organized in Louisiana in 1964, remained a group that simply protected the black community and its militant leadership from outside assault. The Deacons encouraged the formation of similar independent groups and in many areas this occurred even if the self-defense units had no name or formal structure. Activists in SNCC and the Congress of Racial Equality became disillusioned with nonviolent resistance as a philosophical concept relatively early in the struggle, and some began to carry weapons even though continuing to practice nonviolent tactics. Famous media personalities taking part in demonstrations in the South or appearing at rallies often carried weapons, sometimes with legal permits, sometimes not.

The black nationalist wing of the liberation movement never accepted nonviolence as a strategy, holding that self-defense was a moral and a constitutional right. The Nation of Islam under the practical leadership of Malcolm X became renowned for its defense units even though it rarely became involved in violent clashes. Other nationalist groups, such as the New Republic of Africa, which originated in Detroit, clashed with police repeatedly in incidents that sometimes resulted in death. Such groups insisted that the incidents were provoked by the police in an attempt to wipe out organizational nuclei. The view that united the various nationalist groups was that the white power structure of America was not morally redeemable and that white people would only "behave" or "get right" when faced with physical force comparable to their own.

Any assertion of the right of self-defense got considerable media coverage. A photo flashed around the nation in April 1969 showed Cornell University students armed with shotguns and strapped with bandoleers demonstrating for their constitutional rights. This brandishing of weapons in public got its greatest exposure on the West Coast with the formation of the Black Panther Party (BPP). Based in youth gangs and having an agenda of organizing the subproletariat or "street people," the BPP was adamant on self-defense and hinted that a little violence might be appropriate to speed the course of freedom.

The BPP outfitted its youth in quasi-military black berets and leather jackets, and it raised one of the most unfortunate slogans of the era: "Off the pig." Street language of the time rendered off as a substitute for kill and pig meant cops. BPP leaders defended the slogan as symbolic language that meant the black community demanded an end to police abuse. Most police and the media took the slogan literally. Violent incidents with law enforcement groups, other black liberation groups, and with the immediate community plagued the BPP throughout its heyday. When the organization shattered in the early 1970s, BPP leaders were recorded making death threats to one another over the phone. Deaths, in fact, had resulted in a clash within the US organization of Los Angeles, and on 4 December 1969 Chicago BPP leader

Fred Hampton was killed in a highly controversial raid by Chicago police. A year earlier, following a BPP trial in Oakland, the courthouse had been bombed in an act attributed to a Persian exile supposedly in league with the BPP. In the wake of these and other incidents, the BPP was often perceived by friend and foe as a nascent guerrilla organization.

A widely used phrase by many black activists was the ambiguous “by any means necessary.” This formulation was often depicted as code for the willingness to use violence. Despite its somewhat ominous overtones, such an assertion was almost obligatory. A mass movement was battling for its constitutional rights through constitutional means. If the system ultimately betrayed its own principles and proved unreformable, the option had to be left open to proceed to other forms of rebellion. Malcolm X put the issue most dramatically with his battle cry, “The ballot or the bullet.”

The black masses ran out of patience with the system long before the official movement did and the reaction was stronger in the North than in the South. Riots in Harlem (1964) followed by the Watts Rebellion (1965) going through to the Newark and Detroit insurrections (1967) and dozens of outbreaks following the murder of King (1968) were the costliest in U.S. history. A new aspect of these disturbances was that unlike previous riots that had mainly pitted one race against another, the 1960s’ violence was usually directed against property. In Detroit, site of the most extensive rioting, blacks and whites in many areas looted stores side by side. Arrest records show that more whites than blacks were apprehended for shooting at police. These violent outbursts, if anything, attested to the moderate nature of the means advocated by the major civil rights organizations.

One of the most violence-prone sectors of the movement was that involving black convicts. The BPP and sections of the Left tried to politicize black inmates by distributing free literature, taking up individual cases, and occasionally becoming involved in educational programs conducted behind bars. Reviving language from the early 1900s, some political groups began to refer to inmates as “class-war prisoners.” Sometimes this was reserved for class-conscious prisoners whatever the reason for their incarceration but generally it was used to describe all nonwhite convicts.

Prison writers like George Jackson in California argued that the economic system had led them to their antisocial behavior and that jails systematically encouraged racism and brutalized nonwhites. Jackson set up a prison unit of the BPP. His posthumously published Blood in My Eye is dedicated thusly: “To the black Communist youth—To their fathers—We will now criticize the unjust with the weapon.” Jackson was the object of a failed armed-rescue attempt by his brother and was subsequently killed on 21 August 1971 by San Quentin guards in an incident still shrouded in controversy. Communist Angela Davis would be catapulted to international fame through her involvement with Jackson and his defense committee.

The Attica Prison uprising of 1971 further reflected the militancy of urban blacks and activist prisoners. The Left charged that it was no accident that the violent repression of the riot at the order of Governor Nelson Rockefeller resulted in the death of almost all the politically active prisoner leaders. Shortly thereafter the Left led the resistance to the attempt by New York State to open a facility dedicated to behavior modification programs that would include electric shock treatments and possibly lobotomies. The leader of the prisoner resistance was Martin Sostre, a black Puerto Rican who had run a radical bookstore in Buffalo but was in jail on drug charges he called a frame-up. Also active in the anti-behavior modification campaign were committees supporting Puerto Rican militants and a defense group formally headed by Angela Davis and under the day-to-day leadership of Communist Charlene Mitchell. The state’s plan was defeated and Sostre was eventually released from prison after efforts on his behalf by Philip Berrigan and Amnesty International.

The interaction of political militants and individuals with a criminal history led to a blurring of whether some acts were politically or criminally motivated. A number of armed-car and bank robberies on the East Coast were said to be the work of black or Puerto Rican revolutionaries seeking funds for the movement. The most famous of these involved the “Black Liberation Army” led by Joanne Chesimard. Rarely was it possible to definitely judge if the political purpose claimed was an attempt by superficially politicized robbers to gain public sympathy, a device of the authorities to discredit the civil rights movement, or a genuine guerrilla action.

The most problematic example of this phenomenon was the emergence on the West Coast of the Symbionese Liberation Army (SLA). Like most of the so-called armies, the SLA seems to have had no more than a dozen members and perhaps as few as eight. Some had radical histories but there was no organizational link to any preexisting Left group. The SLA gained fame out of all proportion to its acts when it kidnapped media heiress Patty Hearst in 1974 and momentarily converted her to its views. Most of the SLA personnel were killed in police assaults in which little effort was made to take live prisoners. Hearst pleaded that her brief career as a revolutionary bank robber had been the result of "brainwashing" and she soon returned to the kind of life she had led before the kidnapping. Many Left and counterculture newspapers of the time believed that the SLA was the creation of the government. Only seventeen months elapsed between its first appearance and its demise.

Documents obtained through the Freedom of Information Act and evidence surfacing at various trials have shown that many violent plots were, in fact, the work of police "Red squads" or federal security agencies. A case in point was the attempt to blow up the Statue of Liberty in the early 1960s. The instigator of the plot who recruited conspirators in the New York's Lower East Side radical hangouts was in the pay of the police from the start. Others involved in the plot would reappear in other cases of like nature. The New York Police Department has also acknowledged that it controlled the central staff of the local BPP from the first day it opened an office in Harlem. Any violent plots attributed to that milieu would, at the very least, have been known about from their earliest genesis.

Two New York Panthers convicted of violent crimes presented new evidence in the late 1980s that they had been framed. Herman Ferguson had been convicted in 1968 for being part of a conspiracy to murder moderate civil rights leaders Roy Wilkins (NAACP) and Whitney Young (Urban League). He had jumped bail and fled to Guyana, where he became a citizen under a new name. Ferguson voluntarily returned to the United States in 1989 to establish his innocence. Central to his defense was evidence in newly released documents from the counterintelligence program set up by J. Edgar Hoover to destabilize militant organizations. Imprisoned Richard (Dhoruba) Moore sought a reversal of a twenty-five-year-to-life conviction for machine-gunning two policemen in 1973. He cited the same federal documents as Ferguson, but even more important to his case were passages from a book written by former deputy police commissioner Robert Daley stating that prosecutors had concealed evidence that could have exonerated him. The two cases were among many cited by civil libertarians to indicate that federal and local authorities had used charges of violence to systematically fabricate conspiracies and frame black militants in an effort to dismantle the civil rights movement.

The course toward violent acts within the New Left followed a different pattern. While most organization against poverty, racism, and the war in Vietnam employed conventional methods, there was always a revolutionary undertow expressed in admiration for developments in Cuba and China. Rhetoric, however, ran far ahead of action. Although a scattering of very small groups called for "Victory for the Vietcong," the dominant slogan in the antiwar movement of the early 1960s was the decidedly mild "Negotiations Now," which then shifted in the late 1960s to a more demanding but quite reasonable "End the War" and "Bring the Boys Home."

As sentiment against the war deepened and significant counterculture communities emerged in urban and university centers, the government became ever more adamant in insisting that it would not be swayed by mass demonstrations or resistance to the draft. The more militant ranks of the antiwar movement responded with the call "Bring the War Home." For some that simply meant nonviolent means must be escalated until politics- and business-as-usual became untenable. For others the slogan suggested that the American power elite would only listen when it began to suffer physical losses on the home front.

By late 1966 in places such as New York City and the San Francisco Bay area, segments of demonstrations began to break away from the main body to rampage through the streets. At the first mammoth peace parade led by Martin Luther King, Jr., thousands of demonstrators followed the lead of marchers from Harlem and a contingent dedicated to liberation movements around the world to bolt the Central Park staging area and romp along avenues the police had prohibited to the official parade. No violence ensued from this "taking of the streets," but the precedent was set for smaller groups to do as they wished during mass rallies. Thereafter any large demonstration was likely to have breakaway groups that tried to demolish army recruiting booths or shatter the windows of banks and major corporations. This was called "trashing." Parade organizers did all they could to discourage the phenomenon but "trashing" became increasingly popular and acceptable.

Concurrent with the trashing tendency was a rash of bombing incidents. These were directed at military installations, pylons holding power lines, courthouses, university war research centers, and corporate offices. The bombings were usually carried out in a way that only affected property, but in some instances caretakers and passersby were hurt or killed. The bombings were the work of a variety of independent and extremely small groups, most numbering half a dozen persons or less.

The bombings had a mixed reception from activists. There was some satisfaction that the antiwar effort was finally "getting serious," particularly among those unhappy with the "flower power" and pacifist components of the movement. At the same time there was considerable apprehension that violent acts would alienate a general public that had been growing more receptive. Over the years as various bomb cells were caught or surrendered, the individuals involved usually stated that they had not been particularly concerned about building a mass movement. They frequently compared themselves with those Germans who had worked against the Nazis in the 1930s and 1940s.

By far the most important and largest group of this kind was the Weatherman faction that formed within Students for a Democratic Society (SDS). In contrast to rival factions calling for stronger ties with workers and the poor, Weatherman considered the American public to be substantially corrupted by the economic prosperity generated by the military-industrial complex and hopelessly confused by anti-communist sentiment. The only honorable recourse was thought to be a guerrilla war that supported the revolutionaries in Vietnam and elsewhere, whatever the immediate political cost in the United States. This strategy was also considered to be a means of connecting with the most militant sectors of the black movement, which Weatherman thought would also gravitate to armed struggle. Mark Rudd and Bernardine Dohrn became the best-known Weather spokespersons.

Weatherman set out to create incidents that would result in police repression. They believed a persecuted movement would then split and the most militant fighters would become part of the Weather underground. The first major manifestation of this approach was the Chicago Days of Rage in 1969, which were billed as a movement accounting for the police riot of the previous year during the Democratic convention. Weather activists and supporters mounted demonstrations and parades focused around large city parks and engaged the police in violent confrontations. In the following weeks Weather units appeared in various cities to create incidents designed to put the local SDS chapters under tremendous public and government pressure. This course of action proved disastrous, alienating most individuals not only from SDS and Weatherman but from political activism of any kind.

The decline of Weatherman thinking was sealed by the town house explosion of March 1970, in which Weather cadre who were working on making bombs accidentally set off an explosion that killed or maimed most of those present. A sinister aspect of the incident was the revelation that the group had been producing antipersonnel bombs as part of its arsenal. The surviving Weatherpeople carried on a score of bombings and other unlawful acts, but their support and activity fell off rapidly. The greatest revolutionary skill demonstrated was the ability to avoid arrest. Most remained underground for a decade only to resurface voluntarily in the 1980s with the admission that their strategies had been erroneous.

A number of affinity groups that did not gain the notoriety of Weatherman were also prone to guerrilla tactics. Among the most visible was Up against the Wall, Motherfuckers, organized on the Lower East Side of New York by anarchist Ben Morea. The group's objective was to achieve de facto control of its region of the city. Based on a core of about a dozen persons but able to attract considerable community support for any given action, the group was a kind of leftist street gang that operated in the area of Saint Mark's Place and Second Avenue for approximately a year. The group became involved with drugs, frequently clashed with police, alienated potential allies with strongarm methods, and collapsed with the demise of the larger student New Left movement. Similar groups appeared briefly in other localities at various times between 1968 and 1971.

Closer to the Weatherman model were affinity groups like the seven or so individuals led by Raymond Luc Levasseur in Ohio. Beginning in 1968 they were thought to have bombed a score of corporate, government, and military structures. Police also accused them of robbing banks to finance their efforts and bankroll aboveground groups they supported. At various trials Levasseur, without admitting or denying any specific acts, linked his group's activities to the "international war against imperialism." Similar groups existed on the fringes of the Puerto Rican independence movement and various radical centers. Their ideological orientation tended to be toward the considerable literature on armed struggle and urban guerrilla warfare then appearing in Latin America.

Operating under a cruder strategy was the Fuerzas Armadas de Liberación Nacional (FALN; Armed Forces of National Liberation), a small group dedicated to Puerto Rican independence. The FALN, operating in an area from Chicago to New York and Boston, was believed to have been involved in a hundred bomb incidents throughout the 1970s. Unlike other groups using bombs, the FALN seemed unconcerned about harming innocents. In 1974 the FALN placed a bomb that killed four and wounded fifty-four persons dining at Fraunces Tavern, a Wall Street restaurant-bar. A bitter irony was that the four dead were Puerto Rican secretaries on a lunch break. The group became inactive in the 1980s after the government captured or identified most of its cadre.

Established Marxist organizations shunned armed struggle. Communists and members of the Socialist Workers Party were often derided by militant antiwar demonstrators for being allied with the pacifists and "doing the man's work" when they struggled to maintain order at mass demonstrations. Smaller Marxist groups like Youth against War and Fascism and the Progressive Labor Party tried to create a more dynamic image for themselves, but they, too, assailed provocations and violence as "adventurism." With the exception of the 1979 Communist Workers Party shootout with the Ku Klux Klan in Greensboro, North Carolina, Marxist organizations managed to avoid armed confrontations and loose talk of armed insurrection.

Given the frequency with which the word revolution was evoked and the considerable anger, frustration, fear, and rebellion within the various mass movements, the amount of New Left violence was remarkably small. As was the case in the movement for black liberation, many of those who advocated confrontational policies and denounced other strategies as "selling out" proved to be police agents. The antiwar movement had activated hundreds of thousands of Americans and at one time SDS claimed 150,000 members. In contrast, the total number of those who participated in armed struggle remained in the low hundreds. The next phase of radical activism would not involve guerrilla war but an attempt to form a new Communist Party based on the strictest adherence to Marxist-Leninist principles. One of the tenets of the new movement that would involve thousands of activists was an echo of that of the established Marxist groups: that advocates of immediate armed struggle in the United States must be regarded as either infantile leftists or agents provocateurs.

ARMENIAN AMERICANS. Large numbers of Armenians immigrated to the United States in the late nineteenth and early twentieth centuries. Most of them came from the Ottoman Empire, fleeing the persecutions and massacres of 1895–1896 and 1908, and finally, the 1915 Armenian genocide. Many of these immigrants, especially those who were educated and lived in cities, were influenced by the cultural and political awakening of the Armenian people that had taken place in the nineteenth century in Western (Turkish) and Eastern (Russian) Armenia, dominated during this period by the Ottoman and Russian Empires, respectively.

In the 1880s and 1890s politicized Armenians in the Turkish- and Russian-dominated homeland, disillusioned by the broken promises of the major Western powers (England, France, and Germany) to guarantee them cultural and political autonomy—the question of complete independence and sovereignty was not raised at this time—began the formation of political parties for the achievement of their goals. The two major groups established in the late nineteenth century were the Social Democrat Hunchak Party (Hunchaks) and the Armenian Revolutionary Federation (Dashnaks).

Founded in Geneva in 1887, the Hunchaks were influenced by Marxist thought, the party being the first Armenian socialist organization. Their energies were directed at Turkish Armenia as the most oppressed sector of the historic homeland. They believed that only through revolution and an international socialist perspective could the historic homeland be liberated. On the other hand, the Dashnaks, founded in Tiflis (modern Tbilisi, Georgia) in 1890, had a much more nationalistic perspective. Their goal for the liberation of the historic homeland was envisaged in the context of a sovereign nation-state rather than a world federation of socialist states (which the Hunchaks advocated). However, the two organizations were able to cooperate in certain political activities, since both advocated the accomplishment of their goals through revolutionary means (political agitation, violence when and if necessary, illegal action, etc.)

Both the Hunchaks and Dashnaks established branches of their respective political organizations in the United States in the 1890s. Since Worcester, Massachusetts, was the first Armenian center on the East Coast, it was in that city that the first Hunchak (1890) and Dashnak (1895–1896) branches were established. As the Hunchak Party was a member of the Second International, many of its members cooperated with the American Socialist Party. In 1906 the Socialist Armenian Organization of the United States was founded. At first affiliated with the left wing of the Socialist Party, this group eventually was absorbed into the Communist Party.

World War I brought new hope to both the Armenian nationalists and socialists. The nationalists, led by the Dashnaks, pinned their hopes and aspirations on the Allied powers. Their party was able to establish a short-lived independent Armenian state in Transcaucasia between 1918 and 1920, that was oriented toward the Allies. The socialists, led by the Hunchaks, Armenian Bolsheviks, and others, looked to the newly formed Soviet state for help in attaining their goal of a liberated socialist Armenia. Invaded by Kemalist Turkey and pressured by the Soviets, the Dashnak-led Republic of Armenia collapsed and was replaced by a soviet socialist republic in November 1920, with the full support of the Hunchaks and Armenian Bolsheviks.

After World War I and the collapse of the Second International, the socialist movement split, and Socialist and Communist parties were formed throughout the world. In 1921, with the fusion of two groups, America's Communist Party was formed, and, as noted above, the Socialist Armenian Organization of the United States united with it. In the same year the Communist Party established an Armenian bureau that carried on agitation work among more than fifty thousand Armenian-American workers. Owing to the activities of Armenian Communists, an "Armenian Labor Union" was formed in 1921 and tried to persuade Hunchaks and Armenian workers to join. This in turn led to the formation of the Armenian Labor Party in 1922. In 1923 this party joined with the Hunchaks in founding the Armenian Federation of the American Workers Party, which fell apart soon after its inception.

The internal conflicts of the Communist Party in the 1920s and the subservience of the Party to the Soviet Union and Stalin in the 1930s had a profound effect on its national sections, including the Armenian, so much so that by the beginning of World War II these sections were no longer operative. With the disintegration of the Armenian section of the Communist Party, a group of former members, uniting with Armenians sympathetic to the Soviet Union and to communist ideology, formed the Armenian Progressive League (Progressives) in 1938. This organization supported the efforts of the Soviet Union in its fight against fascism in World War II, as well as being an ardent defender of the Armenian Soviet Socialist Republic.

Since the 1950s there has been a general dearth of Left politics and activities among Armenian Americans. This has been due in part to the generally conservative nature of recent decades and in part to the profound changes that have taken place in the Armenian socialist and communist organizations. The Hunchaks, owing to ethnocentric and ideological pressures, have tended to de-emphasize socialism and instead have promoted Armenianism, conforming to the nationalistic ideology of the two other major Armenian political parties, the Dashnaks and the Ramkavars (Ramkavar Freedom Party), a bourgeois-liberal organization. These organizations publish a number of papers, both Armenian and English, in this country. The Hunchaks publish a weekly called Massis (Ararat) on the West Coast and a monthly, Er-itassard Hayastan (Young Armenia), on the East Coast (both in Armenian). The Dashnaks publish a daily called Asbarez (Combat) on the West Coast and a daily, Hairenik (Fatherland), on the East Coast (both in Armenian, with Asbarez having an English section), as well as an English weekly called the Armenian Weekly. The Ramkavars publish a daily called Baikar (Struggle) in Armenian, as well as an English weekly called the Armenian Mirror Spectator. The progressives publish a weekly called Lraper (Reporter) in Armenian and English, and both they and the Hunchaks are unique (among long-established radical groups of immigrants in the United States) in having been revived to a degree by a new influx of recent Left-minded refugees, immersed in Armenian language and culture.

With the demise of the Soviet Union and the formation of an independent Armenian state in Transcaucasia in September 1991, two of the major diasporan Armenian parties (Hunchaks and Dashnaks) began to establish branches in the homeland. Under these circumstances very strong ties have been forged between the American sections of these organizations and those of the fledgling Republic of Armenia.

ARONSON, JAMES. See National Guardian.

ARTEF. A Yiddish workers' theater company existing from 1925 to 1940, ARTEF combined left-wing politics, Soviet-inspired aesthetics, and Jewish folk culture into innovative productions that drew large Jewish immigrant audiences while influencing the New York theatrical scene of that period. Begun during a period when the Jewish Left was in its heyday, the founders of the ARTEF, the Arbeiter Theater Verband (Workers Theater Group), sought to create a theater in Yiddish, reflecting the lives and struggles of the Jewish working class. They also set high dramatic standards, hoping to provide an alternative to the popular commercial Yiddish theater of "Second Avenue," which they derided for its vaudevillesque, off-color, melodramatic style.

Following up efforts of the Yiddish communist daily, the Freiheit, to establish a dramatic studio, a group of young workers, led first by Jacob Mestel and then joined by Benno Schneider of the Soviet Jewish folk troupe Habima, spent three years (1925–1928) undergoing intense dramatic training. Known as the "ARTEF Studio," they began with twenty-six students who worked days and studied nights and weekends, supporting the studio's costs largely from their day jobs as shop workers.

From this, an Actors Collective was formed, producing its first play, By the Gate, in 1928. Praised by New York theater critics, it was criticized by Communist Party cultural officials for emphasizing Jewish folk themes over the "ideals of class struggle." Nevertheless, the ARTEF was closely associated with the Communist Party's Jewish Bureau, receiving the bulk of its audience and publicity through affiliate organizations. This support was crucial, as the more moderate, social democratic Jewish organizations, such as the Jewish Daily Forward, banned ARTEF reviews and advertising, while the Hebrew Actors Union denied affiliation to ARTEF members.

The ARTEF was strongly influenced by Soviet theater, incorporating styles of Stanislavsky, Vakhtangov, and Meyerhold, and combining elements of realism, naturalism, impressionism, and agitprop. Dramatic emphasis was on the actors' ensemble as opposed to "stars," integrating dance, music, and song, set off by modernist, multilayered scenic design by M. Solator-eff. Along with regular performances in several New York theaters, the ARTEF toured major cities, including Philadelphia, Boston, Montreal, and Toronto.

While the ARTEF saw its mission as educating the Jewish working class to left-wing ideology, its overriding commitment to high dramatic standards and experimental forms resulted in its recognition as a popular Yiddish "art theater" that also attracted leading figures of the American theater. Most of its plays dealt with the conditions of Jewish life in eastern Europe, adapted from stories by popular Yiddish writers such as Shalom Aleichem. Its other plays were taken from the Soviet stage. Of the eighteen plays presented to 1937, only two dealt with conditions of the Jewish American worker, and these were considered dramatic failures.

By 1940 the ARTEF folded. Improved conditions of the late 1930s removed the pressing social issues of the Depression and receptivity to radical ideas. A number of ARTEF actors left the company, joining the Federal Theater Project of the Works Progress Administration. The ARTEF's move to a larger theater in the mid-1930s raised operating costs, which they couldn't cover. The biggest factor was the Hitler-Stalin Pact of 1939, which alienated a large portion of their Jewish audience because of their association with the Communist Party.

ART MOVEMENTS. Certain conditions had to exist before art movements connected to or expressive of the American Left could come into being. First, artists had to experience and be conscious of the external economic, political, and social conditions that the Left political movement was either exposing or attempting to reform and overthrow; and second, there had to be a large art-conscious audience and patronage in order to encourage the efforts of the artists and, when necessary, offer political and ideological leadership.

In the last quarter of the nineteenth century American artists such as John Ferguson Weir and Thomas Anshutz painted industrial workers, but no one attempted an ambitious critique of the capitalist system until Robert Koehler painted The Strike in 1886. By upbringing and inclination he was a product of the socialist movement. His parents were sympathetic to radical ideas when they emigrated from Germany to Milwaukee during Koehler's childhood; later, returning to Germany to complete his art training, he was drawn to socialist ideas. In 1885 he showed The Socialist at the National Academy of Design—a picture depicting a fiery orator vehemently gesticulating to make a political point. The following year he exhibited The Strike at the National Academy. This painting was the first to depict not just the dignity of labor (a concept that emerged during the rise of the bourgeoisie) but class struggle, as a group of workers gather to confront the factory owner. Koehler realistically shows many degrees of commitment, from militant anger to puzzled questioning among workers and their wives, with the more firmly committed strikers arguing with others in order to achieve solidarity. Harper's Weekly reproduced The Strike as a centerfold in its issue of 1 May 1886, the day designated by labor leaders across the country for a general strike for the eight-hour day.

During the Progressive era (1890-1920), liberal-minded patrons increasingly paid attention to images of immigrants, child laborers, and industrial workers, particularly those seen in the photographs of the reforming social photographers Jacob Riis and Lewis Hine. Whereas Riis's photographs often reinforced the widely held belief that the slums could breed criminality, Hine focused on the dignity of poverty and documented working conditions that needed correction. Conservative patrons particularly appreciated more upbeat pictures, ones of workers shown in harmonious relationship with management and the machinery of industry. Edwin Austin Abbey designed a large mural, The Spirit of Vulcan, the Genius of the Workers in Iron and Steel, executed between 1904 and 1908, for the State Capitol rotunda in Harrisburg, Pennsylvania. In 1911 Everett Shinn painted a mural for the City Hall council chambers of Trenton, New Jersey, representing steel production and pottery making, both important industries of the state.

The images that came closest to a content of class struggle appeared in the popular press. Shinn was one of the Philadelphia newspaper artists who along with George Luks, William Glackens, and John Sloan had followed their mentor, realist painter Robert Henri, to New York City at the turn of the century. Like Henri, they undertook to show in their paintings (as they had in their newspaper illustrations) the "spirit of the people" rather than labor per se. Dubbed the "black revolutionary gang" when they showed together as "The Eight" in 1908 at the Macbeth Gallery in New York, they diverted American painting away from academic impressionism to "ashcan realism," even though few of their paintings sold. There was not yet an audience for fine arts paintings that celebrated "the other half."

Political ideologies then in currency affected the new subject matter. Henri was a philosophical anarchist; Sloan, the most talented, joined the Socialist Party in 1908. Sloan consciously declined to put "propaganda" into his art; he was not about to carry on the tradition of Koehler. Yet he did not hesitate to draw vivid graphic cartoons of the class struggle for the New York Call and the Masses, the radical monthly edited by Max Eastman. Sloan was, in fact, the unpaid art editor of the Masses from about 1913 through 1915, after which his involvement waned along with his withdrawal from Socialist Party activities.

While the audience of the Masses was limited to middle-class radicals and bohemians, other New York intellectual impresarios attempted to reach out to a broad audience through exhibitions. John Weichsel, a Polish émigré who wrote on aesthetics and taught engineering at the Hebrew Technical Institute, founded the People's Art Guild in early 1915. The purpose of the guild was to overcome the elitism of artists and to educate the masses who might be moved toward their own creative self-expression by good artistic examples. To this end, the guild mounted over fifty exhibitions in its first two seasons in settlement houses, public libraries, newspaper offices, Young Men's Hebrew Associations, and coffee-houses in the Bronx and on the Lower East Side. The climax came with the exhibition of eighty-nine artists and over three hundred works held in the offices of the New York Jewish Daily Forward in May 1917. The guild folded in 1918, but during its heyday its membership included Henri and Sloan (who was given one of his first solo exhibitions under guild sponsorship) along with early American modernists John Marin, Max Weber, Marsden Hartley, Charles Demuth, and Stuart Davis, all committed at that time to the proposition of bringing art to the people.

The first self-conscious "movement" of Left artists can be dated to October 1929—not because of the stock market crash (which occurred that month), but because a group of Communist Party artists, writers, and their sympathetic friends, meeting informally in the offices of the New Masses for discussions about the function of art in the revolutionary class struggle, decided to rent their own space and to form their own club. Called the John Reed Club, its aims were: ". . . The development of a cultural movement dedicated to advancing the interests of the working class . . . [and] the defense of the achievements of the Union of Soviet Socialist Republics [and] the development of new working-class writers and artists, as well as alignment of all artists, writers, and intellectuals to the side of the revolutionary working class, stimulating their participation in revolutionary activity."

Members of the John Reed Club, including the artist-cartoonist William Gropper, traveled to the Second World Plenum of the International Bureau of Revolutionary Literature held in Kharkov, USSR, in November 1930. They returned with suggestions for a cultural program along the lines of the experimental, Proletcult movement—a program of Marxist theory and practice—to bring art to the people and encourage art of the people. Soon John Reed Clubs sprang up across the country, and a convention was held in 1932, representing eleven such clubs. The John Reed Club artists put on exhibitions of socially concerned art, some of which traveled to workers' clubs and to the Soviet Union. The New York club even started its own art school, which included as instructors Nicolai Cikovsky, Anton Refregier, Louis Lozowick, and Raphael Soyer. Although the Communist Party influenced their political activities, many John Reed Club artists maintained to this writer that a Party "line" was rarely imposed on their art, since the spirit of individualism exerted a strong force. As might be expected, the most consistently "revolutionary" content is found in the graphics of the period.

The clubs were disbanded in the winter of 1935, in line with the Communist Party's new Popular Front policy, formulated in August 1935 at the Seventh World Congress of the Communist International, which called for broad alliances with other socialist and democratic groups to fight against fascism. The new line was incompatible with the John Reed Clubs, which had been associated with a more narrowly political outlook.

When the John Reed Clubs folded, artists turned their attention to the American Artists' Congress, an organization formed in the fall of 1935 to include acknowledged professional artists of all political persuasions. At that time the goal was to organize for a large conference later held in February 1936 in New York City. The theme of the conference was the struggle against war, fascism, and, as artist Stuart Davis stated, "every manifestation of war-mongering reaction." The published papers, First American Artists' Congress (1936), constitute an important document of the times. The congress, which put on exhibitions and was a significant forum for ideas, continued until early 1940 when a faction of the membership forced a split over the issue of the Russian invasion of Finland.

Crucial to the Left art movement's success throughout the 1930s was an audience and a patronage favorable to these artists of social issues. The audience consisted of great numbers of the urban intelligentsia: critics, dealers, curators, and labor unionists as well, all of whom encouraged the expression of revolutionary ideas in art. New public patronage also benefited such artists. By the mid-1930s the government had thousands of needy artists on its payrolls through such programs as the Federal Art Project of the Works Progress Administration (or, for photographers, the Farm Security Administration). In return, artists such as Allan Rohan Crite, Philip Evergood, Jacob Lawrence, Jack Levine, and Alice Neel periodically submitted artwork or taught in community art schools. Through these programs hundreds of thousands of artworks (murals, easel paintings, sculpture, posters, prints) found their way to hospitals, post offices, municipal and federal buildings, schools, and airports, where they could be viewed by the broadest spectrum of people. This experience of having a common employer—the government—contributed to the artists' camaraderie and identification with workers. (However, by the end of the 1930s these programs were under attack by Red-baiting congressmen such as Martin Dies of Texas.)

Fostering such camaraderie was the Artists Union, formed in September 1933 as the Emergency Work Bureau Artists Group to act as bargaining agent for artists on the government projects. The union, along with the Artists Committee of Action, organized the publication of Art Front, the first issue of which appeared in November 1934 and which continued as a monthly until December 1937, when it ceased publication. During its existence Art Front was the premier magazine for Left artists, containing news items, reviews of exhibitions and books, announcements of meetings and rallies, and polemical essays on the political and aesthetic issues facing artists. Many of the major artists and critics of the 1930s wrote for the magazine, including Harold Rosenberg, Meyer Schapiro, William Phillips, Kenneth Rexroth, Irwin Edman, and Elizabeth McCausland (under the pseudonym "Elizabeth Noble"), and artists Louis Lozowick, Philip Evergood, Moses Soyer, Max Weber, Fritz Eichenberg, and many others.

The Public Use of Art Committee of the Artists Union cooperated with trade unions to bring workers art that would have popular appeal. An article in the December 1936 issue of Art Front reported that the Union of Dining Car Employees had suggested "works showing the effect of speed-up on dining car employees; the battle for union recognition on the Santa Fe; antiwar subjects; exploitation of women employed in hotel dining rooms and kitchens; anti-lynching subjects; scenes in the culinary industry; Negro discrimination." The Brotherhood of Sleeping Car Porters explicitly implored: "Kindly have running through the entire series of paintings relative to the Pullman porters and the Brotherhood a pattern of struggle, sacrifice, and fighting." The trade unions were mandating social realism with a content of class struggle, and many artists took their requests seriously.

However, the Popular Front policy eventually acted to modify critiques of capitalism since its aim was to unite the workers' movement with "progressive" capitalists and liberals in the fight against fascism. Also, social realist artworks depicting strikes and lynchings or lampooning well-known capitalists and politicians were unacceptable as submissions to the Works Progress Administration. Thus, both the Communist Party and the government encouraged artists to back away from proletarian politics and to support Roosevelt's efforts to reform capitalism. As the Communist Party lost its vanguard edge, it was only a matter of time before it lost its cultural influence with artists as well. Later, when the United States entered the arena of World War II, it seemed unpatriotic to paint pictures of class struggle. Many artists further repressed their radical views when they joined the war effort: designing posters, going to the front as artist-journalists, or simply serving in the armed forces.

The rise of abstract expressionism in the post-World War II years was one manifestation of the eclipse of the Left; a new era had arrived, concerned less with social issues and more with aesthetic form, concerned less with collective goals and more with individualized insight. Many reasons have been advanced for this change and its relationship to Cold War ideology; among them are: the conditions of a new private patronage that supplanted government patronage; the promotion of new, individualist philosophies such as existentialism and a redefinition of the meaning of "avant-garde"; the corresponding political swing to the Right, the failure of a Left party to rally against political reaction, and anticommunist pressures on critics and writers; and the new obsession with consumerism, affluence, and control of world markets.

Artists on the Left since the 1930s have generally shunned the leadership of a party devoted to working-class struggles. Moreover, while they may have embraced some Marxist theories, they often have not had direct experiences in working-class issues such as unemployment, cutbacks, and deteriorating health care. Finally, such artists are unsure of their audiences. While many radical artists work in communities making art (street art, performance art, murals) for an alternative or potentially oppositional culture, a large number of "political artists" still look to the commercial art galleries, the museum world, and an international, elite group of patrons for validation.

ASIAN INDIANS. See Indians.

ASIAN STUDIES. Response to events in Asia, particularly the war in Vietnam and the Cultural Revolution in China, played a central role in the development of the New Left in the United States. One of the main catalysts of that response was the Committee of Concerned Asian Scholars (CCAS).

CCAS's founding in March 1967 by some thirty American graduate students studying in Taiwan came at a time when Asian studies had been stripped by the ravages of McCarranism of any voices even vaguely critical of American policy. For a number of years, CCAS succeeded in developing both a community and a journal in which people interested in Asia—not as something exotic, nor as a route to a career in the military or in the State Department—could develop their critical analyses of U.S. policy into a coherent anti-imperialist view and explore the potential of the Cultural Revolution for social change in a professional way within their field.

CCAS first came to the public eye on campuses. At the spring 1968 Association of Asian Studies (AAS) convention in Philadelphia, its members began to confront AAS on its role in the destruction of the critical, but not leftist, Institute of Pacific Relations. Many CCAS members helped to organize the teach-ins on Vietnam that swept the country in 1968 and 1969. At the 1969 Boston convention of AAS, CCAS's panel on the effects of McCarranism on Asian studies and "moral detention"—the fear of criticizing American policy—drew nearly two thousand people.

Following the Boston convention, CCAS began to be viewed as a threat, even a violent threat, to U.S. policy. One of its leaders was falsely accused of murder, and CCAS was accused of plotting to bomb the bookstalls at the 1970 AAS convention in San Francisco.

CCAS's vocal opposition to the Vietnam War, its advocacy of recognition of the People's Republic of China (PRC), and its critique of the detachment, irresponsibility, and sycophantism of establishment scholarship continued unabated through both its journal and such publications as The Indochina Story and America's Asia in the late sixties and early seventies. CCAS attracted the attention of the wider public in 1971, when a small delegation was invited to visit the PRC, the first Americans to visit China—aside from the table tennis team startlingly invited several months before—in nearly twenty years. This trip resulted in the publication of China: Inside the People's Republic and an invitation for a second delegation. But future relations with China deteriorated as CCAS moved from the relatively naive and uncritical positions in Inside the People's Republic to positions questioning China's policies on issues ranging from the handling of homosexuality to its support for Pakistan against Bangladesh.

Following its short period in the limelight, CCAS and other groups of progressive Asian-studies students continued their organizing, working with a wide range of groups, from the U.S.-China Peoples Friendship Association to various organizations teaching about China to some of the pre-party formations of the seventies and even to attempting to establish a boycott of nonunion grapes in Hong Kong in support of the United Farm Workers. Although CCAS was never pulled apart by the factionalism that split many of the other groups of the Left, it too reflected the changing times. Many supporters of Mao and the Cultural Revolution became strong critics. By the late seventies, with the reduction in funding for Asian studies in the United States following the end of the war in Vietnam, the reversal of Maoist policies, the rise of Reaganism, and the accompanying change in the focus of many students of China from social change and revolution to business administration, CCAS disappeared as a membership organization. The Bulletin of Concerned Asian Scholars, however, has continued to flourish, with a circulation of some two thousand. It continues to develop many of the themes that dominated the earlier works of CCAS—including the analysis of the role of imperialism in the development of Asia and the critique of the focus on leaders as the key point in history in favor of analyses of the linkages between people, classes, governments, and parties.

As with many other Left groups, CCAS combined a sense of vibrancy, optimism, and excitement with a sense of seriousness and dedication. Professors and politicians were directly and personally confronted with the responsibility for their work, thus breaking with many of the niceties of academic life. A not insignificant number of progressive Asian-studies students sacrificed jobs in elite universities to teach in more working-class settings. Others gave up promising academic careers for more political jobs. And some were effectively forced out of the field and/or blacklisted for their political views and activities. Others, from the least well known to Noam Chomsky, have continued through the years, both from inside and outside of academia, to present a critical view both of social, economic, and political changes and the U.S. role in those changes not only in China and Vietnam, but also in the rest of Southeast Asia, Japan, Korea, and India.

Although the legacy of CCAS and the Left in Asian studies is hard to pinpoint, it did help give legitimacy to a unity of personal, political, and professional goals in favor of meaningful social change. It helped make large amounts of critical information about Asia's past and present accessible both to the Left and to large segments of the American public. It provided the support for those who produced and continue to produce critical studies of China, Southeast Asia, Japan, Korea, and India. Perhaps most important, it helped this critical view of Asia to become rooted in both academia and the wider public, so that many people who may not even know what the New Left is can read materials that are products of that experience and be taught by people who formed and were formed by that experience.

ATTICA. The upstate New York town of Attica has been the site of a maximum-security state prison since 1931. On 13 September 1971 it was the scene of a slaughter of twenty-nine prisoners and ten prison guards during a six-minute-long assault by state troopers and correctional officers. The attack ended a four-day takeover of the institution by 1,281 prisoners, who took forty-three guards hostage after a series of minor incidents had escalated into a full-scale prison riot on 9 September.

The driving forces behind the takeover were the conditions and treatment of prisoners inside the institution, and the perceived inequities in the criminal justice process that had delivered them to Attica.

We are MEN! We are not beasts and do not intend to be beaten or driven as such. The entire prison population has set forth to change forever the ruthless brutalization and disregard for the lives of the prisoners here and throughout the United States. What has happened here is but the sound before the fury of those who are oppressed. [From Five Demands, issued to "the people of America" by rioting prisoners at Attica on 9 September 1971.]

Between the time of the uprising and the assault by state troopers, prisoners and prison officials attempted to negotiate a peaceful resolution to the situation through a committee of outside observers brought to Attica at the inmates' request. Most of the prisoners' demands related to changes in prison policies or practices (nutritional food, religious freedom, etc.), but negotiations deadlocked on the demand for amnesty from prosecution for events connected with the uprising. Because a guard had died of injuries sustained in the events leading up to the takeover, prisoners risked potential murder charges. However, despite desperate pleas from both the observers' committee and from his own corrections officials that he come to Attica to show his concern, Governor Nelson Rockefeller gave up on negotiations and ordered the state police to "reopen the institution."

The issues behind the uprising itself, the barrage of state firepower leveled against a virtually unarmed population of prisoners and hostages in an enclosed area, the brutal and massive retaliation inflicted on prisoners afterward, and the convictions relating to these events obtained later against prisoners—but not against any state officials—brought the inequities of the criminal justice system furiously to the front burner for the American Left. Analyses pinpointing the roots of crime in social, racial, political, and economic inequality brought some organizations to adopt the position that all prisoners in America were political prisoners. Particularly, the connection between racism and the role of prisons in the United States, which black activists had been articulating for years, was grasped in a new way by white leftists and mainstream liberal groups after Attica.

The issue of amnesty symbolized the political forces that were in contention at Attica. The logic of the demand for amnesty centered on the position that prisoners were already paying for their crimes by serving sentences, but crimes had been and were being committed against them routinely by agents of the state. In taking over the institution, inmates were seeking a forum not available to them through legitimate means, through which they might speak out on their own victimization. Amnesty seemed required by simple fairness. For the state of New York, however, amnesty meant the surrender of legal control over its citizens. Not even to save the lives of its own employees, the hostages, could the state consider amnesty for the prisoners without opening to question the legitimacy of state authority per se.

BAKER, ELLA (1903–1986). The “godmother” of the Student Nonviolent Coordinating Committee (SNCC), Ella Baker was a major influence on political activists from the 1930s to the 1980s. She encouraged hundreds of students and community people to organize and take what was legally theirs, particularly in the area of civil rights. In addition to her work with SNCC, Ella Baker was national director of the Young Negroes’ Cooperative League, director of branches of the National Association for the Advancement of Colored People (NAACP), executive director of the Southern Christian Leadership Conference (SCLC), a coordinator of the Mississippi Freedom Democratic Party (MFDP), and a staff member of the Southern Conference Educational Fund (SCEF).

Granddaughter of slaves who had acquired the land in North Carolina on which they had slaved, Ella Baker grew up with a strong sense of a black community who shared what they had. After graduating from Shaw University in Raleigh, North Carolina, she moved to New York City, where she worked for the American West Indian News and the Negro National News. Because few jobs were open to black women, she did factory work and waitressing to survive. In 1932 she helped organize the Young Negroes’ Cooperative League, a consumer cooperative, and did consumer education for the Works Progress Administration.

From 1940 to 1946 Ella Baker traveled in the South for the NAACP as field secretary and then director of branches to recruit members and stimulate local campaigns. She was involved in the anti-lynching campaign and the equal-pay-for-black-teachers movement. Her strength was to evoke in people a feeling of common need and the belief that people together can change the conditions under which they live. During these years, she formed a network of politically active people throughout the South who proved invaluable during the civil rights struggles of the 1950s and 1960s. In 1946 Baker resigned from her leadership role in the national NAACP because she felt it was too bureaucratic. She also took on the responsibility of raising her niece. She did, however, work with the NAACP in New York City on school desegregation and served as president of the city’s branch.

In 1958 Ella Baker became executive director of SCLC, founded by Martin Luther King, Jr., and other ministers in 1957 immediately after the Montgomery bus boycott. Although SCLC believed voter registration to be primary, this priority did not become a reality until SNCC was formed in 1960. Baker was instrumental in inviting to a conference the hundreds of black students and some white students who had participated in the sit-ins at lunch counters throughout the South, and out of which came SNCC and its philosophy of nonviolent direct action. Although Baker did not personally believe in nonviolence, she saw it as a tactic that could accomplish voter registration and one in which many of the students believed. During this first SNCC conference, Baker broke with SCLC and Martin Luther King, who wished her to influence the SNCC students to become a youth wing of SCLC. In the following years, Baker was the older person behind SNCC who listened, counseled, advised, and nurtured the civil rights workers who organized the freedom rides, worked in voter registration, and broke segregation in the South. Baker saw securing the vote as a necessary step for black people to take, but did not idealistically believe it would cure their problems.

The MFDP was organized by SNCC as an alternative to the regular Democratic Party in Mississippi. Ella Baker set up the Washington office of the MFDP and keynoted its Jackson, Mississippi, convention. Although the MFDP delegates were not seated at the Democratic National Convention, the influence of the MFDP was felt in the election of many local black leaders to office in Mississippi. But the Democrat’s rejection of the MFDP also disillusioned many young activists about the possibilities of working within the system.

Ella Baker continued her political work with SCEF, an organization dedicated to helping black and white people work together. She also was a supporter of freedom struggles in Africa, a national board member of the Puerto Rican Solidarity Committee and vice-chairperson of the Mass Party Organizing Committee. In her last years she continued to nurture, inspire, scold, and advise the numerous young people who worked with her during her long career of political activism.

BARAN, PAUL (1910–1964). A leading Marxist economist, Baran was born in Nikolaev, Russia, to Jewish-Polish parents. He attended universities in Moscow, Berlin, and Frankfurt, where he was much influenced by the Frankfurt School. As a youth he joined the German Communist Party, but later, protesting its position on fascism, switched to the Social Democrats. In 1939 he emigrated to the United States, and, after studying at Harvard University, he assumed positions in war-related projects, including the Office of Strategic Services and the U.S. Strategic Bombing Surveys. In 1948 he joined the Economics Department at Stanford University; until his death, Baran was probably the only Marxist economist teaching in an American university—and he keenly felt his isolation. Moreover, during much of the 1950s the government denied him a passport. In 1960, however, he traveled to Cuba and wrote warmly of the new revolution.

Although his writings were not voluminous—two books and a posthumous collection of essays—Baran's influence has been farreaching. The Political Economy of Growth (1957) and Monopoly Capital (1966, with Paul M. Sweezy) are classics, widely read and translated; for countless students they have served as a nondogmatic education in Marxism, virtually inaugurating American Marxist discussions of Third World underdevelopment and advanced, or monopoly, capitalism. In both books Baran introduced the category of economic "surplus." For Baran "surplus value" insufficiently comprehended Third World dependency as well as the prodigious waste that besets monopoly capital. A rising "surplus" registered the wasted work and productivity, measured not by rates of exploitation but by human and social needs. For more orthodox Marxists, however, "surplus" sounded too philosophical and moral—the last chapter of Monopoly Capital is called "The Irrational System." Despite this criticism Baran was an original Marxist economist, perhaps without peer in the United States, whose writings ranged over underdevelopment, militarism, racism, advertising, and monopoly; he was a classical Marxist who rethought the theory for the contemporary world.

BEATS AND THE NEW LEFT. The first major post-World War II literary rebellion, the Beat Generation of the 1950s, was a cultural rather than a political movement. Based on a highly individualistic anarchism, the Beat movement denounced capitalist Moloch without the slightest hope for a Marxism whose authoritarianism was frequently assailed. Beat opposition to militarism, racism, and economic injustice was consistent and fervent, but it was generally secondary to celebration of hallucinatory drugs, homosexual sex, mystical religion, and exotic experiences of all kinds. The term Beat refers to the state of beatitude originally set as a prime goal of the movement's originators. The issues and style of the Beats are relevant to discourse about the Left primarily because the Beats set the tone for the counterculture of the 1960s with which the New Left was intimately bound.

The Beats came from various parts of the country, but they had clustered in San Francisco by the mid-1950s. Unable to find acceptance in either the commercial or literary press, the Beats took up two artistic activities that would have a profound influence on the burgeoning counterculture—public performance and self-publishing. Public performances originated in coffeehouses but moved to all manner of public forums. Poetry was projected by the Beats as a spoken or sung art best experienced in a public place and not as an individual and silent act of reading. When the original Beats generated a following throughout the nation, poetry readings became a fixture in the alternative culture. With the development of various political movements in the 1960s, the reading of poetry at rallies, teach-ins, demonstrations, and other political events became commonplace. The style of reading and the sense of poetry as a social force were directly related to the Beats.

Self-publishing had been critical to American literary innovation since at least the time Walt Whitman self-published Leaves of Grass. Drawing on that tradition, Beat poet Lawrence Ferlinghetti opened the City Lights bookstore in 1953 and inaugurated a Pocket Poets Series with his Pictures of a Gone World (1955). The small books that fit easily into pants pockets totally bypassed the established publishing and review complex. What soon differentiated the venture from similar efforts was that Allen Ginsberg's Howl (1956) sold first in the thousands and ultimately nearly a million copies. Ferlinghetti had defied the cultural hegemony of the dominant culture yet had reached a mass audience. Coming at a moment when new printing technology was greatly reducing the labor and cost involved in self-publishing, Ferlinghetti's success spawned the creation of new presses whose numbers reached into the high hundreds by the late 1960s. This movement, in turn, meshed with the creation of the alternative weekly newspapers that were such a vital force in the late 1960s and early 1970s.

Ferlinghetti retained his commitment to an alternative press. Long after he and other writers he first published were famous enough for the commercial press to take on, he continued with independent publishing. A full quarter of a century after Howl, he was publisher of Free Spirits: Annals of the Insurgent Imagination, an anthology featuring anarchist, Beat, surrealist, eccentric, and independent Marxist artists of various nations and disciplines.

The Beats first achieved national attention when Ginsberg was charged with obscenity for reading Howl in a San Francisco coffeehouse. The long poem was featured in a special issue of Evergreen Review that was totally dedicated to the Beat movement and included Ferlinghetti, Jack Kerouac, Michael McClure, Robert Duncan, Brother Antoninus, Gary Snyder, Philip Whalen, and other new writers. Editors Barney Rosset and Donald Allen posited a tradition for the Beats by publishing selections from Henry Miller and Kenneth Rexroth as well. Miller was included because of the language precedent he had set in Tropic of Cancer and Rexroth linked the Beats to political dissent. In a San Francisco "literary letter," Rexroth berated American Marxist writers as authoritarian and obsequious to political power; and in a poem Rexroth paid homage to the Kronstadt insurrection, Peter Kropotkin, Makhno's peasant anarchists, Carlo Tresca, and Alexander Berkman.

None of the Beats possessed the ideological sophistication of Rexroth, but they shared his disdain for the established Left. Ginsberg wrote negatively of the regimes in Czechoslovakia and Cuba, and he lamented Che Guevara as a tragic hero on a futile mission. Such immediate political concerns continued to crop up in his life and work. In the 1967 siege of the Pentagon by the antiwar movement, Ginsberg led a group that sought to levitate the Pentagon by humming OM, a beatific Buddhist-derived incantation. Whether that act was scene-stealing performance or religious conviction, Ginsberg was present not only to end a specific war but militarism itself. His advocacy of poet as spiritual guru, as acknowledged legislator of morality, was easily translated into more political terms by radical writers.

Other themes of Beat culture prefigured and entwined with political issues of the 1960s and 1970s. Gary Snyder wrote often about the need to defend the environment and respect the rights of other animals. William Everson, a lay monk who also published as Brother Antoninus, sought to reconcile traditional religions such as Roman Catholicism with the new mysticism, sexual liberation, and social activism.

William Burroughs and Jack Kerouac, the two major prose writers of the Beats, were more problematic for the Left. Kerouac's On the Road (1957) lauded individual freedom and mobility, but the more Kerouac wrote, the more his various right-wing sentiments became evident. His personal influence faded quickly and he became a heavy drinker who had little contact with other Beats. In novels like Naked Lunch (1959) Burroughs used obscene and surreal images to assault the generic police state, but his vision remained essentially nihilistic. While Ginsberg enjoyed being a celebrity, Burroughs avoided the limelight and admitted much of his life was a personal disaster. He had accidentally killed his wife while playing with a pistol and spent many years severely addicted to drugs. More so than any other Beat icon, however, Burroughs insisted on the necessity of maintaining a permanent alternative culture. He said his work is "directed against those who are bent, through stupidity or design, on blowing up the planet or rendering it uninhabitable."

On some issues, the New Left took strong exception to Beat thinking. The attempt to achieve change through mystical means was an obvious sore point. A deeper concern was the debate on how society should deal with drugs. Drug use was a taboo in the traditional Left, but recreational drugs became an accepted element in the New Left environment. How far such usage should go, especially in the face of the destructive role of drugs in much of society, pit the freedom of individual choice against the self-protective needs of society. Ginsberg and Burroughs wrote extensively of their pursuit of exotic drugs, often in travels to developing nations. Their indifference to the political oppression in those nations seemed like that of other Westerners who exploited the Third World for personal, economic, or recreational purposes. Feminist critics found Beat culture not only to be mostly male but also male chauvinist.

On the other hand, the New Left responded positively to the dynamic language and theatrics of the Beats. This was most evident in the ploys of Abbie Hoffman and Jerry Rubin, but generally speaking the freewheeling nature of the New Left style owed far more to the Beats than any leftist influence. Beat celebration of homosexuality broke ideology and artistic barriers of the Left as well as the Right and fed currents that would culminate in the gay liberation movement. The antiorganizational bias of the Beats was reflected, for better and for worse, in radical groups like Students for a Democratic Society, which rejected the discipline of Marxist-Leninism. Many New Left activists expressed mixed feelings when referring to the Beats, saying that they reacted as much against the Beats as with them, but acknowledging it had been the Beats who shattered the conformity of the Eisenhower era and dramatically rekindled vital themes in the broad tradition of American dissent.

BEDACHT, MAX. See International Workers Order.

BELLAMY, EDWARD (1850–1898). America's best known and most influential utopian socialist, author of Looking Backward and Equality, Bellamy was born in the rapidly industrializing village of Chicopee Falls, Massachusetts, where, except for brief visits to Germany, Central America, Hawaii, and New York, he lived nearly all his life. He attended Union College in 1867 and was admitted to the bar in 1871, but abandoned law as a career after his first case. He made his living thereafter as a journalist and writer of fiction, first on the editorial staff of the New York Evening Post, and in 1872 as editor of the Springfield (Massachusetts) Daily Union, where he remained for five years. The first of his twenty-two published short stories, "The Cold Snap," appeared in Scribner's in 1875; the first of his six novels, Six to One: A Nan-tucket Idyl, was published three years later. In 1883 he married Emma Sanderson, with whom he had a son, Paul, and a daughter, Marion.

His preeminence as a utopian social critic has tended to obscure the fact that Bellamy was first and foremost a writer of imaginative fiction—second only to Hawthorne, in the opinion of so demanding a critic as William Dean Howells. Hints of his later radicalism are discernible in some of his lyceum lectures and editorials from the early 1870s, and especially in his novel The Duke of Stockbridge (1879), a markedly sympathetic portrayal of Shays's Rebellion, the 1786 Massachusetts uprising of debtor-farmers and poor mechanics. But the truly distinctive and even unique qualities of Bellamy's utopia were prefigured, rather, in his science-fiction and fantasy tales. These weird stores, most of them involving disturbing reversals of everyday assumptions, often with an unmistakably satirical intent, reveal his abiding interest in the phenomena and problems of abnormal psychology (somanbulism, hypnotism, hysteria, hallucinations, altered states of consciousness, ventriloquism, etc.) as well as philosophical passion for surmounting the contradictions of what he later called the "Jekyll-Hyde existence" of modern capitalist society. In these tales, which were essentially philosophical puzzles—"attempts to trace the logical consequences of certain assumed conditions"—he elaborated elements of a revolutionary critical theory and even a kind of experimental morality. The radical social views advanced in Looking Backward and Equality can be seen, in turn, as the logical consequences of the moral/psychological radicalism of these tales. Central and recurring themes of his nonutopian fiction—supersession of memory by imagination, transcendence of the tyranny of linear time, reintegration of the personality, and the need for wilderness ("I wouldn't give much for a country in which there are no wildernesses left") became key notions of his utopia. This double critique of the mind's war with itself and of society's war with itself—a critique resembling, in many respects, that of the much later surrealists and Freud-influenced Marxists such as Herbert Marcuse—constituted Bellamy's real originality and the essence of his thought.

By far his most famous book, Looking Backward (1888) is the story of a lone survivor of 1880s capitalist Boston who awakens in the year 2000, after more than a century of sleep, to find that a nonviolent revolution has completely changed the conditions of society and therefore the relationships between people. Having abolished private ownership of the means of production, the new society has done away with social classes, exploitation, poverty, starvation, sex slavery, wars, slums, crime, jails, buying, selling, money, banks, censorship, charity, corruption, taxes, custom duties, advertising, housework, air pollution, politicians, merchants, servants, lawyers, the militia, the army, the navy, and the State Department. Government itself, reduced to the coordination of industrial production and distribution, hardly exists. The new society is wholly free of coercion, everything having become "entirely voluntary, the logical outcome of the operation of human nature under rational conditions." Starting at twenty-one, everyone works; at forty-five everyone retires. Work has become greatly simplified and even pleasurable. Workplace health and safety are assured for all. Working hours are short; vacations are long.

The social transformation described in Looking Backward has in turn transformed, or rather liberated, the human personality. In Bellamy's vision of the year 2000, selfishness, greed, malice, insanity, hypocrisy, lying, apathy, the lust for power, the "struggle for existence," and anxiety as to basic human needs are all things of the past. The new education aspires "to the highest possible physical, as well as mental, development for everyone" and "free play to every instinct." In contrast to the sickly and downcast wageslaves of the nineteenth century, the inhabitants of the new society are infinitely freer, happier, healthier, brighter, and friendlier people, enjoying active, playful, adventurous, and creative lives.

Denounced as dangerously revolutionary in daily papers and from pulpits across the land, this "fairy tale of social felicity," as Bellamy himself called it, became a best-seller and inspired a movement. "Although in form a fanciful romance," Bellamy explained in a postscript to the second edition, Looking Backward was "intended, in all seriousness, as a forecast, in accordance with the principles of evolution, of the next stage in the industrial and social development of humanity. . . ." In the immediate aftermath of the Haymarket tragedy and America's first Red Scare, Bellamy proposed what he called "Nationalism" as a peaceful alternative to the ruinous and undemocratic system of private capital or wage-slavery. Without economic (or industrial) democracy, he argued, political democracy is a sham. The aim of Nationalism was to organize the people so that, united and therefore invincible, they could make industrial democracy a reality. Founded on his fundamental principle of "production for use, not for profit," Bellamy's Nationalism was a radically egalitarian system of public ownership and operation of industry, a distinctly American variant of the municipalization and nationalization programs advocated by other socialists of the period. As set forth in the form of a dramatic love-story and dream-tale, embellished with colorful touches of science fiction, Nationalism took the public by storm and rapidly became the leading current of social radicalism in the United States.

The Nationalist movement passed through two distinct phases before dissolving into the current of Debsian socialism at the turn of the century. In the comparatively brief initial phase (1889-1890), exemplified by the Boston Bellamy Club, which held its first meeting in January 1889, the movement was almost exclusively middle-class in composition (the Boston Club's founders included such well-known genteel reformers as Edward Everett Hale, Thomas Wentworth Higginson, and retired General Arthur Devereaux, "hero of Gettysburg"), was dominated by Theosophists (Madame Blavatsky had praised Bellamy's novel and urged her followers to lead the movement), and pursued a purely literary activity consisting of lectures and publication of a ponderously preachy journal, the Nationalist, in which Nationalism tended to be presented as a patriotic, non-revolutionary, explicitly antisocialist solution to the "Social Problem" Bellamy himself was far from happy with the Boston Club and had little to do with it.

The second phase of organized Bellamyism, in which Bellamy played a far more active role, but which has received much less attention from historians, was brought about by the growing participation of working people in the movement. "Debated by all down to the bootblack on the corner," as Henry Demarest Lloyd remarked, Looking Backward naturally proved attractive to many working-class readers, and quickly won the endorsement of many American Federation of Labor and Knights of Labor officials, some of whom helped found Nationalist clubs. Doubtless workers' interest was heightened by the fact that, during labor's mounting crusade for the eight-hour day, the novel took for granted a vastly greater reduction in the hours of labor.

As more and more workers identified themselves with the Bellamyist cause, the movement underwent significant change. Dissatisfied with the pompous dullness of the monthly Nationalist, which specialized in tedious texts of patronizing edification, Bellamy started his own lively activist-oriented weekly, the New Nation (its first issue is dated 31 January 1891), which regularly and prominently featured labor and strike news under such headings as NOTES FROM THE FRONT and GUERRILLA WARFARE BETWEEN CAPITAL AND LABOR. A few weeks later, the Nationalist folded; most of the Theosophists and elite reformers had dropped out. "Nationalism can no longer be twitted as a 'kid-glove' movement," Bellamy declared, "the workmen are swelling its ranks very rapidly."

The mass influx of workers changed not only the Bellamy movement but Bellamy himself, who moved steadily Left all through the nineties. He who, in Looking Backward, had written disparagingly of labor parties and "the followers of the red flag," and who, in pre-New Nation days, had declined to call himself a socialist, now declared Nationalism to be "the only really practical labor party in the world" and "the most radical form of socialism." The New Nation saluted "Labor's May Day" as "the most significant and important anniversary of the year," and welcomed the activity of "nationalist coal-miners in Cherokee County, Kansas." All through the 1890s, as reported in the New Nation and other movement papers, unions were taking action along the lines Bellamy proposed, especially demanding collective ownership of railways, the telegraph, and utilities.

The impressive rise and ignominious collapse of the 1890s Populist movement, in which Bellamy and his comrades had formed an important part of the extreme Left, confirmed and deepened his growing revolutionary inclinations. His writings of the mid-and late 1890s affirmed the primacy of the working class as the agent of revolutionary social transformation, and the need for a specifically revolutionary party. Increasingly antireformist in his last years, he remained till the end a merciless critic of both the Democratic and Republican parties, which he saw as two pillars of capitalism, and strongly opposed those would-be radicals whose efforts served only "to help capitalism obtain a longer lease on life by making it a little less abhorrent."

Bellamy's revised and expanded radicalism was set forth in imposing detail in his last and longest book, Equality, a sequel to Looking Backward published in 1897. The definitive expression of his utopian vision, Equality shows that this author, who, in the last decade of his life, was unceasingly reviled in the mainstream press, responded positively only to criticism from the Left—from workers, anarchists, Marxists, and feminists. A number of incongruously authoritarian elements that had disfigured Looking Backward—the "industrial army," for example, which was perhaps borrowed from the Marx/Engels Communist Manifesto or from Fourier, and the weird system of "alumni" voting—virtually disappear in the sequel.

In Equality, moreover, new emphasis is given to the central role of women in radical social change. Feminists had hailed Looking Backward as a book of their own, and were instrumental in organizing the Bellamy movement, but the feminism of Equality was immeasurably deeper. Affirming women's "absolute sexual autonomy" in everything, the book includes a strong discussion of reproductive rights: "Prior to the establishment of economic equality by the great Revolution, the non-childbearing sex was the sex which determined the question of childbearing." In the new society, however, women are "absolutely free agents in the disposition of themselves."

Finally, Equality surpassed all the social radicalism of its time in its bold affirmation of animal rights and wilderness conservation. In portraying the new society "blending with the face of Nature in perfect harmony" in a de-urbanized, decentralized America, utilizing a technology at last brought under human control, and no longer at war with the natural environment, Bellamy was among the first to pose fundamental questions that rank high on radical political agendas of our own time. His pages on "The Reforesting," urging that wilderness should not only be preserved but vastly enlarged, introduced a theme not found again in socialist discourse until the 1980s.

Equality is, in fact, one of the most forward-looking works of nineteenth-century radicalism. It is not hard to understand why the anarchist Peter Kropotkin found it "decidedly admirable" and even "much superior" to Looking Backward, stressing indeed that he knew "no other Socialist work . . . that equals Bellamy's Equality" as a critique and analysis "of all the vices of the capitalistic system."

Equality was written after the movement had spread across the continent and stirred the American imagination as it had not been stirred since the days of the abolitionists. Altogether some 165 Bellamy Clubs were formed, in Washington, D.C., New York, Chicago (where young Clarence Darrow was an active member), and elsewhere throughout the country; in just a few months, seventeen groups were formed in California alone. Scores, maybe hundreds, of newspapers took up the cause. Most of these were short-lived; Bellamy had to give up the New Nation in 1894 because of illness. One cannot, however, gauge Bellamy's impact solely on the basis of groups and publications that took his name, for in the later period of the movement, Bellamyists tended more and more to call themselves simply socialists. Unlike most utopians, Bellamy did not regard his own work as an infallible revelation but rather as a contribution to a discussion, definitely subject to change. Notably, in this regard, he recognized many "sequels" to Looking Backward by other authors, some of them featuring views sharply differing from his own on important points, and promoted them in the New Nation as worthy contributions to the movement; two of these, Ludwig Geissler's Looking Beyond (1891) and Archibald McCowan's Philip Meyer's Scheme: A Story of Trade-Unionism (1892), are especially significant for their emphasis on the working class as the vital force of the Revolution.

Every current of American radicalism was strongly marked by Bellamy's utopian dream. His influence was unmistakable, in many cases paramount, in the People's Party, Farmers' Alliance, trade unions, women's clubs, several utopian communities, other socialist groups, and in such papers as the Coming Nation and its successor, the Appeal to Reason. Few social movements have been so heterogeneous. Trade unionists, Unitarians, feminists, populists, Knights of Labor, Christian Socialists, spiritualists, Theosophists, temperance advocates, dress-reformers, vegetarians, antivivisectionists, a handful of communitarians, and many who thought of themselves as Marxists were all able to fight the good fight together under the Bellamy banner. Egalitarian, feminist, nonviolent; an open system, always more counterinstitutional than narrowly political; imaginative and undogmatic, one of the all-too-rare combinations of the visionary and the practical; expressing itself largely through poetry, parables, and fiction—Bellamyism was the characteristic American socialism of the 1890s, and exerted an influence on radical thought, on radical lives, and on the broader culture, that in many respects has never been surpassed.

Well into the new century, up to the eve of the First World War, the great majority of those who brought something new and original to the cause of working-class emancipation in the United States—Daniel De Leon, Eugene Debs, Frances Willard, Charles H. Kerr, Julius Wayland, Gaylord Wilshire, Charlotte Perkins Gilman, George Washington Woodbey, William C. Owen, Upton Sinclair, Austin Lewis, Scott Nearing, Oscar Ameringer, and Elizabeth Gurley Flynn are only a few—were those whose first steps as radicals had been guided by what Elizabeth Cady Stanton called “Edward Bellamy’s beautiful vision of the equal conditions of the human family in the year 2000.”

Bellamy’s influence, moreover, has not been confined to the United States. Despite the unfortunate “Nationalist” label that he gave to his movement, which has doubtless injured his reputation among later generations of radicals here and abroad, his perspectives and legacy were truly international. Bellamyism was a major radical current throughout the English-speaking world, especially in Canada, England, and Australia, and played a significant role in the radical and intellectual history of many other countries, including Hungary, Holland, Japan, Indonesia, and Russia, where Looking Backward was a favorite of workers in the Petrograd Soviet during the Revolution of 1905. Bellamy’s impact on the U.S. immigrant community has not been well studied, but the fact that his works were translated into at least twenty-six languages (as well as Esperanto) and praised by such world-renowned foreign radicals as Tolstoy, Maxim Gorky, and Jean Jaurès, suggest that this impact may have been considerable.

Bellamy died on 22 May 1898 after a long illness. The movement he inspired largely passed into the Socialist Party (Eugene Debs was one of Bellamy’s most ardent admirers) and the Industrial Workers of the World (IWW). For many years his writings held their high place on radical best-seller lists; Charles H. Kerr’s socialist publishing house in Chicago was still reprinting a pamphlet of The Parable of the WaterTank (a chapter from Equality) in editions of many tens of thousands well into the 1910s. After the Bolshevik Revolution of 1917 the new style of Marxism made all forms of utopian socialism unfashionable, though the Great Depression witnessed a modest Bellamy revival, in which Heywood Broun of the Newspaper Guild took an active part. In the non-Leninist Left, most notably the IWW, Bellamy continued to be appreciatively studied and cited all through the 1930s and 1940s; longtime labor activist Stan Weir recalls that it was an old Wobbly seaman who sparked his own radicalism by urging him to read Looking Backward. Walter Nef, who directed the IWW’s single largest organizing drive—agricultural workers, 1915—later devoted himself to a purely Bellamyist agitation, and was still issuing his Equalitarian Bulletin in the 1950s.

Bellamy’s influence on more recent radicalism is not easily measured, although it is interesting to note that at least one founder of the Students for a Democratic Society, Al Haber, has acknowledged Looking Backward as the book that made him a radical. First published over a century ago, Looking Backward has never been out of print since—seven editions are currently available, four of them inexpensive paperbacks—and never has it ceased to make readers question the dominant values and institutions of modern capitalist society. Earlier American socialists reached thousands. Bellamy reached millions.

BENJAMIN, HERBERT. See Unemployed Movements, 1930s.

BERGER, VICTOR L. (1860–1929). One of the pivotal leaders of the Socialist Party of America, along with Eugene V. Debs and Morris Hillquit, in its most expansive era, Berger was a founder of the national party and the key figure in shaping the Milwaukee branch, which held power in that city for over three decades. His career—as editor, party leader, and public officeholder—paralleled the rise and fall of the socialist movement.

Born in the Nieder-Rehbach region of the Austro-Hungarian Empire, Berger was the son of conservative innkeepers whose fortunes declined during his childhood. He briefly studied at universities in Vienna and Budapest, and in 1878 he emigrated to the United States with his family, settling in Milwaukee, where the German ambience and radical-oriented labor movement soon enveloped him. He became a language teacher and was active in the local Turnverein, and in 1889 joined the Socialist Labor Party. Soon driven from it by the tight centralization and ideological rigidity he perceived, but committed to socialism, he became an editor and publisher of various German- and English-language socialist newspapers. He edited the Wisconsin Vorwärts (1893–1898), the Social Democratic Herald (1900–1913), and the Milwaukee Leader (1911–1929), as well as more ephemeral sheets. In the meantime, he dabbled in Populism, then joined the Social Democracy and was a founder of the Social Democratic Party in 1898 and of the Socialist Party of America in 1901.

Berger was a political reformist and revisionist who supported the theoretical views of Eduard Bernstein of the Second Reich's Social Democratic Party but departed from them as he deemed necessary. Berger advocated educating the enfranchised proletariat while pursuing electoral politics. As a pragmatist, he believed that Marxist principles must be modified to meet the opportunities presented by changing political and economic conditions, an approach that led orthodox Marxists to call him an opportunist. He viewed the triumph of socialism as inevitable and yet he argued that the transformation of the system should be directly encouraged at the ballot box. He maintained that the eventual socialist system would permit a degree of individual ownership within a democratic structure, and throughout his career opposed communism, for he thought that nationalization of all property would be retrogressive.

Berger supported the American Federation of Labor and for twenty years was a delegate to its conventions, where he pursued a policy of "boring from within" while simultaneously opposing the industrial unionism of the Industrial Workers of the World. On the issue of race, Berger was a virulent bigot, believing that groups were innately unequal. He argued that "white civilization" in the United States was threatened by the influx of "new immigrants," and he was convinced of the absolute inferiority of American blacks. On female emancipation, he accepted the party position in support of universal suffrage, but privately he was concerned that enfranchised women would be a conservative force in politics. In Milwaukee Berger shaped a uniquely integrated movement in which the local Socialist Party and the trade unions cooperated fully on policy, finances, and electoral politics. Berger's success there rested firmly on the German roots of each organization. The Milwaukee Social Democratic Party first elected a member to the city council in 1904, and later won many offices, including the mayor's office, 1910–1912 and 1916–1940. Berger always sought to protect his Milwaukee base by stressing the principle of local autonomy within the national party. While he himself served briefly on the city council, he was essentially active behind the scenes, thereby inviting charges of bossism.

In the national party Berger was a fixture on the National Executive Committee and the National Committee, was usually a convention delegate, and served on ad hoc committees. He was known as an intense but honest infighter, a good negotiator, skilled debater, and an intellectual. Not personally charismatic, he was nonetheless influential and was never hesitant to assume individualistic positions, however unpopular. As examples, he supported the idea of national self-defense, arguing that workers identified with their nations, and he favored citizen-armies and public service conscription. He also flaunted party policy against class collaboration with reformers and peace groups.

Berger was elected to the U.S. House of Representatives in 1910, the first of only two Socialists, and was elected five additional times. In Congress he introduced measures addressed to the condition of workers, sponsoring bills promoting public-work jobs, old-age pensions, and shorter workdays, and he successfully pushed through hearings on issues related to the McNamara–Los Angeles Times bombing case and the Lawrence strike of 1912. His efforts were criticized as counter-productive by the socialist Left, but he did serve to introduce a class perspective into congressional debates.

During World War I Berger opposed preparedness, endorsed his party's major antiwar statement, and was a founding member of the socialist People's Council that sought to coordinate the peace movement. He conducted a strong campaign for the U.S. Senate as a peace candidate in 1918 and was elected to the House that same year. But the war cost his newspaper its second-class mailing privileges, and he, with other party officials, was convicted of conspiracy under the Espionage Act, a verdict later overturned by the Supreme Court. Because of his conviction, however, the House of Representatives twice excluded him from his seat, and he was unable to represent his constituents during the war era.

After the Socialist Party schism and Red Scare, Berger remained with the rump party. He warned his comrades against the folly of imitating Soviet models, condemning the concept of the dictatorship of the proletariat, and he opposed membership in the new Communist International. In the 1920s he served three terms in Congress and was a founder of the Conference for Progressive Political Action, a farmer-labor coalition. He died on 7 August 1929, the victim of a traffic accident.

BERKMAN, ALEXANDER (1870–1936). Frequently remembered as the man who shot Frick, Alexander Berkman was a leading figure in the American anarchist movement in the early twentieth century. Berkman gained his reputation in the libertarian movement as a committed activist and editor of the two major English-language anarchist periodicals prior to the First World War, Mother Earth and the Blast.

Born in Russia to a Jewish merchant family with nihilist ties, Berkman came to the United States in 1888 and quickly became active in anarchist circles. In 1892, after the shooting of workers at the Carnegie steel mills in Homestead, Berkman attempted to kill Henry Clay Frick, the chairman of Carnegie Steel. Frick, though wounded, made a speedy recovery, while Berkman spent the next fourteen years in the Western Penitentiary of Pennsylvania, an experience he described in his classic account of prison life, Prison Memoirs of an Anarchist (1912). Upon his release from prison, Berkman resumed his anarchist activities, and together with his lifelong friend Emma Goldman, emerged as a leader of the American anarchist movement as a lecturer, organizer, and editor of Mother Earth. In 1916–1917 Berkman published his own militantly revolutionary journal, the Blast, in San Francisco, where he became enmeshed in the Mooney-Billings case. Although an indictment against him in the case was eventually dropped, he continued to work for the defense.

During World War I, Berkman organized antimilitarist demonstrations and lectures across the United States. After America's entry into the war, Berkman was arrested in New York for violating the draft law and spent the next two years in prison. In 1919 Berkman and Goldman were deported to the Soviet Union. Initially enthusiastic about the revolution, Berkman quickly became disenchanted with Bolshevik leadership, feelings he chronicled in The Bolshevik Myth (1925), one of the earliest critiques of the incipient totalitarianism in Soviet Russia. Berkman left Russia and lived in Germany before moving in 1925 to France, where he lived the rest of his life. Surviving by working as an editor and translator, he continued to participate in political relief work and published his concise exposition of anarchist communism, Now and After: The ABC of Communist Anarchism (1929). In 1936, suffering from prostate cancer and chronic pain, Berkman committed suicide.

BERRY, ABNER WINSTON (1902–1987). An Afro-American revolutionary born in Texas, Berry grew up in New Orleans, Saint Louis, and Chicago, where he followed his father into work at the Armour packing plant. After the sixth grade, Berry educated himself primarily with the Haldeman-Julius "Little Blue Books" available on the streets of Chicago.

In 1929, while a reporter for a black weekly in Houston, Berry joined the Communist Party, impressed by what he read in exchange copies of the Daily Worker. In 1931 Berry moved to Kansas City. There he adeptly united blacks and whites into a militant Unemployed Council. He was elected to the Central Committee of the Communist Party in 1934.

In late 1934 Berry moved to New York City, where he became the Communist Party's section organizer for Upper Harlem until 1940. An effective "behind the scenes" facilitator and coalition builder, he forged the alliance between Harlem's Italian community and black nationalist Garveyites to protest Mussolini's invasion of Ethiopia.

Berry was drafted into the U.S. Army in 1942 while a reporter for the Daily Worker. After he returned from the war in Europe, he resumed work at the Daily Worker, reporting on the black freedom movement and the South, including the 1955 Montgomery bus boycott. Called the "layman's theoretician" by his colleagues, Berry wrote a regular column in the Daily Worker and was editor of the weekly Harlem Worker.

Berry resigned from the Communist Party in 1957. From 1960 to 1968 he worked as the United Nations correspondent for Antara, the Indonesian news service. From 1969 to 1973, he ran Afro World Associates news service at the United Nations supplying many articles to Muhammad Speaks concerning the Third World.

Influenced by Malcolm X and the black liberation movement of the 1960s, Berry taught Marxism to young activists in the black Left. He joined the African Peoples Party and took the name Baba Sufu. He was an organizer and speaker at the 1974 African Liberation Day in Washington, D.C.

Though wheelchair-bound owing to a 1977 stroke, Berry moved to Rocky Mount, North Carolina, in 1981 to work in the "black belt" South. There he helped found the Black Workers for Justice (BWFJ).

He was a plaintiff in the 1983 voting rights suit in Rocky Mount that overturned the at-large method of city council elections. Berry guided the BWFJ in establishing the Workers School in 1985, the monthly newspaper Justice Speaks, and the cultural ensemble Fruit of Labor. The BWFJ opened the Abner Berry Freedom Library and Workers Center in Rocky Mount in 1986.

BIMBA, ANTHONY (1894–1982). Leading Lithuanian American radical activist, journalist, and Communist labor historian, Anthony Bima was among the handful of immigrant Left leaders known widely outside their communities. Born in Rokiškis, the son of a skilled wood carver of sacred images, Bima arrived in the United States in 1913, working in a New Jersey steel mill and a Maine paper mill before becoming a truck driver for a cooperative bakery. In 1915 he enrolled at Valparaiso University (Indiana), then a popular spot for Lithuanian immigrants bent on self-improvement. He studied history and sociology and joined the socialist movement. He began writing for Lithuanian Left publications, was arrested for a speech to Gary steelworkers in 1918, and was expelled from Valparaiso the following year. He moved to New York to become editor of Darbas, the Lithuanian-language organ of Amalgamated Clothing Workers Local 54.

Soon a committed Communist, Bima became national secretary of the Lithuanian federation and edited Kova, its organ. He led the federation's merger with the communist movement and in 1922 became editor of the Lithuanian Communist daily Laisve, a post he retained until his death in 1982. Only Paul Novick, editor of the Yiddish Morgen Freiheit, had a longer tenure in the U.S. Left press. Bima also edited the quarterly cultural journalist Sviesa from 1936 onward. He wrote more than twenty books in Lithuanian, his earliest, published in 1923, a description of working women's condition.

As a public Communist spokesman, Bima was notable first for his 1926 arrest—the earliest in the United States—under 1919 laws forbidding seditious utterance. The case was dropped. In 1927 Bimba's History of the American Working Class Movement marked the American Communist's entry into the writing of working-class history. Rigidly doctrinaire, Bimba's history was nevertheless more single-mindedly class oriented than later Communist versions, and remained the standard, through a second edition, for almost a decade. His Molly Maguires (1931), a slight text, commemorated the miners' uprising. In short, Bimba the Lithuanian American journalist had also been the first substantial American Communist historian.

BIRMINGHAM, ALABAMA. Center of the 1930s–1940s southern Left, and often referred to as the "Pittsburgh of the South," the Birmingham-Bessemer industrial complex has had a history of working-class militancy dating back to the late nineteenth century. The Knights of Labor and the United Mine Workers of America initiated a tradition of interracial unionism, but southern racial mores and vicious anti-labor repression made it difficult to sustain. Despite the sentiment against interracial unionism, or anything else perceived to represent working-class radicalism, there was an active Socialist Party in Alabama. In 1908 the Socialists claimed four hundred members organized in twenty locals, and two years later William Raoul began editing the Alabama Socialist weekly the People's Voice. Unlike Louisiana and parts of Texas, where southern Socialists organized blacks, albeit in separate locals, in Alabama the Socialist Party was exclusively white.

Outside of disparate meetings of Socialists during the 1920s, there was no left-wing movement in the Birmingham area before Communist organizers arrived very late in 1929. The Central Committee of the Communist Party, USA, chose to concentrate much of its southern organizing efforts in Birmingham because of the city's level of industrial development as well as its proximity to the rural "black belt" counties. It was in these cotton-producing counties that the Party, in its official documents and formal pronouncements after the Sixth World Congress of the Comintern in 1928, demanded the right of self-determination for the black majority. As early as 1930, Birmingham was designated the headquarters for District 17, encompassing Alabama, Georgia, Louisiana, Florida, Tennessee, and Mississippi.

Other than the handful of white Communists from the North and a few native white southerners, the overwhelming majority of pioneering Communists in Birmingham were black Alabamians. Most of its rank-and-file membership typified black working-class life and culture in the South. The majority were semiliterate churchgoing Christians who combined the Party's politics and ideology with black folk culture.

Between 1930 and 1933, the Party concentrated most of its efforts on organizing the unemployed. Attracting predominantly black groups of unemployed workers, as well as a significant cadre of whites in the industrial suburb of Tarrant City, Communists led numerous demonstrations during this period, the largest drawing an estimated crowd of five thousand on 7 November 1932. However, most of these events led to arrests and severe beatings inflicted on local Party activists. By 1933, with the passage of New Deal legislation sanctioning the right of workers to organize, Birmingham Communists shifted their focus from the unemployed to the industrial working class.

Although Communists formed "rank-and-file committees" within various industrial unions, particularly in the United Mine Workers of America in Birmingham's coal mines, they were most influential in the International Union of Mine, Mill and Smelter Workers, in part because black workers in Jefferson County constituted the vast majority in both the industry and the union. Several Communists, both black and white, held low- and middle-level positions in the union as open Communists. And with the assistance of the Unemployed Councils, the Party was active in a series of strikes that had erupted in the ore mines in 1934. During the Popular Front and afterward, especially with the election of left-wing labor leader Reid Robinson to the position of international president, Communists constituted the main body of local leadership in the Birmingham area.

Despite an intensification of jailings, beatings, and intimidation during the strike wave of 1934, the Communist Party and the International Labor Defense (ILD) in Birmingham increased their memberships to approximately one thousand and three thousand, respectively, by May 1934. The changing character of the ILD partly explains its growing popularity in the early 1930s. After brief experiments with chapters of the American Negro Labor Congress and the League of Struggle for Negro Rights, the ILD became Birmingham's "Negro rights" organization. While it was active in local cases prior to the spring of 1931, the celebrated Scottsboro case marked a turning point in the nature of ILD activity, transforming Birmingham's tiny legal-defense auxiliary into a very localized, mass organization. The Birmingham ILD defended members of the Share Croppers Union involved in violent confrontations with authorities and investigated numerous other local police brutality cases, lynchings, alleged rape cases, and extralegal mob violence directed at the black community.

While the Popular Front was a reflection of international antifascist sentiment, for local Birmingham Party leaders it was an opportunity to demobilize massive anticommunist repression in the South by gaining the support of southern liberals and labor leaders. Communists and left-leaning activists not only faced police repression but also confronted violent reprisals from the Ku Klux Klan and the White Legion. In 1935 a tentative alliance was formed in opposition to a statewide antiseditious bill as well as a number of local seditious-literature ordinances. Toward the end of 1934 and in the early part of 1935, Birmingham Communists drew up a "united front agreement" with a handful of southern Socialists, most of whom were affiliated with the Highlander Folk School and were openly supportive of the left-wing Revolutionary Policy Committee within the Socialist Party. Although most state Socialist leaders denounced the agreement, a good portion of rank-and-file Socialists joined the Communist Party soon afterward.

The local "Third Period" leadership, steeped in the militant left-wing and radical Afro-American traditions, was replaced by a more sober, liberal-intellectual leadership during the Popular Front. Robert Fowler Hall (who initially arrived under the name "Bill Moseley"), a graduate of Columbia University and a native southerner, replaced Nat Ross as district organizer. In order to attract liberal and mainstream political attention, Alabama's new leadership hoped to turn the Communist Party into an open, legal organization. Entire families of Party activists were encouraged to participate in open Communist meetings that included singing and political lectures.

In September 1937 the Party held its first open All-Southern Communist Party Conference. The participation of Earl Browder and James Ford signaled the growing importance of the South to the Communists during the Popular Front. Despite attempts to court white liberals, which included dropping its staunchly militant stance against racism, the Communist Party as an organization failed to establish a serious working relationship with the southern liberal intelligentsia. Instead, individual Communists often kept their affiliation to themselves and worked with liberal southerners behind the scenes.

Undoubtedly, the most influential Alabama Communist among liberal and New Deal circles was Joseph Gelders, a former physics professor from the University of Alabama. As the southern secretary of the National Committee for People's Rights (an organization that superseded the southern chapter of the National Committee for the Defense of Political Prisoners and the ILD in Birmingham), Gelders fought on behalf of police-brutality victims and individuals incarcerated for violating seditious-literature ordinances. Because of his activities in support of jailed Communist Barton Logan (alias Jack Barton), Gelders was kidnapped and severely beaten by vigilantes in 1936. The beating outraged the southern liberal community and, in part, contributed to renewed attempts for a united front between liberals and left-wingers. Gelders went on to help found the Southern Conference for Human Welfare in 1938.

In addition to becoming a support organization for southern liberal activities, Birmingham Communists continued to organize workers in the Works Progress Administration through the Workers Alliance and played pioneering roles in the development of the Congress of Industrial Organizations (CIO), particularly in the steel and red ore mining industries. However, since Communist leadership in Birmingham no longer emphasized Party autonomy, several local Party activists—especially black Communists—chose to devote nearly all of their time to the labor movement or other allied organizations. After 1937, the Party lost a large proportion of its black Birmingham membership.

When the Nazi-Soviet Pact was signed in 1939, its impact was felt only among the tiny circle of liberals the Party was trying to influence. Compounded by an intensification of anticommunist activity spurred on by the Dies Committee, the Communists in Birmingham were becoming more isolated than ever. The Party proper diminished rapidly, its Birmingham membership declining from approximately four hundred or five hundred paid-up members in 1938 to approximately sixty or seventy active members by 1940. The absorption of black Communists into the CIO at the expense of Party activity, growing anticommunist sentiment, and the district leadership's initial willingness to subordinate its militancy, particularly on racial issues, were the central reasons for the Party's rapid decline during the late 1930s. Nevertheless, movements that were led by Communists, or in which Communists played an important part, were becoming much more prominent in the overall fight for civil liberties and in the struggle to organize the industrial working class in the South. In addition to the CIO, the Communist-led Southern Negro Youth Congress, the League of Young Southerners, the Jefferson County Committee against Police Brutality, and the Right to Vote Club were attempts at mass-based political organizing in the Birmingham community.

In June 1941, just when the Party was in the midst of rebuilding itself by taking up the issues of suffrage and the extension of citizenship to blacks, the Soviet Union was drawn into the international conflict. Birmingham Communists therefore turned most of their energies toward supporting the "people's war against Hitlerism." Although the suffrage campaign dwindled during the war, the Alabama cadre continued concentrating on the needs of the black working class and made civil rights a central issue. Nonetheless, the Communist Party was only a shadow of its former self. In line with Browder's position, in 1944 Rob Hall liquidated the Party and formed the Alabama People's Educational Association. The association did not attract any considerable number of people, and most active Communists during the war kept a low profile and became untiring organizers for the Southern Conference for Human Welfare. Black Communists who did not enlist remained active in the CIO and the Southern Negro Youth Congress. Indeed, it was the talents of women such as Esther Cooper Jackson, Dorothy Burnham, and Augusta Strong that sustained and strengthened the SNYC during the war.

The period from 1945 to 1950 marked the last vestiges of Communist activity in Birmingham. In the South, where vehement anticommunism and segregationist thought were inseparable, open Communists faced fierce, violent opposition from authorities, vigilantes, and even conservative white labor leaders. Communists were expelled from nearly all CIO unions, and the predominantly black, Left-led International Mine, Mill and Smelter Workers actually faced direct violence from white organizers in the United Steel Workers of America in Birmingham. Under the leadership of Sam Hall, the Party in Birmingham tried to breathe life into Henry Wallace's faltering 1948 presidential campaign, and it faced violent reprisals when it attempted to organize several peace demonstrations in the city streets.

Although several individual Communists and left-leaning activists chose to leave Birmingham, many of those who remained continued their activity as silent civil rights activists during the late 1950s and early 1960s. But as the McCarthy era began to take on a clearer form and definition throughout the nation, Birmingham became one of the most untenable places for Communists. When the Alabama Communist Control Act became law in 1951, it was only the beginning of a flurry of antiradical legislation, marking the end of an era.

BIRTH CONTROL. Although birth control is an ancient practice, political movements for birth control are modern, originating in the early nineteenth century. There were at least six separate movements with different political content, and only some of them were left-wing. Indeed, the organized Left has been deeply ambivalent about birth control, at best confused about its political significance, and at worst opposed to its association with autonomous women's organization and feminist goals.

The phrase "birth control" has been attributed to Margaret Sanger, but it has since become a generic term for reproduction control. In some ways this usage is unfortunate, since the phrase encourages grouping together distinct political phenomena. The first "birth control" campaigns were extremely varied, including the secular and the religious, the reformist and the visionary. British Neo-Malthusians in the early nineteenth century, among whom Francis Place was the leading figure, sought to increase the standard of living among the poor, and to strengthen the working class socially and politically, by reducing births. This "bottom-up" Neo-Malthusianism was soon joined by middle- and upper-class reformers with different motives: hoping to pacify and control the working class by reducing its numbers, and to increase its standard of living without redistribution. By the late nineteenth century, British imperialists were already advocating population control as a means of pacifying subject peoples.

At the same time, "utopian" socialists, both secular and religious, began advocating birth control for various reasons: to control their populations, to prevent the spread of hereditary disease, to liberate women from reproductive drudgery, and sometimes to permit greater sexual freedom. In the United States in the 1820s, Neo-Malthusian ideas were integrated into the experimental, non-class-conscious socialism associated with Robert Dale Owen (whose father, Robert Owen, had been directly influenced by Place) and Frances Wright, a socialist feminist.

These secular socialists were soon joined by religious radicals who also promoted birth control, but in different forms. The Second Great Awakening had given rise to a "perfectionist" mode of thought, heretical in relation to orthodox forms of Protestantism because it emphasize possibilities of perfecting earthly life. Also committed to improving women's condition and public health generally, these religious socialists sought other means of birth control than contraception, which they considered artificial. The birth control methods they favored involved changing the nature of sexual activity itself. For example, the Oneida Community in the 1840s, ruled by John Humphrey Noyes, practiced male continence, a regimen in which men refrained from ejaculation altogether. Noyes and his supporters believed that the practice not only built self-discipline but actually heightened sexual pleasure. In the second half of the century, "free lovers" further developed these noncontraceptive forms of birth control, recommending withdrawal or sexual activity other than intercourse. Feminist socialist physician Alice Stockham designed a sexual system called "Karezza" that required both men and women to avoid orgasm and resulted, she believed, in the intensification and prolongation of pleasure.

Even more conservative feminists shared with these early socialists the view that the discipline and self-control required by such noncontraceptive birth control was liberating in itself. By the 1870s, a flourishing feminist movement transformed this tradition of thought into a new and more political demand, with the slogan "voluntary motherhood." These feminists, like their socialist predecessors, opposed contraception because they feared it would merely license more predatory male sexual aggression. Also, like most radicals until the twentieth century, they opposed abortion, which, they believed, would further disadvantage women by removing a lever for enforcing male responsibility in sex. Instead they proposed abstinence for birth control. Their proposals and rhetoric have been maligned as prudish, and there is truth in this characterization, since they were expressing many women's negative experiences of sex as oppressive and pleasureless; yet viewed in their historic context, they can also be characterized as spokeswomen for women's sexual liberation. They understood that women could not find and defend their own sexual desires until they gained the power to reject men's. At the sex-radical fringes of the feminist movement, some openly advocated greater sexual experience and pleasure for women. Elmina Slenker, "free love" and voluntary-motherhood advocate, wanted "the sexes to love more than they do; we want them to love openly, frankly, earnestly; to enjoy the caress, the embrace, the glance, the voice. . . . We oppose no form or act of love between any man & woman." Their arguments for abstinence as a form of birth control thus had two meanings: one was voluntary motherhood, opposition to coercive childbearing; another was voluntary sex, opposition to men's traditional prerogatives of demanding sexual submission from wives. Moreover, some voluntary-motherhood advocates developed a deep critique of male sexuality, prefiguring much that late-twentieth-century feminists argued regarding the obsesiveness and dominance embedded in much of what men experience as sexual desire. Unlike their Neo-Malthusian predecessors, voluntary-motherhood advocates were not concerned with population size nor with working-class power; they were resolutely pro-motherhood and, far from challenging the Victorian romanticization of motherhood, they manipulated it to increase women's power.

Throughout the nineteenth century the growing class-conscious socialist movement was in the main hostile to Neo-Malthusianist, perfectionist, and feminist birth control programs. Most unionists and party socialists saw birth control as a conspiracy to weaken the working class, and autonomous women's movements as attempts to undermine class consciousness. Indeed, many of them supported the "race suicide" panic of the first decade of the twentieth century. Sparked by no less a figure than Theodore Roosevelt, moralists propagandized against the "selfishness" of women who refused their maternal duties with birth control, deploying racist fears (in a period of heavy immigration) that WASP dominance would be undermined by the high birthrates of those of "inferior stock."

Nevertheless, it was from within the Socialist Party and socialist unions that a mass movement for birth control arose between 1914 and 1916. As the nineteenth-century woman's rights organizations had devolved into a relatively conservative suffrage movement by the 1890s, many more Left feminists had been attracted to socialist women's groups and causes. Here they grew restive and rebellious under the male leaderships' attempts to subdue and channel their political energies. While urban radicals grew more daring sexually, they also discovered the widespread promotion of contraceptives sponsored in Europe by unions and Social Democratic parties. Emma Goldman of the Industrial Workers of the World and Margaret Sanger of the Socialist Party visited clinics in Holland where women were fitted with diaphragms. When they decided upon civil disobedience as a means of dramatizing the issue in the United States, distributing prohibited leaflets about contraception and opening illegal birth control clinics, the Left leadership remained uninterested—but rank-and-file women responded with passion. Within a few years there were birth control leagues in every major city and most large towns of the United States. When these activists offered contraceptive information and services, they were deluged with clients; when arrested, their political defenses publicized contraception and created an even more avid demand for it.

The leaders of the hundreds of birth control leagues in 1916–1917 were radicals—feminists and usually socialists. The mass response, the thousands who eagerly sought out contraceptives, were women wanting a very personal sort of help. Thus the pressure for the movement to become a social service was great. Most groups began to plan ways of opening clinics or otherwise providing actual birth control information. Responding thus to a concrete, immediate, and fillable need, the radical birth controllers did not effectively resist incorporation of their demands into professional, physician-dominated lobbying organizations during the 1920s and 1930s. Their destiny might have been different if—if the Socialists had supported the demand for legal contraception, if the Communist Party (which did on the whole discuss birth control in a favorable light) had made it a high-priority part of its program, if there had not been such a vicious and effective attack on radicalism, including feminism, after World War I.

Instead, birth control during the next two decades was adopted by liberal groups and assimilated to mainstream, even anti-Left causes. The leadership of the main national birth control organization, led by Sanger, deserted the earlier demand for women's right to reproductive choice and endorsed a compromise: physician's discretion, making birth control appear—as it still does to many today—a medical issue. Moreover, birth control leaders kept the eugenic arguments that had dominated social thought for several decades (arguments used to support many progressive reforms, since they did not originally rest on exclusively hereditarian principles) and used them in racist ways, building on fears of high birthrates among immigrants and blacks to support the case of legalization of contraception. The adoption of statutes providing for forcible sterilization of the feeble-minded, degenerates, and some other groups by many states, with special alacrity in the southern states, with special alacrity in the southern states, was also part of this redefinition of the function of birth control. These choices further estranged leftists from the birth control cause, especially black radicals, who viewed birth control propaganda as potentially genocidal.

The World War II period gave birth to two new birth control movements: Planned Parenthood and population control. These were distinct but related, two faces of a similar analysis. The former was a renewed campaign for the legalization and promotion of contraception, arguing not from a feminist analysis but as a campaign for family stability. Unlike the conservative pro-family backlash of the early twentieth century, these "family planning" advocates recognized that marital "adjustment" must rest on a permissive attitude toward sex without fear of conception. Planned Parenthood, unlike the voluntary motherhood movement, endorsed lots of sex as a sign of health and did not raise issues of women's sexual exploitation. In its domestic campaigns, Planned Parenthood promoted small families and planning. In its international aspects, it argued a renewed Neo-Malthusianism: it blamed Third World poverty on overpopulation, and advocated population control as a cure for poverty. Like nineteenth-century Neo-Malthusianism, it simply passed over individual bases of pro-birth control attitudes, such as women's desire for control, which might have challenged fundamental gender power-structures, just as it attempted to increase standards of living without challenging class power-structures. By 1960 population control had become such an unchallenged ideology in the United States that many used this phrase interchangeably with the earlier "birth control."

By 1960 birth control appeared, at best, just another commodity. Then a renewed women's liberation movement once again changed the terms of understanding of the reproduction-control project. The women's movement viewed birth control as part of an overall campaign for women's self-determination. The feminist birth control program was not at its outset theoretically or historically knowledgeable about the many meanings of reproduction control. Nevertheless, it immediately began to undo the ideological knot that united and subordinated these many meanings under the rubric of population control. The feminist campaign coalesced around the issue of abortion. Previously only a few marginal radicals endorsed legal abortion (for example, Antoinette Konikow), and the Left participated in the general hypocritical denial of what was in fact a widespread practice. Moreover, the campaign for legal abortion in the 1960s did not begin with feminists but, rather, with civil-libertarian physicians. But women's liberation soon achieved hegemony in defining the meanings of legal abortion (just as the greatest victory of the Right to Life movement since then has been in redefining their position as defining the rights of fetuses). Although abortion remained the focal, defining issue, the women's movement began to describe a position of general support for reproductive self-determination, criticizing forced sterilization, unsafe contraception, unnecessary hysterectomies, and cesarean sections. By the mid-1970s, most Left organizations in the United States supported these demands. Thus despite the powerful antifeminist backlash against reproductive freedom, by the 1980s the Left as a whole had developed a reasonably clear understanding of the political importance of these issues to a democratic movement.

BLACK INTERNATIONAL. Formed in London in 1881 to promote a revived and radicalized version of earlier leftist internationalism, the International Working People's Association found its largest potential following and its gravest political disappointments in the United States. In the end, the American anarchist experience had produced most of all a martyrology that anarchists around the world could share. Along the way, immigrant and American-born anarchists around the Black International had translated and published an extensive literature of Bakunin, Kropotkin, and other leading anarchist intellectuals.

The largest segment of U.S. adherents existed in Chicago and gathered there to endorse the new international movement formally. Its inspiration had coincided with the disillusion of Chicago "social revolutionaries" with political socialism in general and with the Socialist Labor Party in particular. Inheriting and transforming various local socialistic institutions—craft union locals, social Vereins, and free-thought schools among others—the Chicago anarchists gathered elements of a mass movement that anarchism scarcely possessed anywhere in Western industrial societies.

Fidelity to Black International principles remained very much in the eye of the beholder. To more extreme anarchists, especially among the readers and the editors of the English-language Alarm, the actual anarchism of the dominant "social revolutionary" movement remained ambiguous, not wholly differentiated from the socialist assumptions of a few years earlier. (And, indeed, discussion of the Black International in most of the Chicago revolutionary-socialist movement was not extensive.) To the tabloid press and moderate labor leaders, who associated "anarchists" with bomb throwing, these differences seemed irrelevant or mere disguise.

A second segment of adherents took their cues from popular lecturer-thespian Johann Most and his Freiheit newspaper. Unwilling to work within unions, given to considerable rhetoric about violence, Most's fellow anarchists established themselves as propaganda groups, mostly across the East Coast but also in other scattered cities. Wide varieties of anarchists, including near-individualist Americans, English former comrades of William Morris, Proudhonists, and others, mixed into these groups. To such propaganda clubs, the translation and publication of anarchist writings had the overwhelming value of making the great ideas accessible to their communities—with Bakunin's God and the State the most popular of all.

The third segment, not actually an affiliate, claimed to be a surviving section of the First ("Red") International. These western "divisions" of the International Workingmen's Association owed their development to two extraordinary individuals, Joseph R. Buchanan and Burnette Haskell, and their vigorous activities in the middle 1880s. Buchanan, a former printer who turned to the rhetoric of violence after himself being exposed to armed attack by western strikebreakers, published the important regional labor paper from Denver, the Labor Enquirer, and led its supporting group, the Rocky Mountain Social League. Haskell, son of a prominent lawyer (and lawyer himself), provided initiative and skills for the formation of a West Coast sailors' union, and published the Truth, a most philosophical agitational paper, from his political base in San Francisco.

Buchanan and Haskell proclaimed revolutionary-messianic doctrines inspired by Bakunin. Both papers urged the dissemination of anarchist ideas (offering extensive lists of English-language publications imported from England) and the formation of secret societies set upon direct—including violent—action when the final crisis of capitalism approached. In 1881 Haskell had unsuccessfully proposed the federation of U.S. anarchists and revolutionaries into one autonomous body with its own information bureau. Failing this, the two leaders jumped at the chance to affiliate with the Black International. Their own followings formed the first two official American divisions (Pacific Coast and Rocky Mountain). For a few years, their groups contained a few hundred, perhaps a few thousand members, with a mixture of natural-rights propaganda, labor-education advocacy, and direct-action doctrine that resembled later expressions of the Industrial Workers of the World. So influential did they become that Buchanan in particular posed a threat to the moderate Powderley leadership of the Knights of Labor.

Efforts to coordinate these various tendencies into a single U.S. anarchist movement prompted the Pittsburgh conference of social revolutionaries in 1883. Unable to resolve key differences between the three disparate tendencies, the conference issued an important manifesto stating that only through force could workers obtain their just deserts, and the meeting closed sine die.

In the aftermath of the Haymarket events and accompanying mass repression, anarchist tendencies retreated to propaganda and occasional "propaganda of the deed." Buchanan and Haskell had already gone over to popular anti-Chinese sentiment, Haskell indeed playing a central propaganda role on the West Coast. Thereafter, Haskell and his following relocated into a utopian colony and disappeared politically. (His paper briefly appeared as a tiny proto-feminist sheet, Truth in Small Doses.) Buchanan, bringing his Labor Enquirer to Chicago, broke with the Chicago anarchists and drifted toward the Democratic Party.

Seen in retrospect, the formation of the Black International had actually tended to isolate anarchists from the radicalized workers in the new socialist movements. By 1889 and the formation of the Second International, the International Working People's Association had given up the ghost. But during its brief history in the United States, the Black International had served as a symbolic meeting point of potential allies at anarchism's highest level of mobilization.

BLACK NATION. Perhaps no concept in the history of American radicalism has been more maligned or misunderstood than the concept of the "black nation." The quest of the Afro-American people for some form of territorial integrity and national self-determination has had a long and winding history. Long before the American Communist Party seized the concept as an organizational tool to mobilize the Afro-American masses, they had given the concept its own historical validity. From Paul Cuffe's emigrationist efforts in the late eighteenth century, through the nationalist and emigrationist sentiments that threatened to splinter the abolitionist movement, to the postbellum era with its "exodus" movement, Chief Sam's "Back to Africa" endeavor, or E. Sutton Grigg's "Imperium in Imperio," the Afro-American people have given the concept of the "black nation" their own definition, utility, and both an organized and unorganized expression of its political intent.

It was not until the end of World War I, however, that the white Left comprehended the potential appeal of the concept to the Afro-American masses. This era was marked by a series of internal and external circumstances that would give the "black nation" concept an opportunity to be fulfilled. First, the crisis of plantation agriculture in the southern states stimulated widespread migration to the industrial cities of the Northeast and Midwest, while those who remained behind slumped further in their semifeudal status. Second, the Bolshevik Revolution and the ensuing crisis of the European nation-state unleashed the powerful force of self-determination for the oppressed nationalities of eastern Europe, the decaying Ottoman Empire, and the Far East. It was the Afro-West Indian radical Cyril Briggs who, in a 1917 editorial in the Amsterdam News, proclaimed, "SECURITY OF LIFE" FOR POLES AND SERBS—WHY NOT FOR COLORED AMERICANS. It was Brigg's radical organ, the Crusader, that initially articulated a separate state for Afro-Americans, from its founding in 1918 until 1920, when he denounced the idea as "unsatisfactory." It was revived by his fellow traveler Hubert Harrison in 1924 as the foundation of the International Colored Unity League, whose main objective was the establishment of a separate state in the continental United States for Afro-Americans.

Meanwhile, the newly founded Communist Party, USA, had taken up the question at the Comintern's Second Congress, where Lenin presented his "Thesis on the National and Colonial Question." Point 14 was devoted to a synopsis of the position of "The Negro in America." By 1928 a subcommittee on the "Negro question" was formed to prepare a resolution for the Comintern's Sixth World Congress. Harry Haywood, a member of the subcommittee, submitted an article in which he argued for the "national minority status" of the Afro-American people. He advocated a "national revolutionary" movement for self-determination and an autonomous republic to be established in the "black belt" of the American South. By 1930 self-determination in the black belt became the official position of the Communist Party in its attempt to organize the Afro-American masses. The concept of national self-determination in the black belt was pronounced dead by Earl Browder in 1943. Haywood continued to support the position until his ouster from the Party in 1959. He would argue that self-determination and territorial autonomy were the only mechanisms that would guarantee the security of the Afro-American people.

By no means did the concept die when the Party abandoned it. Elijah Muhammad's Nation of Islam had a separate state as the foundation of its redemptive program. Malcolm X supported a version of territorial autonomy, while a generation of revolutionary nationalists continued to support the goal of a separate state in the South throughout the 1960s and early 1970s—from Max Stanford's Revolutionary Action Movement to the Republic of New Africa, the All-African People's Party, and the Black Liberation Army. The idea of a "black nation" has not disappeared but has taken on an even newer expression.

BLACK PANTHER PARTY. Founded in October 1966 by Huey Newton (1942–1989) and Bobby Seale (b. 1936), the Black Panther Party for Self-Defense (BPP) became the most widely known black militant political organization of the late 1960s. The Black Panthers attracted widespread support among young urban blacks, who wore the group's distinctive black leather jackets and black berets and often openly displayed weapons. Also attracting the attention of local police and the Federal Bureau of Investigation (FBI), the group declined as a result of deadly shootouts and destructive counterintelligence activities that exacerbated disputes between Panthers and other black militant groups.

Black Panther button, late 1960s.

Newton was already a black militant activist in 1961 when he met Seale, a fellow student at Oakland's Merritt College. Both joined the Afro-American Association, a black cultural organization led by Donald Warden, but they became dissatisfied with Warden's procapitalist form of black nationalism. Their sentiments were more in accord with those of Malcolm X, especially after his 1964 break with Elijah Muhammad's Nation of Islam, and of Robert F. Williams, the then Cuban-based guerrilla warfare advocate. After affiliations with the Merritt's Soul Student Advisory Council and with the Williams-inspired Revolutionary Action Movement, Newton and Seale created the BPP in order to expand their political activity, which mainly involved "patrolling the pigs"—that is, monitoring police activities in black communities to ensure that civil rights were respected.

The BPP dropped "for Self-Defense" from its name in 1967, but the group remained a paramilitary organization held together by Newton's eclectic ideas, which were drawn from Marxist-Leninist and black nationalist writings and from the examples of revolutionary movements in Asia and Africa. Although Newton and Seale once gained funds and notoriety by selling books containing the quotations of Mao Tse-tung, the revolutionary tract that most influenced Panther leaders during the mid-1960s was Frantz Fanon's Wretched of the Earth (1965). The party's appeal among young blacks was based not on its unrefined ideology but on its willingness to challenge police power by asserting the right of armed self-defense for blacks. The explicit political goals of the Panthers were summarized in the last item of their ten-point platform and program: "We want land, bread, housing, education, clothing, justice, and peace. And as our major political objective, a United Nations-supervised plebiscite to be held throughout the black colony in which only black colonial subjects will be allowed to participate, for the purpose of determining the will of black people as to their national destiny."

On 28 October 1967, Huey Newton was arrested on murder charges after an altercation with Oakland police that resulted in the death of one policeman and the wounding of another. With the party's principal leader in jail, the role of spokesmen increasingly fell to Seale and Eldridge Cleaver (1935–1998), a former prison activist and Malcolm X follower who became the Panthers' minister of information. Cleaver, a writer for the New Left journal Ramparts and a powerful public speaker, increasingly shaped public perceptions of the Panthers with his calls for black retribution and scathing verbal attacks against black counterrevolutionaries.

During February 1968, Stokely Carmichael (b. 1941), a former leader of the Student Nonviolent Coordinating Committee (SNCC) who had been asked by Cleaver and Seale to appear at "Free Huey" rallies, challenged Cleaver's role as the dominant spokesman for the party. Carmichael's Pan-African perspective, emphasizing racial unity, contrasted sharply with the desire of other Panther leaders to emphasize class struggle and to attract white leftist support in the campaign to free Newton. Although Carmichael downplayed his policy criticisms of the party until he resigned as the Panthers' prime minister in the summer of 1969, the ideological and personal tensions between Carmichael and other Panthers signaled the beginning of a period of often vicious infighting within the black militant community. A SNCC-Panther alliance announced at the February rallies broke apart by the following summer. After the Panthers branded Ron Karenga, the head of a Los Angeles-based group called US, a "pork-chop nationalist," escalating disputes between these two organizations culminated in January 1969 in a gun battle on the campus of the University of California at Los Angeles that left two Panthers dead.

Police raids and the covert efforts of the FBI's counterintelligence program contributed to the tendency of Panther leaders to suspect the motives of black militants who did not fully agree with the party's strategy or tactics. In August 1967 the FBI targeted the Panthers when it launched its COINTELPRO operations designed to prevent "a coalition of militant black nationalist groups" and the emergence of a "black messiah" "who might unify and electrify these violence-prone elements." FBI-inspired misinformation, infiltration by informers, and numerous police assaults contributed to the Panthers' siege mentality. On 6 April 1968, police attacked a house containing several Panthers, killing the seventeen-year-old treasurer of the party and wounding Cleaver, who was returned to prison as a parole violator. In September 1968 Newton was convicted of voluntary manslaughter and sentenced to two to fifteen years in prison. The following December, two Chicago leaders of the party, Fred Hampton and Mark Clark, were killed in a police raid. By the end of the decade, according to the party's attorney, twenty-eight Panthers had been killed. At that time, Newton was still in jail (his conviction was reversed on appeal in 1970); Cleaver had left for exile in Algeria rather than return to prison; and many other Panthers elsewhere were facing long prison terms as a result of intense repression. In 1970 Connecticut authorities began an unsuccessful effort to convict Seale of the murder of a Panther in that state.

During the early 1970s, the BPP, weakened by external attacks, legal problems, and internal schisms, rapidly declined as a political force. After Newton was released from prison in 1970, he sought to revive the party by rejecting Cleaver's inflammatory rhetoric emphasizing immediate armed struggle. In place of police confrontations, Newton stressed community service, such as free-breakfast programs for children and, during the mid-1970s, participation in electoral politics. These efforts to regain popular support were negated, however, by published charges that Newton and other Panthers engaged in extortion and assaults directed against other blacks. Memoirs of prominent Black Panthers published in the early 1990s would reveal that many of the tales of Panther brutality, even within its own ranks, had been true.

By the mid-1970s, most Panther veterans, including Seale and Cleaver, had deserted or were expelled from the group, and Newton, faced with various criminal charges, fled to Cuba. Upon his return to the United States, Newton remained a controversial figure. Although he completed a doctorate and remained politically active, he was also involved in the drug trade. He was shot to death in Oakland in the summer of 1989 in a drug-related incident.

BLATCH, HARRIOT STANTON (1856–1939). Daughter of the nineteenth-century feminist Elizabeth Cady Stanton, Harriot Stanton Blatch was herself a major leader of the twentieth-century suffrage movement. She was one of the pioneers in bringing working-class women into the movement and in adapting the modern, militant style of the British suffragettes to the American scene. Born in 1856 to Elizabeth Cady and Henry Brewster Stanton, she graduated from Vassar in 1878 and shared with other early college women a deep faith in science, including social science. She went to Europe to continue her studies and in 1882 married a wealthy Englishman, William Henry Blatch. For twenty years she lived outside London and was active in the British suffrage movement and the Fabian Society. She also had two children, one of whom, Nora Stanton Barney, went on to become a feminist activist like her mother and grandmother. The other, Helen, died at age three.

When her mother died in 1902, Harriot moved back to the United States. She was swept up in New York City reform activism, especially anticorruption politics and the Women's Trade Union League, but within the suffrage movement she found existing organizations too tradition-bound. In 1907 she organized the Equality League of Self Supporting Women, dedicated to recruiting wage-earning women and building links between them and professional women. The Equality League introduced to America the innovations of British suffrage militants. It also played a major role in reinvigorating the movement in New York but in the process was itself transformed. By 1910 Blatch was relying increasingly on upper-class women, who had enough money to organize a winning campaign; she also believed that the work of recruitment and "propaganda" must now give way to more explicitly political efforts.

In 1910 Blatch changed the name of her organization to the Women's Political Union and began to concentrate on getting a woman suffrage referendum before the state's voters, a lobbying effort that took three years. In 1913 the Women's Political Union began to canvass the entire state for a 1915 referendum on woman suffrage. The measure lost by a significant margin, and Blatch's democratic faith was temporarily weakened. While Blatch shifted her own efforts to votes for women at the national level, other New York suffragists resumed the state battle, and in 1917 a second referendum passed.

Meanwhile, Blatch and her followers joined forces with Alice Paul, Lucy Burns, and the Congressional Union, who were determined to force President Wilson to support a woman suffrage amendment to the federal Constitution. While Paul preferred civil disobedience, Blatch advocated the strategic deployment of women already enfranchised to put pressure on the national Democratic Party. Embracing Blatch's ideas, the Congressional Union renamed itself the National Woman's Party. Blatch and Paul also differed over U.S. entry into the First World War, which Blatch supported, believing that unified civic purpose and a powerful state would redound to women's benefit. By the end of the war, she was profoundly disillusioned, and this, along with attacks on radicals and the impending enfranchisement of women, led her to join the Socialist Party as a way of declaring both her belief in the political process and in the need for a fundamental redefinition of its purposes. In 1924 she played an important role in the independent, pro-labor presidential candidacy of Robert La Follette.

Meanwhile, Blatch was also involved in the post-enfranchisement women's movement's redefinition of its agenda. Although an early critic of sex-based protective labor legislation (she wanted such laws to be extended to all workers), she did not support the Equal Rights Amendment advocated by Paul, because she did not think "equality" could be understood abstractly or legislated categorically. Her own agenda stressed economic independence for women, with special emphasis on the dilemmas of the working wife and mother, but these issues got little attention until the Great Depression. By then, Blatch was close to eighty, and her waning energy went to her own autobiography, Challenging Years, and to documentation of her mother's historical contributions. She died in 1939 of complications resulting from a fall.

BLITZSTEIN, MARC (1905–1964). The first theater composer to set to music the authentic American language as spoken by all social classes from immigrant laborers to society matrons, Marc Blitzstein devoted the bulk of his career to topics of social commentary and political satire. Born in Philadelphia into a banking family with socialist leaning, he was a child prodigy at the piano. He attended the University of Pennsylvania and the Curtis Institute of Music and studied with Nadia Boulanger in Paris and Arnold Schoenberg in Berlin. Early works include settings of poetry by Cummings and Whitman, instrumental pieces, and short operas. One opera, The Condemned (1932), obliquely refers to the Sacco and Vanzetti case.

With The Cradle Will Rock (1936), a musical about a Congress of Industrial Organizations-type union struggle in Steeltown, USA, that draws strong portraits of the sold-out middle class, Blitzstein joined the Left wholeheartedly. (His wife, Eva Goldbeck [1901–1936], was one of the first Americans to understand Bertolt Brecht's esthetic approach; she wrote about Brecht and translated him into English.) In I've Got the Tune (1937), a radio song-play, he showed the odyssey of a composer finding his true home in the protest movement. He wrote scores for the labor films Valley Town and Native Land, and incidental music for numerous plays. In No for an Answer (1941) he again approached working-class organizing issues, but in a more folk-operatic style. He was a Communist Party member from 1936 or 1938 until 1949.

During World War II, Blitzstein served in London in the U.S. Army Air Force; he wrote incidental music for troop shows, researched French Resistance music, composed an orchestral piece, Freedom Morning, and a cantata for male chorus and orchestra, The Airborne Symphony. After the war he helped organize the American-Soviet Music Society. Red Channels gave him a four-page listing; he gave private testimony, without naming others, to the House Committee on Un-American Activities in 1958.

His major later works include Regina (1949), an opera based on Lillian Hellman's The Little Foxes; Reuben Reuben (1955), a Faustian musical about the life urge overcoming the death wish; Junio (1959), a musical version of Sean O'Casey's Juno and the Paycock; Idiots First (1963), a one-act opera based on Bernard Malamud's story; and the uncompleted Sacco and Vanzetti (1960–1964), commissioned for the Metropolitan Opera.

In 1952 Blitzstein premiered his English adaptation of Bertolt Brecht and Kurt Weill's Threepenny Opera, which went on to a nearly seven-year run off-Broadway. Blitzstein left a solid repertory of humanistic work for the American stage, opening up new possibilities in subject and style, that no one has equaled since.

BLOOR, ELLA REEVE (1862–1951). Labor organizer, journalist, and advocate of women's rights, "Mother" Bloor achieved heroic status within the Communist Party, USA (CPUSA), and served as its model of Communist womanhood. Born on Staten Island, New York, to middle-class parents, she worked her way through the suffrage and temperance movements into the Social Democratic Party of America in 1897 and the Socialist Labor Party in 1898. Throughout her life she maintained her first political concern, the condition of women and their children. As late as 1934 she organized the U.S. delegation to the International Workers' Conference against War and Fascism, held in Paris. In her seventies she conducted a major lecture tour for International Women's Day.

In 1902 Bloor joined the Socialist Party and became a devoted follower of Debs. She ran for state office on the Socialist Party ticket, served as a union organizer in the machine, mining, and garment trades, and campaigned militantly for woman suffrage. After the publication of Upton Sinclair's The Jungle in 1906, Bloor assisted the author in verifying his descriptions of conditions in Chicago's stockyards for a government investigating commission. Openly opposed to World War I, she helped to form the Workers Defense Union.

In 1919 Bloor became a founding member of the CPUSA and served on its Central Committee from 1932 to 1948. In 1921 she made her first trip to the Soviet Union as an American delegate to the First Congress of the Third International of Labor Unions. Throughout the 1920s she worked for industrial unions in textiles and mining. At age sixty-three she hitchhiked across the country to distribute the Daily Worker. By the 1930s this venerable radical became known as "Mother" Bloor. She continued to maintain an active schedule, taking part in hunger marches, demonstrating on behalf of unemployed workers, and helping to build the Farmers National Committee for Action. At age seventy-two she was arrested for assault and inciting a riot and imprisoned for a month.

In 1937 Bloor returned to the Soviet Union, this time to be an honored celebrant of the twentieth anniversary of the Bolshevik Revolution. Upon her return she wrote Women in the Soviet Union (1938), a short pamphlet extolling its model programs of child care and protection of motherhood.

Married three times, the mother of eight children, Bloor managed a busy schedule throughout her life. Elizabeth Gurley Flynn met her in 1910 and recalled that Bloor, then in her late forties, "moved as if she were flying rather than walking." In addition to her lecture and organizing tours, Bloor wrote for Left newspapers as well as such mainstream publications as Pearson's Magazine. During World War II she conducted her final lecture tour to build support for the war against fascism. As a testament to her lifelong work, she left an autobiography, We Are Many (1940), and wrote: "It has been a privilege and joy to carry the torch of socialism. . . ."

BOOKCHIN, MURRAY (b. 1921). One of the foremost contemporary anarchist theorists, Murray Bookchin was born in New York of Russian Jewish immigrant parents. During the 1930s he was a militant in the Young Pioneers and the Young Communist League. He later entered the Trotskyist movement, worked in an iron foundry and auto plant, and organized for several unions, including United Auto Workers locals. By the 1950s he was writing extensively for the libertarian Marxist journal Contemporary Issues.

In the 1960s Bookchin emerged as a central figure in contemporary anarchism. He was a force in various anarchist organizations, including the Radical Decentralist project, the third largest faction of Students for a Democratic Society. As both a theorist and an indefatigable speaker, he exerted a major influence on the revival of anarchism as both a cultural tendency and a political movement.

By the 1970s Bookchin's theoretical work became his prime focus. While his pioneering work in ecology began in the early 1950s, it came to maturity with his founding of the Institute for Social Ecology in 1974 and in a series of major works on ecological social theory, including Post-Scarcity Anarchism (1971), Toward an Ecological Society (1980), and his magnum opus, The Ecology of Freedom (1982). In other writings he established his place in radical urbanism and the critique of technology.

Bookchin's work continued to evolve in the 1980s. He developed a theory of libertarian municipalism, a full-scale critique of nature philosophy, and the defense of radical ecology ("fundamentalism") within the Green movement. He is director emeritus of the Institute for Social Ecology in Vermont.

BOUDIN, LOUIS B. (1874–1952). For a time the foremost Marxist economic theoretician in the United States, Louis B. Boudin (né L. Budinoff) played an ambiguous role in the Left-Socialist and Communist movements, reemerging later as a rare scholar of U.S. legal history. All the while a prominent lawyer, he may also be considered the earliest important constitutional theorist within the U.S. Left.

Born into a middle-class family in Russia, Boudin immigrated to the United States in 1891. He quickly began legal studies, entering New York University, gaining a master's degree from that institution and admittance to the New York bar in 1898. In this period, he was already a major theoretician in Yiddish, writing under his own name in such publications as Di Zukunft and Di Naye Geist on aesthetics and historical materialism. He played a minor role in the Socialist Labor Party.

Boudin found himself a Left dissenter within the Socialist Party, and a contentious theoretician in the Yiddish and English-language press. From his perspective, the naive Socialist Party lacked theoretical rigor and made too many compromises with perceived American reality. His essays on economics in the International Socialist Review (where he was recognized as one of the very few sophisticated theoreticians that the Socialist Party could boast of) grew into his classic, The Theoretical System of Karl Marx. Essentially an "answer" to Ernst Böhm-Bawerk's contemporary challenge to Marxism's predictions, The Theoretical System placed itself ambivalently upon the key question of the "falling rate of profit." He offered the suggestion, often repeated later (by Paul Sweezy and Harry Magdoff, among others), that capital used its surplus in war making and rebuilt its profitability during the period following.

Notwithstanding the international reputé of The Theoretical System (especially its German edition), Boudin gained little popular recognition among American socialists. He wrote widely for the New York daily Call, the New Review, and Di Zukunft, however. In 1917 he joined with Louis Fraina and Ludwig Lore to launch Class Struggle, a proto-Bolshevik monthly. Yet fixed upon a vision of Marxian precision, he disputed the Socialist Party's antiwar stance with his own (he also defended radicals arrested on wartime charges); and he viewed the Russian Revolution as an impossible attempt to create socialism under primitive capitalist productive conditions. He therefore stalked out of the 1919 Communist Labor Party convention, separating himself from any section of the fractured Left.

In later years, Boudin shied away from formal political involvement, although he taught at the Communist-led Workers School in the later 1920s and occasionally wrote for New Masses in the middle and late 1930s. By 1940 he had repudiated Communism, while adamantly defending individual Communists' constitutional rights. For the most part, Boudin shifted to legal activities and to his own scholarship. As a lawyer, he won several important cases for the rights of specific sectors of workers to organize. As an author, he supplied two large volumes of Government by Judiciary (1932), the only thorough-going Marxist historical account of American jurisprudence ever attempted.

Government by Judiciary was in fact a rather Bear-dian effort to reveal usurpation of democratic prerogatives by a vested, aggressive elite. In his view, the Federalist attempt to graft English common law upon the American system ended in a collision with "the people," i.e., Jefferson and his mass support, with an accompanying loss of prestige to the Supreme Court. Chief Justice Marshall succeeded where his predecessors had failed, however, in turning people's rights to property rights. Despite a fresh challenge to the courts by popular Jacksonianism, a rising sense of Court prerogative, capped by Chief Justice Taney's Dred Scott decision, prepared the Court's later role in overturning democratic decision-making. Never widely read in Left circles, Government by Judiciary remained in use among law students for decades. Boudin himself, largely active in refugee efforts after World War II, was by his death a figure forgotten in the Left but for his family, one of the most prominent in Left law to date.

BOURNE, RANDOLPH S. (1886–1918). Social critic Randolph Bourne occupies a unique place in the history of the American Left as a voice of independent radicalism and an icon of intellectual integrity. Bourne's first essays, collected in Youth and Life (1913), established him as an early interpreter of twentieth-century cultural radicalism. A democrat and a cosmopolitan, Bourne went on to savage both the Arnoldian ideal of high culture and the notion of an American "melting pot" in the name of a new "transnational" culture that would draw on native, immigrant, and European currents of expression. Bourne is best known for the searing anti-war essays he wrote for the Seven Arts in the years before his tragic death, at age thirty-two, in the influenza epidemic of 1918. Denouncing John Dewey and other pro-war Progressives for their support for U.S. involvement in World War I, Bourne articulated a radical-democratic intellectual stance that went on to influence subsequent generations of thinkers who echoed his critique of technocratic liberalism and the wartime state, notably Dwight Macdonald, Lewis Mumford, Dorothy Day, C. Wright Mills, Noam Chomsky, and Christopher Lasch.

Bourne grew up in Bloomfield, New Jersey, where his disability and the circumstances of his family life bred an early suspicion of his hometown's official middle-class Protestantism. A forceps delivery permanently disfigured his face; spinal tuberculosis in infancy left him a hunchbacked dwarf. His father's abandonment of his family, after years of alcoholism and financial problems, further contributed to Bourne's sense of marginality in Bloomfield. Together, his father's collapse and his mother's ineffectual efforts to maintain genteel pretenses in the face of economic catastrophe bred in Bourne a deep hostility to the rhetoric of masculine self-reliance and the Victorian ideal of a feminine domestic culture. Beginning with the essays he wrote as a student at Columbia (1909–1913), Bourne returned time and again to questions of personal identity and friendship. Insisting on the connection between private life and public institutions, and between culture and politics, Bourne attracted an audience of young feminists, artistic modernists, and bohemians who shared his alienation from rugged individualism and the emerging corporate ethic. Bourne's admirers thrilled to his appeals for "self-fulfillment" through the creation of a more democratic culture and politics—what he called "the good life of personality lived in the environment of the Beloved Community." This synthesis of personal and political themes made Bourne a leader of the prewar Greenwich Village "Little Renaissance" and helped define the modern intellectual's vocation as an interpreter of culture, politics, and personal life.

Bourne was as familiar as any member of his generation with Freud, Marx, and Nietzsche, but he also drew deeply from American radical sources in his criticism: the democratic populism of Henry George and Walt Whitman; the pragmatism of William James and John Dewey; the critique of Arnoldian culture mounted by Van Wyck Brooks, Waldo Frank, and Thorstein Veblen; and the multiethnic working-class dramatized by the Paterson Strike Pageant of 1913. While at Columbia, Bourne joined the Intercollegiate Socialist Society and imbibed the politics of faculty on the left wing of the Progressive movement, above all Dewey and Charles Beard. Even more important, Bourne came into contact with a circle of second-generation immigrant students whose attempts to negotiate between their parents' Old War traditions and native American traditions inspired Bourne's Atlantic essay of 1916, "Trans-national America." There Bourne attacked the melting-pot ideal as an undemocratic relic of Anglo-Saxon colonization. His alternative was not the cultural pluralism of Horace Kallen, let alone a "decentered" multiculturalism, but a cosmopolitan common culture forged by a radical intelligentsia and the ethnic working class.

In his writing for the New Republic in the mid-teens, and in The Gary Schools (1916) and Education and Living (1917), Bourne embraced pragmatism and Dewey's proposals for educational reform as resources for a democratic culture that would transcend the antithesis of commercial practice and Victorian moralism in American life. But Dewey's decision to join the editors of the New Republic in support of Woodrow Wilson's war policy was a devastating blow that forced Bourne to reconsider his pragmatist and Progressive assumptions. In the penetrating essays he wrote for the Seven Arts during the war, Bourne condemned Dewey and his followers for fostering a cult of technique and power that played to intellectuals' illusions of mastery and political control. The war clarified Bourne's position as a democrat and moralist. He insisted that the primary responsibility of radical intellectuals was to stimulate public debate through social criticism and the articulation of moral values, even if that meant forsaking immediate political efficacy. Bourne's courageous opposition to the war inspired a later generation of anti-war radicals, as student protesters in the 1960s read his denunciation of Dewey as a dress rehearsal for their own attacks on the pro-war liberals who prosecuted the war in Vietnam.

What Bourne's subsequent admirers may have missed was his open ambivalence about his position as an anti-war radical. On the one hand, he was given to Nietzschean rhetoric about an avant-garde opposition of intellectual "malcontents" contemptuous of the public's "herd mentality." On the other, he sought to ground his deepening radicalism in a renewed appreciation for the local loyalties he glimpsed in the American popular imagination. Bourne recognized that modern nation-states need war, but not a politically mobilized public. While his former colleagues within the Progressive intelligentsia rushed to join the Wilson administration's war effort, Bourne took his stand with the apparently passive Americans who remained "below the battle": men and women whose indifference to wartime propaganda betrayed a culture of friendship, family ties, and mutual aid that Bourne admired as an alternative to state coercion. Bourne's posthumously published essay "The State"—with its haunting refrain, "War is the health of the state"—suggests that he was looking at the end of his life to such popular forms of solidarity as the basis for a new radicalism.

BRADEN, ANNE AND CARL (b. 1924 and 1914–1974, respectively). Prominent journalists who joined forces in Louisville, Kentucky, where they met as education and labor editors, respectively, for the Louisville Times, Anne and Carl Braden spent their careers at the center of battles to transform the South, and were repeatedly attacked as subversives for their work supporting black freedom. Ann Gambrell Mc-Carty, the college-educated daughter of a relatively privileged family, was raised in Mississippi and Alabama. As a result of her upbringing and the Episcopal church, her education at Stratford and Randolph-Macon (Virginia) women's colleges, contact with a young black woman in New York, and her experiences as a reporter in Anniston and Birmingham, Alabama, she came to abhor the ugly effects of the South's segregation system on whites and its humiliating impact on blacks. She returned to Louisville, her birthplace, in 1947 at age twenty-three. There she met thirty-three-year-old Carl Braden, who had already been married and divorced, had organized unions, and had worked his way up through a variety of newspapers in Harlan County, Knoxville, and Cincinnati. Carl came from Portland, a poor white section of Louisville. His father, a railroad shop worker and factory hand, imbued him with the socialist teachings of Eugene Debs, while his Catholic mother taught him the social gospel. Carl attended Catholic schools and proseminary, but abandoned plans to join the priesthood and instead went to work in 1931 as a newspaper reporter. He and Anne married in 1948, and the couple became public relations directors for Left-led unions affiliated with the Congress of Industrial Organizations and worked in the Progressive Party campaign.

Mississippi authorities jailed Anne in 1951 for leading a delegation of southern white women to the governor's office to protest the scheduled execution of Willie McGee, a black man charged with raping a white woman. Following the Supreme Court's Brown desegregation decision in 1954, Kentucky state prosecutors arrested the Bradens and charged them with plotting to incite insurrection when they bought a home in a white neighborhood and sold it to a black family. Local newspapers blacklisted them from employment, prosecutors confiscated their books as "evidence," and racists bombed the home they had purchased for Andrew Wade. Held on $40,000 bail, Carl served eight months of a fifteen-year prison sentence for state sedition before a higher court overturned his conviction. Anne popularized the case in a book about segregation titled The Wall Between (1958).

Unable to secure employment as journalists, the Bradens became field organizers and writers for the integrationist Southern Conference Educational Fund (SCEF), which James Eastland's Senate Internal Security Subcommittee (SISS) and the House Un-American Activities Committee (HUAC) had called a Communist front. In 1958 HUAC called the Bradens to Atlanta to testify about the integration movement in the South. In the hearings, Carl stated, "My beliefs and my associations are none of the business of this committee," and refused to testify based on his right of freedom of speech and association contained in the First Amendment. He and anti-HUAC organizer Frank Wilkinson nearly succeeded in winning their First Amendment test case against HUAC but lost it in a celebrated 5-4 decision before the Supreme Court in 1961. As in the Louisville case, authorities put off questioning or prosecuting Anne. She meanwhile wrote and circulated 200,000 copies of a pamphlet, HUAC: Bulwark of Segregation, and traveled across the country in a clemency campaign. Rev. Martin Luther King, Jr., and other black leaders held a dinner honoring Braden and Wilkinson before they entered prison to begin serving ten months of a year's prison sentence for contempt of Congress.

From that time forward, the Bradens continually upheld the position that protection of the First Amendment guarantee of freedom of belief and association, like the struggle for black rights, was integral to all other struggles. They helped launch the National Committee to Abolish HUAC, and throughout the 1960s organized support for most of the major civil rights campaigns. State and federal authorities continually attacked the Bradens and attempted to isolate them from the civil rights movement (Alabama even enjoined Carl from working in the state) and from southern whites. However, the Bradens used every attack against them and against the movement as a platform to raise issues. More than others on the Left, they perfected the use of media and the written word to fight back against repression. In 1967, during a period of increased radicalization in the southern movement, the Bradens became executive directors of SCEF. In the same year, Kentucky authorities again arrested them on charges of sedition, this time for setting up a community organizing project among poor whites in Appalachia. The courts ultimately overturned the law as unconstitutional.

In 1972 the Bradens retired as SCEF directors, Carl setting up a training institute for activists and Anne returning to full-time editing of SCEF's paper, the Southern Patriot. By this time factional and ideological splits of the New Left had torn SCEF apart. Carl resigned to protest what he considered Red-baiting within the organization, and Anne left shortly thereafter when the SCEF board voted down a proposal to renew the organization's formal commitment to interracialism. Carl directed the Training Institute for Propaganda and Organizing, initiated the fight to free North Carolina's Wilmington Ten, and became one of the leaders of the National Alliance against Racist and Political Repression. He died suddenly of a heart attack in 1975 at age sixty, embittered with much of the New Left but never backing down from his participation in the movement. Anne, along with others who had been in SCEF, formed a new group, the Southern Organizing Committee for Economic and Social Justice (SOC). She continued to build interracial coalitions, to work against racist violence, and to support Rev. Jesse Jackson and other black leaders. In the 1990s, Anne worked with Connie Tucker and other SOC leaders to organize a mass conference and a variety of campaigns to confront environmental racism, which became one of SOC's major points of focus.

For many on the Left, the Bradens became the symbol of radical challenge to the segregation system from within the white South. Although the Federal Bureau of Investigation and other authorities warned black civil rights leaders not to work with them, the Bradens developed close working relations with black activists throughout the region and supported the Student Nonviolent Coordinating Committee and the Black Power movement when many liberals turned away. They were widely respected for their unwavering commitment to the struggle against racism, and despite the inquisitions and arrests directed against them, the Bradens never rejected Marxist politics. As principal victims of anticommunism in the South, the Bradens never affirmed or denied whether they ever held membership in any Left party. At the same time, they steadfastly worked with and supported Communists and others on the Left and stated their own socialist beliefs when they thought them relevant to the struggle at hand.

Anne received the 1989 Roger Baldwin Medal of Liberty from the American Civil Liberties Union, for "outstanding commitment to the cause of civil liberties." She donated the $25,000 prize to SOC. The American Civil Liberties Union in Louisville likewise honored her on her seventieth birthday in recognition of her fearless work in the South. The money from that event helped to rebuild the Carl Braden Memorial Center, a library and meeting place in the west end of Louisville that has helped build bridges between races and generate new social movements.

Throughout their years of activism and writing, the Bradens placed their main focus on the struggle for racial justice as the key to changing the South and the nation. As Anne Braden explained her antiracist commitment in the Louisville Defender in 1978, "Our future and that of our children rides with the fate of the Black struggle for progress, and [we must] join in that struggle as if our very lives depend on it. For, in truth, they do."

BREITMAN, GEORGE (1916–1986). A socialist writer, editor, and organizer, George Breitman may be best known for his work in helping to disseminate and popularize the works and ideas of the revolutionary black nationalist Malcolm X, making them available to perhaps millions of people through his edition of Malcolm X Speaks as well as his influential study The Last Year of Malcolm X: The Evolution of a Revolutionary. In addition, he was chief editor of the fourteen-volume Writings of Leon Trotsky (1929–1940).

Breitman joined the Workers Party of the United States in 1935 and was also a leading activist in the New Jersey section of the Workers Alliance. A founding member of the Socialist Workers Party (SWP), he was an organizer of the Newark and Detroit branches of the party, also serving on the National Committee and Political Committee of that organization. He functioned at various times as editor of the weekly Militant. In the late 1960s Breitman became centrally involved in the SWP's Merit Publishers (soon renamed Pathfinder Press), helping to expand greatly its titles—not only works by such people as Trotsky, James P. Cannon, Che Guevara, and Ernest Mandel, but also a variety of pamphlets on black liberation, feminism, the youth radicalization, and socialism (plus a few innovative cultural works on Afro-American poetry and jazz, Lenny Bruce, and surrealism).

In 1984 Breitman was expelled from the SWP (along with many others) as a result of opposition to policies of the party's new leadership. He became a leader of the Fourth Internationalist Tendency, a small group that sought to reunify revolutionary socialists in the United States around the program of the Fourth International.

BRIDGES, HARRY (1901–1990). Because he and the International Longshoremen's and Warehousemen's Union (ILWU) usually stood on the left of the American labor movement, Harry Bridges spent nearly twenty years under threat of deportation and the ILWU was expelled from the Congress of Industrial Organizations (CIO). After 1960, however, Bridges received broad-based acclaim as a labor leader.

Born in Australia, Bridges rejected the white-collar career planned by his middle-class parents. He went to sea in 1917, shipping from American ports after 1920. Exposure to Australian socialism and his seafaring experiences produced a brief affiliation with the Industrial Workers of the World in the early 1920s. In 1922 he began to work as a longshoreman in San Francisco.

In 1933 San Francisco longshoremen formed a local of the International Longshoremen's Association (ILA). Bridges worked closely with Communist Party members to develop a militant longshore union with strong rank-and-file control. During the maritime and general strikes of 1934, he rose rapidly to leadership in the San Francisco local and the West Coast ILA. In 1937 Bridges led the West Coast ILA into the CIO as the ILWU; he became ILWU president and CIO regional director. Activism exacted a toll; Bridges developed severe ulcers and his marriage disintegrated.

From 1934 onward, business leaders, the press, and elected officials labeled Bridges a Red and urged deportation. He denied Party membership but openly supported many Party positions. In 1939 a hearing produced no grounds for deportation, leading Congress to adopt new criteria. A second hearing went against Bridges. The Supreme Court reversed that decision and Bridges became a citizen in 1945.

During World War II, Bridges opposed strikes but refused to compromise on conditions. After the war, he came under renewed attack for his political views. In 1949 Bridges was charged with lying on his naturalization papers regarding Communist affiliations. The Supreme Court ruled in his favor in 1955; federal attorneys filed new charges, but they were quickly dismissed.

In the 1950s Bridges concluded that mechanization of longshore work was inevitable; he led negotiations that produced the Mechanization and Modernization Agreement (M&M) in 1960. The ILWU accepted increased use of machinery on the docks; employers agreed to generous pensions; no layoffs, and guaranteed pay. Fortune called Bridges "the union leader who did best" for his members in 1960. A few ILWU members, especially Communists, criticized the M&M for reducing the size and hence the political clout of the ILWU, producing a brief rift between Bridges and the Party.

His continued admiration for the Soviet Union notwithstanding, Bridges came increasingly to be hailed as a "labor statesman" and was appointed to a city Charter Revision Commission in 1968 and to the San Francisco Port Commission in 1970. He retired as ILWU president in 1977. In 1988 Bridges gave his blessing to ILWU affiliation with the American Federation of Labor and Congress of Industrial Organizations.

As ILWU president, Bridges never accepted a salary higher than the best-paid longshoremen and eschewed perquisites that were routine among some union leaders. In retirement, Bridges stood somewhere between living legend and mythological hero, but accolades always brought his standard response: all honors properly belong to the rank and file. Upon Bridge's death in 1990, pensioners in the Pacific Northwest launched a fund-raising drive that, by 1992, had raised more than a million dollars to endow a Harry Bridges Chair at the University of Washington. In 1992 researchers in the recently opened Comintern archives announced that they had found a document indicating that Bridges was a member of the Central Committee of the Communist Party in 1936, but Bridges loyalists disputed the validity of the document.

"BRING THE BOYS HOME" MOVEMENT.

The largest-scale rebellion in U.S. military history, the victorious post-World War II "Bring the Boys Home" movement began in the fall of 1945, after the unconditional surrender of Japan. Timing of demobilization of the remaining twelve million men and women in the U.S. armed forces depended on a point system based on length of service, number of dependents, combat duty, and decorations. Most combat veterans believed that newly inducted replacements would occupy the former enemy territories and that they would be sent home rapidly. Instead, they were told that points had stopped accumulating on V-J Day. Many found themselves on cross-country trains to the West Coast, where they were loaded on ships headed for the Pacific theater for occupation duty in friendly liberated nations like the Philippines.

At railroad stations men propped up homemade signs in the train windows: SHANGHAIED FOR THE PACIFIC, while cheering crowds on the platforms held up their own signs: THE WAR IS OVER, BRING 'EM HOME! Reporters attempting to interview the soldiers were arrested and detained by the Army Security Guard. In October General Douglas MacArthur announced that 200,000 men would be required in the Far East. President Harry S. Truman publicly contradicted him by stating that two and a half million men were needed. Congressmen were deluged with protest letters and hundreds of "Bring Back Daddy" clubs sprang up all over the country. Among the leaders of this movement was Emil Mazey, later to be secretary-treasurer of the United Automobile Workers. In the 1960s Mazey would be the first major leader of the United Automobile Workers to come out against the war in Vietnam.

The Bring the Boys Home movement gained momentum and was best organized in Manila, the Philippines, where a friendly population had fought an underground war against the Japanese invaders. On Christmas Day four thousand men marched to protest the cancellation of a troopship sailing. Their commander ordered them back to their barracks and dismissed the demonstration as "a college rally."

But when, on 4 January 1946, the War Department announced that 300,000 men per month would be going home from the Pacific instead of the previously projected 800,000, spontaneous demonstrations cropped up all over Manila. On 7 January more than twenty-five hundred men distributed leaflets calling for a mass meeting that night. "The State Department wants the army to back up its imperialism," the leaflet stated, contradicting reports that the swelling tide of protest reflected nothing but homesickness. Twenty thousand men came to the rally. Although the basic demand of the speakers was lower critical point scores, there were many angry denunciations of the U.S. policy and military involvement in northern China, where U.S. troops were aiding Chiang Kai-shek against the Communist supporters of Mao Tse-tung, and in Indonesia, where they were helping in the Dutch attempt to defeat the nationalist forces of Sukarno. The men cheered when speakers informed them that the only purpose for the continued American occupation of the Philippines was to put wealthy landowners who had collaborated with the enemy back in power. Money was collected for a full-page ad in the New York Times and thousands of trade union members stationed in Manila contacted union leaders. The National Maritime Union responded with a nationwide one-day strike, and William Green, president of the American Federation of Labor, issued a public statement of support for early demobilization. On 10 January, 158 delegates elected by 139,000 men formulated a program to present to the members of the Senate Subcommittee on Surplus Materials. A nine-soldier delegation told the visiting senators that members of one

"railroad battalion are being held in Luzon as potential strikebreakers on a native railroad" and added that many of the soldiers interpreted the special combat training of the Eighty-sixth Infantry Division, which had already fought in Europe, as preparation for the repression of possible uprisings by disgruntled farm tenant groups.

By 8 January, the Bring the Boys Home movement had spread throughout the Pacific—to Luzon, Hawaii, and Guam. In Japan, Secretary of War Patterson was greeted by a demonstration when he visited Yokohama and the provost marshal of the U.S. Army Service Command told the press that the demonstrations were "a near mutiny stirred up by a lot of Communists and hotheads." That night, President Truman told the American people that demobilization was taking place "as fast as possible" and that there was "a critical need for troops overseas," while soldiers protested at nearby Andrews Field. By morning the movement had spread to Europe.

Military leaders and government officials could arrive at no consensus on methods of dealing with the Bring the Boys Home movement. They wavered between the carrot of concessions and the stick of punishment, censoring Army newspapers, telling the men their protests were futile, and calling them everything from "Reds" to "sissies." Technically, participants could have been prosecuted under Article 66, the mutiny provision of the Articles of War, but these men were war heroes in the eyes of the public.

At the end of the second week in January, without reference to the burgeoning movement, the War Department instituted a new point system that would release the men more quickly, and efforts to recruit new forces were stepped up. Previously empty ships soon filled up with troops for the voyage home. On 17 January Eisenhower banned GI demonstrations. In Manila, court-martials were ordered for any soldiers who continued agitation for demobilization. But by then, the aim of the Bring the Boys Home movement had clearly been achieved and could not be reversed without great political cost. Nine months after V-E Day and five months after V-J Day, the U.S. World War II veterans had won a stunning victory and were finally going home.

BRITISH AMERICANS. British socialism and British immigrants affected the U.S. Left for the most part in the early period, with a special influence on the artisanal-oriented, gradualistic vision of socialism. Before the establishment of a regular English-language socialist book-publisher, British volumes and pamphlets served an American audience of the 1880s–1890s. William Morris's News from Nowhere and Robert Blatchford's Merrie England enjoyed wide circulation, as did a number of newspapers from the earliest British Marxist organizations, such as William Morris's Commonwealth. A few survivors of Chartism or later British laborism took important roles in the small English-language wing of the Socialist Labor Party. The most prominent, Thomas J. Morgan of Chicago, conducted the "regular" wing of the local socialist movement against the social revolutionaries and sought to direct socialist trade union work into the mainstream union groups rather than competing socialist trades-bodies. Elsewhere, British (along with "Lancashire Irish," i.e., Irish who had come to America by way of Lancashire) labor activists sought the establishment of strong craft unions and (if socialists) an educational effort aimed at the community.

British influences also had a special importance, in some areas, for the growth of libertarian or anarchist ideas. Several of the leading social revolutionaries (including Samuel Fielding, son of a Chartist and himself a former Lancashire prelate) in Chicago were known to have been politically active earlier in England. British-born anarchists, many of them veterans of William Morris's movement, were active in propaganda groups of the 1880s–1890s. They had the most concerted influence in Boston, where they outnumbered other contributors to Benjamin Tucker's Liberty magazine and where, through influence on the local printers' and tailors' unions, they exerted significant influence upon the Central Labor Union.

By the 1890s, the rise of Fabianism and the inability of American ethnic socialists to reach the native-born with an acceptable doctrine brought many American intellectuals in contact with the English socialists. The most prominent American by far, Woman's Christian Temperance Union leader Frances Willard, converted to Fabian Socialism while on an extended visit. Fabian ideas, meanwhile, penetrated the Nationalist Clubs inspired by Edward Bellamy's Looking Backward, prompting the formation of the American Fabian in 1896. A humorous contemporary account probably captures (and caricatures) the intellectual atmosphere:

The former president, Mr. Crosby, sued to say emphatically, thinking probably of the "class struggle," the "social revolution," and the tactics and tone of the SLP: "No, I am not a socialist"; and then, fixing his eyes on the ceiling, he would reflect upon "the Brotherhood of Man," and "Equality Before God" . . . and would murmur dreamily: "Why, yes I am a socialist; really, of course, we all are."

While the American Fabian did not survive the reorganization of the socialist movement in the last years of the century, Fabian and Guild ideas flowed into the new Socialist Party. Gaylord Wilshire, John Spargo, William English Walling, A. M. Simons, Harry Laidler, and other important intellectuals were devout Anglophiles; the journals they edited (or to which they contributed) also featured articles by George Bernard Shaw, H. M. Hyndman, Keir Hardie, Ramsay MacDonald, E. Belfort Bax, Tom Mann, and even Oscar Wilde, and were frequently illustrated by Walter Crane's drawings in the style of William Morris. The Comrade, edited by Spargo, was the most beautiful U.S. Left magazine until the Masses, and was also the most British-influenced.

After 1900, British-American anarchist intellectuals concentrated their efforts upon establishing "Modern Schools" and anarchist colonies in Stelton, New Jersey, and Moghegan, New York, among other places. (One of the prominent figures, William Bridge, was the grandfather of Joan Baez.) Especially in the aftermath of World War I and the Russian Revolution, these institutions became the major points of survival for English-language anarchism, and the publications from them (such as the Road to Freedom, published partly from Stelton in the 1920s–1930s) the chief evidence of intellectual vitality.

The American movement in part outgrew its early dependence upon British writers, and also drew increasingly apart on tactical lines. With World War I, most of the Anglophile writers, whatever their factional orientation, defected to pro-war positions. The major exception and new source of British influence was the pacifist current and the collegiate socialism around the Intercollegiate Socialist and its 1920s successor, Labor Age. Harry Laidler, editor of the Intercollegiate Socialist, would for decades pursue the themes of nationalization as a road to American socialism, and the Independent Labour Party's strategy (through the mainstream labor movement's own political institutions rather than outside) as suitable. Labor education, such as that fostered at the Brookwood Labor College in partial imitation of British workers' education, was the other strand of this program. As late as the 1950s, the League for Industrial Democracy (of which Laidler remained secretary) urged nationalization of the steel industry as the key transition to a more cooperative order.

It could be said that another British phase (or miniphase) ensued with the later 1960s–1970s, when U.S. radical scholars in a number of fields looked to English theoretical explorations. English historian and peace leader E. P. Thompson, very likely the most influential Anglo-American historian after Charles Beard, erected new scholarly paradigms with his Making of the English Working Class (1963), a book of particular importance to a New Left generation deeply drawn to social history. The New Left Review, sometimes correctly viewed as Thompson's nemesis, became for a time a principal fount for Althusserian, structuralist theorizing on both sides of the Atlantic. Other areas of postmodern radical scholarship, from literature to psychology, also looked to specific British intellectuals. The field of cultural studies traced its lineage to the Center for Contemporary Cultural Studies in Birmingham and drew intellectual sustenance from the center's former leading figure, Stuart Hall. Meanwhile, Christopher Hitchens and Alexander Cockburn occupied, during the 1980s, positions of influence as the columnists of the Left in the Nation and elsewhere.

The waning of the postmodern phase in the middle 1990s found the New Left Review a more traditionally Marxist and increasingly well-read publication within the United States (without regaining its peak influence of the 1970s), more advertised and seen than any American-based Left theoretical journal. Verso, the New Left Review's publishing arm, became a leading press of the American Left. On the political front, one particularly lively if sectarian group, the International Socialist Organization, looked continually to its "home" organization and journals in Britain.

BRODSKY, JOSEPH (1889–1947). A founding member of the Communist movement, the International Labor Defense (ILD), and the International Worker's Order (IWO), attorney Joseph Brodsky was involved in hundreds of political cases from the time of the Palmer Raids through the early years of the Cold War. But he gained his greatest fame for his work on behalf of the Scottsboro Boys. Born in Kiev, Russia, he immigrated to New York City with his parents at age two. Benjamin Brodsky, his father, was a shirt-maker and a militant Socialist who was a founder of Branch 1 of the Workmen's Circle. Joseph Brodsky was a socialist soapboxer by age thirteen and a formal member of the Socialist Party when he began to practice law in 1912. Along with brother Carl Brodsky, Joseph was soon a delegate to the City Central Committee, where they both came into conflict with the Socialist Party's moderate wing. The brothers joined John Reed, Jim Larkin, and other Left socialists who left the Socialist Party in 1919 to form the Communist Party.

The immediate impulse of the creation of the ILD in 1925 was the government persecution of Communists who had attended the "secret" 1922 Unity convention in Bridgman, Michigan. Drawing on the tradition that had created defense networks for persecuted labor activists such as the McNamaras, Tom Mooney, and the members of the Industrial Workers of the World in Centralia, Washington, the ILD brought seventy-eight delegates from trade unions and fraternal organizations together with twenty-three delegates from the Labor Defense Councils set up by the Communist Party to defend its leaders. One of the first cases taken on was support of Sacco and Vanzetti. The strategy involved massive public demonstrations to buttress the actual legal maneuvers. That defense approach remained a hallmark of a Brodsky defense.

Through the years, Brodsky would be the general counsel of the IWO, adviser to many trade unions, and attorney for Communists such as C. E. Ruthenberg, William Z. Foster, Robert Minor, and Rose Pastor Stokes. His cases usually entailed conspiracy charges that resulted from strikes or demonstrations. His legal thrust was always aimed at exploiting what he considered a fundamental contradiction between the constitutional guarantee of political equality and an economic system that guaranteed social inequality. He also thought it was possible, at times, to appeal to the better instincts of judges who were upset by gross inequities and wished to preserve social stability. One of his assets in arguing a case was a charming personality and an infectious sense of humor. Joseph Brodsky remained a Communist militant his entire life. At the time he suffered his fatal heart attack, he was working on the defense of Eugene Dennis, and he had just raised $24,000 for the United Jewish Appeal in a speech at the Mohegan Colony in rural New York.

BROOKWOOD COLLEGE. See Workers' Education.

BROTHERHOOD OF TIMBER WORKERS.

Founded in December 1910 in Carson, Louisiana, by the socialist sawmill workers Arthur Lee Emerson and Jay Smith, the Brotherhood of Timber Workers (BTW) was a radical, interracial industrial union that organized thousands of lumberjacks and sawmill workers in the Louisiana/Texas Piney Woods region and that, according to an opponent, was "covering the country like a blanket" by 1912. At first a semisecret society replete with Knights of Labor-derived rituals, it was forced entirely underground in early 1912. However, during the spring of that year an open, official BTW convention was held in Alexandria, Louisiana. Persuaded by speeches from William "Big Bill" Haywood and the southern poet, organizer, and editor Covington Hall (1871–1952), the delegates voted to affiliate with the Industrial Workers of the World (IWW). The convention further adopted the IWW practice of integrated organization and voted to accord membership rights to working-class women, including the wives of timber workers. Black workers joined the union in force, along with "redneck" whites and some Mexicans and American Indians.

During a series of bitter strikes and lockouts in 1912 and early 1913, the union's fortunes fluctuated greatly. It grew to include as many as twenty-thousand members. Nearby tenant farmers supported BTW actions and even joined the union themselves. Local residents, including many farmers who became timber workers, often resented the lumber corporations as "intruders" who brought in strikebreakers, interfered with traditions regarding common use of the woods, and destroyed the environment. However, the union suffered from fierce repression by public agencies and private police, especially in Louisiana at Grabow, the scene of a large gun battle, and Merryville, the scene of a violent strike. Legal defense came to take much of the time and money of the union, while race-baiting, blacklists, and the massive importation of strikebreakers exacted a heavy toll. By March 1913 the BTW had lost its struggle for egalitarian industrial unionism in the Piney Woods.

BROWDER, EARL (1891-1973). One of eight children, Earl Browder was from a British family that immigrated to America before the Revolution, a fact that Communist propaganda of the Popular Front rarely failed to mention. Son of a teacher who became an invalid and grandson of a Methodist circuit-riding minister, Browder was born in 1891 into a poor family in Wichita, Kansas, his ancestors having moved from Virginia to the Midwest. Forced to leave school before the age of ten, he worked first as an errand boy and then bookkeeper while he completed a law correspondence course.

As in much of Kansas before World War I, populist and socialist tendencies were present in his family. Before finding his way into the Communist movement—as did several of his siblings—Browder passed through the Socialist Party (he left after William D. Haywood's recall) and then a local Kansas group, the Workers' Educational League, which followed the line of William Z. Foster's Syndicalist League of North America of working within the American Federation of Labor (AFL). In 1914 Browder became president of his local of the AFL Union of Bookkeepers and Stenographers and in 1916 worked for a farmers' cooperative store in Kansas City. Arrested in 1917 for his opposition to the war, he served two jail sentences of more than a year each, which limited his political involvement. Influenced by the Russian Revolution, he rejoined the Socialist Party and, with James Cannon, took over the Kansas City local for the left wing. In 1919 he put out the Workers' World, one of the first procommunist newspapers outside New York. In jail when the first Communist groups had been formed, he entered the United Communist Party in January 1921 and accepted the offer to organize an American trade union delegation—of which Foster would become part—to the first Congress of the Red International of Labor Unions (Profintern) to be held in Moscow in July 1921.

Elected an alternate member from Kansas of the first Central Executive Committee of the Workers Party at its December 1921 founding convention, Browder appeared to be a quiet and unassuming second-level functionary. He helped edit the Labor Herald, the monthly of the Communist Party—founded Trade Union Educational League, and was considered Foster's chief lieutenant and part of the latter's trade union group against the more "political" Workers Party leadership of C. E. Ruthenberg and Jay Lovestone.

American representative to the Profintern in 1926, he worked for its Pan-Pacific Secretariat in the late twenties and served as part of a mission to China in that crucial period. Absent at the height of the factional struggles in the American Party, Browder came directly into the leadership supported by the Comintern, which appreciated his organizational abilities. Already prominent at the June 1930 Seventh Convention, he was elected general secretary at the following convention four years later.

In the early New Deal, he moved the Party out of its isolation and fought against sectarian tendencies still strongly present: he indicated that the New Deal, though moving in the direction of fascism, had not yet arrived there; he pushed forward United Front activities in 1933-1934 around farm and unemployment questions; and he opposed underestimating work in the AFL. The Labor Party policy in early 1935—adopted naturally after consultation with Moscow but perhaps initiated by Browder himself—attempted to transfer the United Front approach to the electoral arena.

The Communist Party in the second half of the thirties emerged under Browder, through its presence in the trade union and cultural worlds and its increasing connection to the New Deal, as a genuinely American political force on the national level and in various local situations. After the official launching of the Popular Front policy, he increasingly noted the positive tendencies in the administration—especially as a seemingly antifascist foreign policy emerged. The Communist secretary showed great capacity for interacting with various New Deal and left-of-center political exponents, religious leaders, and intellectuals as well as for finding wealthy financial backers for Party enterprises. Putting forward with vigor the Party's Popular Front image and its claim to be the continuer of the eighteenth-century revolutionary tradition, he stated in 1935 that "we are the Americans and Communism is the Americanism of the twentieth century" (later he was compelled to recognize the "limitations" of this formulation). As to the final direction of the Communist movement, he maintained somewhat lamely that whatever strengthened the working class also went in the direction of socialism.

After the 1939 German-Soviet Pact, as part of a general crackdown on Communists, Browder was arrested for a minor passport violation committed in the twenties. Sentenced in 1940 to four years in jail and a fine, he received fourteen percent of the vote in a special congressional election on New York's Lower East Side in the same year. Partially reflecting neutralist sentiment, this electoral energy also indicated that Communist strength in this working-class-immigrant area had remained constant despite the German-Soviet Pact and opposition to Roosevelt.

In May 1942, Franklin Roosevelt commuted Browder's sentence. In these years the Communist secretary willingly put himself forward as a sort of unofficial spokesman not only for Stalin but also Mao Tse-tung and Tito among others. On this basis he corresponded and met with Under Secretary of State Sumner Welles about various international questions.

During the war, Browder's ideas moved ever further away from classical Marxism and Leninism: as part of an all-out win-the-war effort he put forward an incentive-pay proposal to increase productivity and also supported Roosevelt's war-service proposal; he supported a national unity that included not only monopoly capitalists but also reactionaries in the Democratic Party; and he denied the relevance of the right to national self-determination for the black population. Americans were now, he believed, subjectively unprepared for the discussion of socialism.

After the "Teheran meeting" in late 1943, Browder affirmed not only that the Big Three would remain allies after the war and that Europe would be reconstructed on a nonfascist, capitalist basis but that an identity of interests existed between American capitalism with its increased productive capacity and the progress of the war-torn and undeveloped world in need of capital and goods. Within the United States, labor-management cooperation was to continue while the Party would dissolve organizationally with members operating in existing organisms as a left-wing pressure group.

The opposition of Foster in early 1944 to this latter proposal found support neither in Moscow nor in the Communist Party leadership: Browder's positions seem to have corresponded to a widespread desire of members for full political integration and acceptability and to have been in step with the Party's general direction. In the late spring of 1945, however, Browder fell from power as an article by French communist leader Jacques Duclos, undoubtedly inspired by Moscow, criticized his interpretation of the Teheran conference as something more than a diplomatic agreement between governments. Despite the existence of a genuine cult of personality, Browder's total rejection of this criticism made removal obligatory. In July 1945 a special convention reconstituted the Party. Knowledge that Foster's criticism had been suppressed and that Moscow did not support the ex-secretary, added to the developing Cold War and the strike wave of 1945–1946, which negated Browder's predictions of international and domestic tranquility, all contributed to the membership's acceptance of this turnaround.

Browderism received little support from abroad. With its virtual elimination of anti-imperialism, it could never be very popular in Latin America, while in Europe Communist forces, although following a policy of unity, showed no intention of prematurely disbanding as an independent political force. Nor was previous friendship with the Chinese Communists sufficient to bring them in on his side.

Expelled from the Party in February 1946, Browder held a position for a few years as U.S. representative for Soviet publishing concerns, but this in no way led to his political rehabilitation. In the years of his withdrawal from all public life, he published Marx and America and worked on several versions of an uncompleted autobiography. Although his name had been bandied about during the 1956 upheaval in the Party, his death in 1973 went largely unnoticed.

During the favorable conjuncture of the thirties and the war his line stimulated Party growth in numbers and influence and its entry into mainstream politics. Never considered the direct representative of a politically conscious working-class minority nor an apostle of a new socialist society, Earl Browder was primarily an able tactician capable of developing theoretical justifications.

BROWN, WILLIAM MONTGOMERY (1854-1937). An important radical-religious pamphleteer, Bishop William Montgomery Brown popularized the Russian Revolution and personally dramatized the continuing appeal of "free thought" to millions of readers. Brown had grown up poor in Ohio, then met a wealthy Cleveland patroness who made possible his education and whose niece became Brown's supportive wife. Educated at Kenyon College and ordained an Episcopal priest in 1884, Brown quickly gained a reputation for attracting converts. Appointed bishop of Arkansas, Brown began to oppose racism openly with The Crucial Race Question (1907). Resigning under fire in 1912, Brown returned to his Galion, Ohio, home to study and to write prolifically. He wrote in favor of birth control, against abuse of Native Americans by whites, and—greatly influenced by World War I—for socialism.

Brown's Communism and Christianity (1920), wherein he urged humanity to "Banish Gods from Skies and Capitalists from Earth," was instantly neously popular. Over the next twenty years, it would be translated into more than a dozen languages and go through numerous editions totaling more than a million copies. Communism and Christianity made Brown an important public figure. A decade earlier, he might have joined the then-considerable Christian Socialist milieu. An enthusiast of Russia, he ill fit a young Communist movement with little room for popular eclectics.

Brown achieved his greatest celebrity as martyr to free thought. Brought up on heresy charges by the U.S. House of Bishops in 1925, he was defended by Joseph Sharts, noted attorney for Eugene Debs. After seven months' deliberation and much public controversy, he was removed (and later installed as bishop in the small Old Catholic movement).

Thereafter, Brown spoke widely for Communist causes, from the Daily Worker to International Labor Defense, a public lecturer of extraordinary figure in his ecclesiastical garb. He also continued with his personal sense of mission, supporting Irish and black revolutionaries and (with the onset of the Depression) the poor in his own Galion. Loyal to the Communist Party, he bequeathed it virtually his entire estate. The "Brownella Cottage," where he lived and to which many famous visitors came, remained for decades abandoned. Local friends managed, in recent years, to add the cottage to the National Registry of Historic Places and to convince the local Galion Historical Society to reopen it as a museum, with the bishop's personal library and papers intact.

BRYANT, LOUISE (1885-1936). The daughter of a newspaperman, Anna Louise Mohan was born in San Francisco; she took her stepfather's surname when her mother remarried. She graduated from the University of Oregon in 1909, married a Portland dentist, and with him raised Persian cats. She met John Reed while he was in Portland visiting his mother, and within weeks she went to New York City at his urging. As soon as her divorce became final, she married Reed.

Her life with the tumultuous Reed caused her to be slighted both by her Greenwich Village contemporaries and by subsequent historical (including media) treatments. She was, however, a talented journalist in her own right—she went with him to Russia during the Russian Revolution of 1917 and had a series of newspaper stories already in print when he arrived home. The book she wrote, Six Months in Russia, won praise for its clear information, and she addressed large, enthusiastic American audiences on a whirlwind tour.

Following Reed's death of typhus in Russia in 1920, Bryant stayed on to write for King Features, a Hearst syndicate, and International News Service. Among the first Western reporters to travel to the vast stretches of eastern Russia, she remained an outstanding observer. Later, increasingly wearied and reportedly depressed, she traveled frequently, spending much time in Paris. After her death, she became almost immediately an obscure figure, her acclaim of the 1920s forgotten next to John Reed's deathless (and much deserved) reputation.

BUCK, PEARL S. (1892–1972). Winner of the Pulitzer Prize in 1931 for her portrait of Chinese peasant life in The Good Earth and recipient of the Nobel Prize for literature in 1938, Pearl S. Buck exemplified one face of the American anticolonialist and anti-imperialist tradition. Having grown up in China as the daughter of American missionaries, she became a highly visible critic of the practice of missionary work in the 1930s. Working with her second husband, Richard J. Walsh—the editor of Asia magazine and president of the John Day publishing company—she helped left-wing writers on China such as Edgar Snow, Helen Foster Snow, Agnes Smedley, and Anna Louise Strong reach American audiences.

Through her articles and speeches during World War II, she became, as W. E. B. Du Bois noted, the leading American exponent of the view that the Allies must renounce colonialism and racism in order to attract support in Asia and among African Americans in the United States. She presciently believed that the American failure to break with colonialism during the war laid the basis for future wars, and she warned against the rise of U.S. imperialism in "American Imperialism in the Making." She headed such organizations as the American Civil Liberties Union's Committee against Racial Discrimination during the war, the India League of America (which worked to support India's independence from Britain), the Citizens' Committee To End Chinese Exclusion, and the East and West Association (an early advocate of multicultural education). While Buck was not a socialist or a Marxist, and her writings exhibited an ambivalence about revolution, she was associated with more orthodox leftists, as well as a broader progressive spectrum, in these groups.

Buck's early writings portrayed the subordination of Chinese women, but by the late 1930s she was also highly critical of formal and informal discrimination against women in the United States. While consistently critical of Stalinism, Buck was an early opponent of the Cold War and of the American military build-up in the late 1940s, warning of American tendencies toward fascism. She advocated recognition of the People's Republic of China after 1949, and opposed U.S. policy in the Korean War as well. Using her unique public credibility as an interpreter of the views of Asian peoples for Americans, she wrote widely in these years on the theme that the United States was the most hated nation in the world because of its development of the atom bomb, its arrogance as a superpower, and the great gap between American ideals and reality, especially on racial issues.

After 1951 Buck's explicitly political activity waned and her writings contained increasingly anti-Communist overtones. Nevertheless, she launched in the 1950s a crusade to focus attention on the problems of babies born to American GI fathers and Asian mothers, mounting a critique of American society and policy that linked the issues of racism, sexism, and militarism.

BULGARIAN AMERICANS. The major period of Bulgarian immigration was between 1900 and 1920. Most of these immigrants settled in industrial centers to become factory workers, while a smaller number worked in railroad construction. Having participated in progressive movements in their native land, Bulgarians early joined the ranks of American labor and by 1910 had established Marxist groups in many of their communities.

The most famous personality in the early period was George Andreytchine, who was drawn to the Industrial Workers of the World (IWW) and became a key leader in the IWW-led strike of sixteen-thousand Mesabi Range miners in 1916. A year later he was among the 101 members of the IWW convicted in the infamous Chicago mass trial, where he received a sentence of twenty years in prison and a $20,000 fine. While fighting the conviction in higher courts, he worked with John Reed during the founding of the American communist movement in 1919. When his appeal process ran out two years later, he joined seven other Wobblies in choosing exile in the Soviet Union with William D. "Big Bill" Haywood rather than returning to Leavenworth Prison.

In the succeeding decade politically progressive Bulgarians gravitated to the Worker Education Clubs founded in Detroit, Michigan, in 1925 and the Macedonian-American League founded in Gary, Indiana, in 1931. They also gave considerable public support to compatriot George Dimitrov during the time of the Reichstag Fire case. Detroit's Suzanni (Consciousness), a weekly newspaper, was particularly aggressive in supporting Dimitrov.

During the early 1930s Bulgarians were active in hunger marches, and later in the decade they participated in sit-down strikes in the auto and steel industries, where they were staunch supporters of the Congress of Industrial Organizations. Although the smallest of the Slavic groups (100,000), Bulgarians played an important interethnic role by helping to unite Slavic American organizations on behalf of the war effort.

At war's end the influence of progressive thought among Bulgarians, as among other Slavic groups, was substantial, but this political current ebbed considerably with the coming of McCarthyism and the Cold War. A number of Bulgarians were deported, and radical organizations went into a decline from which they have never recovered.

BULOSAN, CARLOS (1911–1956). When Carlos Bulosan landed in America in 1930, nearly 100,000 young men like him had been recruited from Filipino peasant villages to run Alaska's canneries and work the plantations of Hawaii and the West Coast. While in search of two brothers who had migrated earlier, Bulosan had also come to complete his education and become a writer.

It was not a time to become a writer for oneself. Caught in the maelstrom of the Depression, Filipinos (then called "Pinoy") faced irregular underemployment, exploitation by labor contractors and large-scale growers, unmitigated racism, and vigilante violence. The Tydings-McDuffie Act limited Filipino immigration yearly to fifty in 1934, and the Repatriation Act of 1935 threatened Pinoy with deportation. Bulosan eventually gave up his plan to finish school and helped organize Filipino resistance against these oppressive practices and moves.

Bulosan scholar Susan Evangelista has traced Bulosan's radicalization to this period, when he had lived with his brothers Dionisio and Aurelio in California and seen firsthand the vicissitudes of Filipino migrant life. Indeed, by this time, Bulosan had served as a publicist for the organization of what was later to become the United Cannery, Agricultural, Packing and Allied Workers of America. He had also put out a short-lived bimonthly called the New Tide and written scathing pieces for local newspapers about the problems of Pinoy. Turning to self-education, he had begun reading intensively at the Los Angeles Public Library, this time to become a writer for his countrymen.

From 1934 to 1937, strikes by Filipino workers broke out in California, persisting far into the beginnings of World War II. According to Evangelista, it was within this period that Bulosan forged his lasting friendship with Chris Mensalvas, an active Filipino unionist based in Seattle. By publishing the New Tide he came to know literary figures and the struggling socialist writer Sanora Babb. While confined for tuberculosis at the Los Angeles County Hospital from 1936 to 1938, Bulosan read and wrote intensively, guided by Dorothy, Babb's sister, and urged by Harriet Monroe, editor of Poetry.

It was from this period until 1946 that Bulosan published widely. His career peaked with the best-selling The Laughter of My Father (1944) and his revered ethnobiography of Pinoys, America Is in the Heart (1946). Bulosan wrote about Filipinos in America and peasants in the Philippines and used himself, his family, and friends as paradigms for the characters who peopled his writing. His autobiographical mode of writing wedded fact and fiction tightly, and sought to symbolically transcend the boundaries that separated him from his peasant heritage and ethnic group.

Perpetually sickly, Bulosan was not exactly the itinerant worker-narrator of America Is in the Heart in real life. Also, his early grasp of writing even as a young emigrant had set him on a different track from that of his countrymen. But once awakened by the plight of Pinoys in America, Bulosan never wavered in his identification with them. In 1943 the Philippine government-in-exile offered him a comfortable sinecure in Washington, D.C. While Bulosan visited the then-ailing president-in-exile, he spurned the offer.

Unable to accept the compound of history and biography in Bulosan's work, critics on both sides of the Pacific accused him of dishonesty and commercialism. After a dubious plagiarism charge in the late forties ruined his career, Bulosan fell into alcoholism, illness, obscurity, neurosis, and despair, according to Bulosan's friend Dolores Stephens Feria. Evangelista points out that it was Chris Mensalvas who asked Bulosan to move to Seattle in 1950 to edit the yearbook of the International Longshoremen's and Warehousemen's Union Local 37. Bulosan then resumed his writing and his participation in the collective struggles, which continued as Filipino unionists and their American sympathizers braced for the McCarthy era.

Bulosan died from pneumonia in 1956, leaving behind fragmentary and finished manuscripts, including a novelette on the 1950s communist rebellion in the Philippines. Both Feria and Evangelista say that surviving associates remain silent on Bulosan's rumored ties with the Communist Party, USA, yet do not deny that he was drawn to proletarianism. Evidence also suggests some contact between him and Amado V. Hernandez, a labor leader, journalist, and poet in the Philippines who was imprisoned in the fifties, courtesy of the Filipino version of the McCarthy witch hunts.

Bulosan's writing was rediscovered by Asian-American and Filipino scholars in the sixties. At least six collections of his short fiction, poetry, letters, and essays have been published, mostly under the editorship of Bulosan scholar Epifanio San Juan, Jr. America Is in the Heart, which Carey McWilliams has dubbed a "social classic," has been reissued several times in the United States and the Philippines.

CACCHIONE, PETER V. (1897–1947). One of the most charismatic of local Communist politicians, and one of their few Italian leaders, Peter V. Cacchione became the first Communist elected in a major American city (New York City councilman, 1941–1947). He embodied the folksy popularity of the Left in the ethnic groups of the neighborhoods and especially among their labor movement activists.

An Italian immigrant raised in a Pennsylvania railroad town, son of the owners of a small grocery store and bakery, Cacchione worked in the railroad and had no special political involvements until his move to New York in 1932. The Depression brought him into contact with the Unemployed Councils, and there he emerged as a minor leader in the Bonus March on Washington. He joined the Communist Party and moved from the Bronx to Brooklyn, where he quickly became the leader of the borough Communist organization. Attaching himself to Mayor Fiorello La Guardia, Cacchione learned much from the mayor's showmanship and his shrewd use of Italian symbolism.

Although unsuccessful in 1937 and 1939 campaigns for the New York City Council on the American Labor Party ticket, Cacchione attracted increasing support with his attention to the detailed concerns of his neighborhood constituents, his public leadership of struggles over such matters as subway fares, and his clever campaign tactics. Under the proportional representation system, he received more than 24,000 write-in votes in 1939, despite the difficulty of his name's spelling. His vote pattern, highest in Jewish neighborhoods, was nevertheless higher in Italian districts than any other Left politician but Vito Marcantonio could muster.

In 1941, under the slogan of "Unity against Hitler," Cacchione was elected to the city council. There he threw himself into such practical concerns as the integration of the Brooklyn Dodgers, the breakdown of racial discrimination in city-assisted housing, and the maintenance of living standards in the force of war-time inflation. (Nor did he lose the common touch: his favorite radio show was The Lone Ranger.) Joined by Benjamin Davis, he formed a small but true Communist bloc. He fought, after the war, especially against the rise in prices, and against the concerted anti-Left move to eliminate proportional representation. At his death, the New York City Council, breaking precedent and rule, refused to seat a Communist Party replacement for the remainder of Cacchione's term.

CAHAN, ABRAHAM (1860–1951). Best known to the American public as the author of the highly praised immigrant novel The Rise of David Levinsky (1917), Cahan was also the longtime editor of the influential social democratic Yiddish-language newspaper the Jewish Daily Forward, in its day the most widely read Yiddish publication in the world. Cahan helped found the paper in 1897 with a group of Jewish trade unionists and Socialist Labor Party members who had become estranged from Daniel De Leon and the party as too rigid and sectarian. Thereafter, for about five years, Cahan pursued a literary and journalistic career in English, returning to reign as editor of the Forward from 1903 until his death.

Born near Vilnius in Lithuania, Cahan joined a revolutionary reading group while a student at the Teachers Training Institute, and feared arrest after the assassination of the czar in 1881. He fled to the United States in 1882, became one of the very earliest American socialist agitators in the Yiddish language, and was active in the New York of the 1880s–1890s in Jewish labor and socialist politics. Sent as a delegate to the second and third congresses of the Socialist International in 1891 and 1893, he worked as editor and writer for five Yiddish radical periodicals, including the earliest journal, Di Zukunft, and the earliest notable newspaper, Di Arbeter Zeitung.

Cahan's politics evolved from the pre-Marxist amalgam of idealized socialism and anarchism he brought from Russia to an increasingly right-wing social democratic position. He welcomed the Russian Revolution in 1917, but from the middle 1920s onward was bitterly and actively anticommunist, a position the Forward urged upon the Jewish public. Nominally a socialist all his life, Cahan helped found the American Labor Party in 1936 along with Sidney Hillman and David Dubinsky, primarily to support Roosevelt and the New Deal.

At least as important as his formal politics was Cahan's view of Yiddish and Yiddishkayt (culture using Yiddish language in daily life and arts). He advocated that the Jewish immigrant masses Americanize themselves as rapidly and effectively as possible, even though his own literary work frequently showed the social and psychological price such a course exacted. Cahan's position put him severely at odds with Yiddishists, many religious groupings, Zionists, and other advocates of Jewish cultural autonomy (including some Marxists). Paradoxically, by its use of Yiddish—however Americanized or vulgarized—and by its attention to Jewish workers' lives, the Forward heightened and has maintained to date a considerable degree of Jewish consciousness.

CALENDARS. Long a primary form of literary expression and outreach for ethnic-radical movements, calendars reappeared during the 1960s among environmental, feminist, labor-political, and other progressive movements. In each case marking special memorial days and showcasing particular illustrations, calendars made a political point with ease and subtlety.

The German American socialists, borrowing upon their home traditions, produced the first important radical calendars and some of the most lasting series. From 1882 to 1933, the Pionier-Kalendar appeared, published by the New Yorker Volkszeitung. Over a hundred pages in length, this creation featured top-flight illustrations and writings by many of the outstanding intellectuals of the movement. Generally, a title-page portrait of a major figure such as Marx or Ferdinand Lassalle would be followed by the actual calendar section with dates of important socialist events included, reading material (generally preceded by a poem of the year), then some pages of advertising and greetings from socialist, labor, and fraternal groups. Outright political expressions were integrated into a popular reading-matter context of stories, jokes, and poems—ranging from class-conscious to love and nature themes—and historical, economic, and popular-scientific essays.

The Pionier, more thoroughly than any of its successors, urged self-improvement upon its working-class audience. Essays on art and literature encouraged readers to develop their own aesthetic understanding. In later years, the works of artists like Käthe Kollwitz were frequently reproduced in the Pionier. Women's rights, applied specifically to the housewife, who likely referred most often to the calendar, grew in importance over the decades, conveying a desired empowerment in daily life. By its final decade, ending with the outbreak of World War II, authors and audience had become alte Genossen, old-timers in a fast-disappearing milieu. Yet it continued until the end to express a motto it claimed for itself: For the Worker the Best Is Just Good Enough!

Other socialist ethnic groups, imitating the Pionier or in some cases continuing their own homeland-ethnic traditions, published calendars in proliferating numbers by the 1910s. These had relatively less importance for groups that were large in numbers and semi-assimilated, than for smaller and more insular groups who had few linguistic alternatives. Among Slavs, for instance, even the Socialist Labor Party's sectarian "South Slavonian Federation," from their headquarters in Cleveland, continued into the 1930s to publish and sell door-to-door in Slovenian neighborhoods their calendar with American holidays, socialist and labor memorial days, and Slovenian saints' days intermingled, facing a popular homeland illustration.

Although rarely successful among English-language radical groups, calendars began to reemerge as fundraising efforts for 1960s–1970s movements. Sometimes, as with the City Lights Bookstore calendars, more emphasis would be placed upon the literary avant-garde, but with a socialistic (or anarchistic) political undertone. Sometimes, as with the Mill Hunk calendars from Pittsburgh's blue-collar organizing project, much emphasis was placed upon labor history. Frequently, as with a variety of feminist calendars, "recovered" lives of radical women and women's history events saw the light of day. Environmental groups placed special emphasis upon nature pictures, with a preservationist undertone. Only a relatively few calendars emphasized immediate political concerns; audiences were not only too small for such a strategy, but as with the ethnic calendars, the politics of daily life continued to predominate in a successful calendar.

CALIFORNIA. Despite a geographic isolation that separated the state from the mainstream of the American Left until well into the twentieth century, California contributed its share of political leaders, writers, and organizers to the growth of American radicalism. With the national headquarters of most major Left organizations located either in the Midwest or East, Californians found it difficult to exert the degree of influence on party policies that New York or Chicago radicals wielded. They did, however, set forth a political style of openness and experimentation that offset the more insular and doctrinaire methods of their eastern comrades.

The California Left dates from the flight of European refugees following the revolutionary upheavals of 1848. In 1869 German followers of Ferdinand Lassalle established a section of the International Workmen's Association in San Francisco, the second section formed in the United States. French- and English-language sections soon followed, but by the mid-1870s the English section dominated and foreign-language units of succeeding Left organizations had a less significant role in California than they would have in eastern states.

The English section became the California branch of the Workingmen's Party of the United States, actively organizing labor unions in San Francisco, most notably the Sailors Union of the Pacific. Socialist influence ebbed during the 1877 rail strike, when San Francisco's working class was co-opted by Denis Kearney's nonsocialist, anti-Chinese Workingmen's Party of California.

Burnette Haskell revitalized socialism in the 1880s. Under his direction, radicals were active in the Knights of Labor and Edward Bellamy's Nationalism, briefly led the anti-Chinese movement, organized the Kaweah colony, and created the short-lived but influential International Workmen's Association.

As with Haskell and his following, many Californians bridged the gap between utopianism, woman's rights, and socialism. Women in the Kaweah colony themselves published a short-lived gender-conscious version of Haskell's paper, Truth, as Truth in Small Doses. Older California women, sometimes removed East Coast Yankee veterans of abolitionism, suffrage, and spiritualism, played a major role in the Bellamy movement and in Point Loma, a Theosophist-Socialist colony headed by Katherine Tingley. Bellamy Nationalism was especially strong in California, with Socialists in many leading positions in the local leadership. With many of the same followers, and under the slogan "Let the nation own the trusts," Gaylord Wilshire conducted the first vigorous and well-funded American Socialist congressional campaign in 1890.

Influenced by California's largely agrarian economy, the Left from 1880 to 1900 was involved with farm protest movements, closely paralleling the path of socialism in other farm states. At the 1896 Populist National Convention, California Socialists sought to convert the party into a socialist organization and opposed the endorsement of Democratic presidential candidate William Jennings Bryan. With the collapse of Populism, California radicals turned to the Socialist Labor Party (SLP), running their first gubernatorial candidate, Job Harriman, in 1898. Harriman opposed Daniel DeLeon's policy of dual unionism and worked actively in the secessionist movement that split the national SLP (1899). When SLP defectors united with Eugene Debs's Social Democracy in a joint presidential ticket, Harriman received the vice-presidential nomination (1900).

The California SLP entered the newly formed Socialist Party of America (SP) virtually en masse. At the 1901 founding convention a black California delegate, William Costley, successfully urged adoption of the only party resolution dealing specifically with black rights passed by the SP during the first decade of its existence. During that early period, the California Left had an especially close relationship with the trade union movement. In a rare move, the American Federation of Labor and Samuel Gompers endorsed Job Harriman's 1911 Los Angeles mayoralty campaign. Running at the head of a ticket that included both socialists and unionists, Harriman and his slate led all candidates in the primary, benefiting from widespread labor unrest in the city. The platform pledged support to James and John McNamara, union leaders then on trial for the dynamiting of the Los Angeles Times. When the McNamaras unexpectedly entered a confession shortly before the final election, the entire ticket went down to defeat.

Despite the shattering loss, the SP not only survived but elected city council members and three state assemblymen in subsequent elections. Other notable victories included Berkeley, where they elected Christian Socialist J. Stitt Wilson mayor (1911) and won control of the school board (1913). California Socialists who won elections generally came from the reformist element, relatively close to the trade union movement, that dominated the party before World War I. The party press and conventions were caught up in a constant debate between the reforming "opportunists" and the "impossibilists," who shunned reform platforms and worked for "scientific socialism." Throughout this prewar era the California SP grew rapidly in membership and voting strength. In 1902 California ranked first among the states, with sixteen hundred members. It was again first in 1910 with six thousand members, one-tenth of the national total. Membership peaked in 1914 with eighty-two hundred members and three hundred locals.

While the mainstream of the California Left was close to the American Federation of Labor, another segment supported the Industrial Workers of the World (IWW), which had significant strength in the lumber camps and among farm workers. The free-speech struggles at Fresno (1910) and San Diego (1912) drew attention to the activities of the IWW, but the "Wheatland Riot" (1913) found the union involved in a bitter struggle to improve conditions among migrant hop workers in the Sacramento Valley. This militancy was rewarded by a growing attitude on the part of left-wing socialists to support industrial unionism. By 1915 membership in the California IWW had grown to forty-five hundred. This growth of the Left, accomplished despite a strong reform movement among California progressives, was stifled by the coming of World War I. California Socialists were as badly divided over the war as the Socialist movement elsewhere. War supporters included Jack London and several party officials. Other California radicals actively opposed the war, among them Baptist minister Robert Whitaker, who was jailed for war resistance.

During the war the reformist leadership was replaced by a more radical group (including James Dolsen, Max Bedacht, and John Taylor) closely identified with the Bolshevik Revolution in Russia. At the 1919 Socialist convention in Chicago they took the California SP into the newly formed Communist Labor Party (CLP). Meanwhile, growing animosity toward the California Left, beginning with the war, resulted in a series of repressive actions. Socialist Tom Mooney was convicted of bombing a preparedness-day parade in San Francisco (1916). Forty-three Wobblies were tried and convicted in a mass trial at Sacramento (1918-1919) on federal charges involving the Espionage and Selective Service acts. In Oakland on Armistice Day (1919) a mob wrecked CLP headquarters.

The state government moved against the Left, passing a Criminal Syndicalism Act (1919) that made membership in a group that sought change in industrial ownership by force or violence a crime. Moving at first against members of the SP and then against the newly formed CLP, the state secured enough convictions to virtually drive the CLP out of existence. The U.S. Supreme Court (1927), in the case of CLP member Anita Whitney, found the act constitutional. Four decades later the court would void the act.

The Depression years saw a resurgence of activity, particularly among Communists, who were singled out for repression under the criminal syndicalism law for their agitation on behalf of farm workers. Formation of the Congress of Industrial Organizations and increasing unionization of industry during the New Deal years also increased the Left's influence, particularly that of Communists, in the labor movement.

Some Leftists supported Upton Sinclair's unsuccessful 1934 California campaign for the governorship on the Democratic ticket. The former Socialist captured the nomination on a platform that emphasized the state's duty to provide work for the unemployed, but his "End Poverty in California" movement was considered too reform-minded to be considered a part of the Left, a judgment that many California radicals, including Communists, later regretted. Never again would a Left figure so nearly approach state leadership.

Communist reorientation to the Popular Front plunged the Left into the liberal wing of the Democratic Party, where it played an influential role for several decades. Social agencies of the New Deal provided opportunities for some of the Left. Others gained positions in the administration of Culbert Olson, whose election in 1938 returned a Democrat to the governorship for the first time in three decades. But the political success of Democratic reformers weakened any general appeal that the Left might itself have made to the electorate. Instead, Communists concentrated their strength, by the 1940s, in the California Democratic Council, an influence group.

Dissatisfaction with the postwar Truman administration led much of the California Left to support Henry Wallace's 1948 presidential bid. Called the Independent Progressive Party (IPP) in California, it gave the Left a place on the ballot for the next two decades. During the forties and fifties the IPP was closer to the Communists than to the Socialists, who did not identify with it.

California Communists, in contrast to their eastern comrades, peaked in numbers and influence during the 1940s, and retained their strength well into the 1950s. With the daily People's World, widespread influence in the International Longshoremen's and Warehousemen's Union among other labor organizations, and the capable state leadership of Dorothy Healey, they epitomized the more flexible side of American Communism.

The Red Scare of the 1940s and 1950s was symbolized by the anticommunist loyalty-oath fight that rocked the University of California. Despite a general complacency on campuses in the 1950s, toward the end of the decade there was a revival of student awareness, particularly over campus racial discrimination and regulations that seriously limited free speech.

By the 1960s the IPP had lost its ballot status owing to declining voter strength, and the Left was further splintered by the emergence of numerous factions within both the Socialist and Communist camps. To unify the movement, the Peace and Freedom Party was organized in response to the civil rights struggle and the Vietnam War. While it continued to function into the 1980s, it remained largely a paper organization utilized only at election time. Members of the Left continued to work within the old Socialist and Communist organizations or in new ones, such as Democratic Socialists of America, into which longtime California Communist Dorothy Healey moved in the 1980s.

The turmoil of the 1960s and 1970s brought forth other organizations that drew a disproportionate amount of publicity by virtue of their activities. The Black Panthers and the Symbionese Liberation Army were on the fringe of the California Left. Still other organizations directed at economic, social, or anti-war goals had a strong Left leadership but remained apart from traditional sectarian politics.

In a few communities, such as Santz Cruz, a merger of veterans from the Old and New Lefts around environmental issues and opposition to the U.S. war on Central America produced durable political coalitions and elected many city officials. A subtly anticorporate appeal to "slow growth" and preservation of green space drew constituents from across class and ethnic lines, although most strongly from middle-class whites sympathetic to other progressive social movements. Here and there, by the later 1990s, some Green Party representatives held city office, with a working majority or minority on city councils.

CALIFORNIA LABOR SCHOOL. Opened in 1946, the progressive California Labor School (CLS) grew out of the increasing strength of the San Francisco labor movement and the "united front" against fascism before and during World War II. It had been founded in 1942 as the Tom Mooney Labor School, in a loft, with a student body of one hundred and a curriculum that included women's history, black history, labor organization, journalism, public speaking, economics, and training in industrial arts (plastics, ceramics, construction, photography, and graphic arts). By the time of its renaming, the school had expanded ten-fold and moved to larger quarters on Market Street, with an auditorium, art gallery, and substantial library.

Uniquely among progressive labor schools of the time, the CLS gained approval for study under the GI Bill, offering opportunities for veterans otherwise unable to gain a higher education. Most of the faculty was made up of union officials from the then-separate American Federation of Labor and Congress of Industrial Organizations. They were joined soon by teachers from nearby universities such as Stanford and the University of California. The student population of some twenty-six hundred per semester included not only workers but also housewives, young professionals, and students attending other schools. The curriculum had four major divisions: labor organization, social sciences, creative writing, and industrial arts. So well did it place emphasis upon black history and black participation that the President's Commission for Fair Employment Practices presented the CLS an award for its efforts to make "America a place where groups can live together in harmony." The school's first play, Stevedore, was about interracial struggles on the New Orleans waterfront. The CLS theater and the Labor School Chorus, both composed of union members, entertained widely at mass meetings, in union halls, and on picket lines.

By 1948 the school had added extension courses in many neighborhoods and attracted celebrities for lectures, including Frank Lloyd Wright, Muriel Rukeyser, Eric Sevareid, and Orson Welles. Financial support came from many sources, including Frank Sinatra's RKO film The House I Live In. But in 1948 the U.S. attorney general, without notice or public hearing, placed the school on its "subversive" list. The Treasury Department, revoking the school's tax-exempt status retroactively, demanded $7,000 in back taxes. Attacks continued and in 1954 the CLS was ordered to register as a "Communist front" organization. The school fought back gamely, maintaining itself on a smaller scale (and engaging in cultural activities such as publication of Malvina Reynold's first songs, in 1954). In May 1957—after the school had been declared by the Subversive Activities Control Board to be "Communist-dominated" and could not raise sufficient funds to fight the ruling—it closed its doors for a final time.

CAMPBELL, HELEN STUART (1839–1918). Social reformer and noted home economist, Campbell became a prominent member of the Edward Bellamy Nationalist movement. Born in Lockport, New York, and raised in New York City, Campbell turned to issues of poverty and unemployment while working in a waterfront mission and recorded her observations in Darkness and Daylight; or, Lights and Shadows of New York Life (1891). She published several landmark studies of wage-earning women, her major subject of investigative journalism. A series of descriptive articles published originally in the New York Tribune were collected as Prisoners of Poverty (1887). A sequel, Prisoners of Poverty Abroad, followed in 1889. Campbell's Women Wage-Earners (1891) won a prize from the American Economics Association and played an instrumental role in the formation of the first consumers' leagues in the 1890s.

Campbell began her career by writing children's stories and returned intermittently to fictional forms. Mrs. Herndon's Income (1886) joined her concern for women to a nascent faith in socialism. This allegorical novel relates interlocking stories about two unhappily married women of different class positions. By showing how a common condition of economic dependence on men shapes their lives, Campbell concludes with a critique of capitalism and remakes each into a socialist appropriate to her station. The middle-class heroine finds companionship with a Christian socialist, her working-class alter ego with a German-born revolutionary. Campbell wrote for such journals as the Nationalist, American Fabian, and the Arena.

CANNON, JAMES PATRICK (1890–1974). The foremost leader of U.S. Trotskyism, James Patrick Cannon was born in Rosedale, Kansas, and grew up in a working-class family in which his mother's Catholic religious convictions coexisted with his father's deep-rooted labor radicalism (from the Knights of Labor to the Socialist Party of Eugene V. Debs). Cannon became an organizer for the Industrial Workers of the World, where he received training from William D. "Big Bill" Haywood and Vincent St. John in militant strikes, revolutionary agitation, free-speech fights, and patient working-class organizing. A midwestern leader of the Socialist Party's left wing after Russia's 1917 revolution, he helped establish the early communist movement, serving as the first national chairman of the Workers Party in 1921. Cannon was an American delegate to the Communist International on five occasions, once spending eight months in Moscow on the Comintern's executive committee. In the United States he headed the International Labor Defense from 1925 to 1928, organizing campaigns to defend such "class-war prisoners" as Sacco and Vanzetti, Tom Mooney, and others. With William Z. Foster he led a faction in the American Communist Party that saw itself as more grounded in U.S. labor-radical experience.

While attending the 1928 Sixth World Congress of the Comintern, Cannon obtained a copy of Leon Trotsky's critique of Stalin's bureaucratic policies in the Soviet Union and the Communist movement. Agreeing with the exiled Trotsky's defense of "Bolshevik-Leninist" principles, he quietly circulated the document among comrades back in the United States. This resulted in a rash of expulsions and the organization of the Communist League of America. Through a complex process of splits and fusions, in which Cannon played a leading role, the Trotskyists significantly increased their numbers and influence by the time they established the Socialist Workers Party in 1938. Cannon was its national secretary until his semi-retirement in 1953. Even afterward he played a substantial role in helping the Socialist Workers Party survive the intense pressures of the Cold War period. He was also active in the leadership of the Fourth International, a worldwide organization established by Trotskyists in 1938. In the early 1940s Cannon was one of the first victims of the Smith Act. As an orator and writer, Cannon distinguished himself as an accomplished popularizer of revolutionary Marxist ideas that were strongly flavored by a blending of the Bolshevik and U.S. labor-radical traditions in such works as The Struggle for a Proletarian Party (1943), America's Road to Socialism (1953), and Speeches for Socialism (1971).

CAPE VERDEAN AMERICANS. Hailing from the Cape Verde Islands situated off the west coast of Africa, Cape Verdean Americans represent the only major community of Afro-Americans to have voluntarily made the transatlantic voyage to this country. Pioneering this migration in the first half of the nineteenth century were young men from Brava Island, who were recruited by U.S. whaling vessels during stopovers in the Cape Verde Islands. Some of these recruits eventually became permanent settlers, particularly in and around the ports of New Bedford, Massachusetts, and Providence, Rhode Island. In the late nineteenth and early twentieth centuries, increasing numbers of Cape Verdean immigrants arrived as cheap sources of labor for the expanding textile mills, the cranberry industry, and the maritime-related occupations of southeastern New England. Thus began the establishment of a Cape Verdean American community that grew by the 1980s to nearly 300,000 a figure roughly matching the total population of the Cape Verde Islands.

The earliest account of labor unrest among Cape Verdean settlers dates to 1900, when a riot at a cranberry bog was reported. Not until the Depression years did more organized action take place, led in part by the local Left. In 1933, fifteen hundred workers from forty bogs struck, demanding a wage increase, guaranteed employment until the end of the season, and recognition of their right to union representation. The labor dispute escalated, with charges of "outside agitators," until violence erupted. The cranberry bog struggle, primarily involving Cape Verdean immigrants, was also the first strike by agricultural workers in the history of Massachusetts. Subsequently a number of Cape Verdeans in New Bedford and elsewhere joined or supported the Communist Party. A larger number reportedly joined the Left-led International Workers Order.

Left activity among Cape Verdeans resurfaced in the late 1960s and early 1970s in two areas of political life, the New Bedford chapter of the Black Panther Party and the American Support committee of the PAIGC, the African Party for the Independence of Guinea-Bissau and Cape Verde. In the revolutionary struggle for black liberation, primarily young Cape Verdean community leaders joined members of the Afro-American population in New Bedford to form the Black Panthers. Urban riots broke out, resulting in the wounding of several Panthers and the death of a Cape Verdean youth. Two other Cape Verdeans, brothers Parky and Ross Grace, were charged with murder and imprisoned. During the early 1980s a movement to free Parky Grace—who maintained his militancy and Left politics during his years of incarceration—was initiated on grounds that he had been framed. In 1984 the group succeeded in obtaining Grace's release.

In the 1950s, under the leadership of the revolutionary Amílcar Cabral, the Cape Verde Islands and Guinea-Bissau together created a national independence movement, including a protracted armed struggle to overthrow Portuguese rule. While Cape Verdean American support for the PAIGC was never widespread, a small group of political sympathizers formed in New England to disseminate information and raise funds for the independence movement. The identification with Cabral's revolutionary ideology and with African liberation movements represented a departure from the primarily Portuguese identification that had historically characterized much of the Cape Verdean immigrant population. Since the successful revolution and the establishment of a socialist government, Cape Verdean Independence Day, 5 July 1975, has been celebrated in this country with well-attended picnics, speeches, and cultural events in New England and California.

CATHOLIC WORKER MOVEMENT. Founded on New York's Lower East Side during the depths of the Depression in 1933, the anarchistic Catholic Worker movement was the brainchild of two colorful personalities: Peter Maurin (1877–1949), an eccentric French émigré philosopher, and Dorothy Day (1897–1980), a Brooklyn-born former Wobbly and Socialist with Communist sympathies who had become a Catholic convert in 1927. It embraces four basic tenets: voluntary poverty (to build solidarity with the oppressed), and the achievement of social justice through nonviolent activism, pacifism; and personalism (a stress on the individual's responsibility to remake society through direct, personal intervention). Primary sources for the Catholic Worker movement's ideas are the life of Jesus, as recorded in the four Gospels of the New Testament, as well as papal encyclicals such as Rerum novarum (1891) and Quadragesimo anno (1931). In addition, the lives of such saints as Teresa of Ávila and Thérèse of Lisieux and the writings of Fyodor Dostoyevsky, Jacques Maritain, Emmanuel Mounier, and others have been important influences. Catholic Worker Houses of Hospitality, which feed and shelter the poor, first appeared in 1933 in New York City and then throughout the United States (especially in the Northeast and Midwest) as well as, to a lesser degree, abroad. Today the Houses of Hospitality in the United States number about one hundred. Less long-lived have been the dozen or so Catholic Worker farming communes that have appeared in the United States since 1933.

Inspiring Day with his ideas, Maurin left the practical execution of them largely to her. In the Catholic church of the 1930s, such a role at the helm of a radical lay organization was rare for a woman—especially one who, like Day, was a Catholic convert, single parent, and veteran of the Old Left. For Day, the Catholic Worker movement united the secular radical activism of her youth with the traditional Catholic piety of her later adulthood. Indeed, as a Catholic Worker she continued her civil-disobedience activities, including several arrests and jailings in the period 1955–1960 resulting from her protests against civilian defense air-raid drills in New York City.

In these activities Day was joined by Ammon Hennacy, a World War I draft resister who energized the Catholic Worker movement during the 1950s with his colorful, old-time pacifism and anarchism. Fearless, witty, and committed to fomenting change, the indefatigable Hennacy picketed and traveled around the country to proselytize for Catholic Worker principles and wrote about it in the Catholic Worker (which he served as associate editor).

A former writer for the Socialist Call, the Masses, and the Liberator, Day instinctively recognized the centrality of reform journalism to the Catholic Worker cause. On May Day, 1933, the first issue of the movement's tabloid-size paper, the Catholic Worker, was distributed in Union Square. Day remained publisher, editor, and chief writer until her death, living in voluntary poverty at Saint Joseph's, the Catholic Worker House of Hospitality in New York City. She attracted artists such as Fritz Eichenberg, Adé Bethune, and Rita Corbin, and writers such as Jacques Maritain, J. F. Powers, Lewis Mumford, Claude McKay, Catherine de Hueck Doherty, Danilo Dolci, Daniel and Philip Berrigan, Thomas Merton, and Michael Harrington. Through the Spanish Civil War, World War II (when internal discord over the pacifism issue threatened to split the movement and subscriptions plummeted to 50,500), the Korean War, and the Vietnam War, Day hewed the editorial line to social justice and pacifism. Circulation peaked at about 100,000 where it remains today, and the Catholic Worker may be considered one of the most significant (and editorially consistent) advocacy publications in U.S. history.

Over the years, the radical stance of the Catholic Worker movement and its paper has attracted the close scrutiny of both the Catholic church hierarchy and J. Edgar Hoover's Federal Bureau of Investigation. However, the Catholic Worker has survived to challenge several generations of Americans to strengthen their commitment to social justice and peace. It has invigorated Catholic, non-Catholic, and secular justice and peace activism.

CHAPLIN, RALPH H. (1887–1961). Radical labor artist, journalist, songwriter, and poet, Ralph Hosea Chaplin was born in Cloud County, Kansas, in 1887 but grew up primarily in Chicago. A working artist interested in socialism and poetry, Chaplin and his wife, Edith, formed a close friendship with William D. "Big Bill" Haywood in 1907 that lasted until the latter's death in 1928. Chaplin formally joined the Industrial Workers of the World (IWW) in Chicago in 1913; by then, he had visited revolutionary Mexico and reported U.S. labor strikes for radical journals. In 1915 he wrote the famous labor anthem "Solidarity Forever" and early in 1917 became editor of the Wobbly paper Solidarity. He was among the more than 150 IWW leaders who were charged and convicted under the Espionage Act during the repression accompanying U.S. involvement in World War I. Sentenced to twenty years, Chaplin was imprisoned at the federal penitentiary in Leavenworth, Kansas. Out on bond in 1919 pending appeal, he traveled nationally supporting IWW defense efforts and reported the Red Scare trial and trumpeted-up murder convictions of the Wobblies at Centralia, Washington. Holding the general IWW position of wariness toward Communism, he declined to join Haywood and several others who forfeited bond and fled to the Soviet Union in 1921. Returning to prison, he was pardoned in 1923 along with the other Wobbly victims of the federal government.

Chaplin actively backed various radical defense endeavors and, maintaining his IWW position, became increasingly critical of the Communists. From 1932 to 1936, he edited the Wobbly Industrial Worker but left the IWW in 1936, feeling it could never revive. In 1937 he edited the Voice of the Federation (Maritime Federation of the Pacific Coast), but conflicts with Communists resulted in his ouster. In 1941 Chaplin began editing the American Federation of Labor's Tacoma Labor Advocate, continuing this for half a decade. He then published his extensive autobiography, Wobbly, in 1948; converted to Roman Catholicism; continued to back grass-roots unionism and libertarian radicalism and to publish poetry; and lent his efforts to American Indian rights. Chaplin died in Tacoma in 1961.

CHARLES H. KERR COMPANY. Founded in Chicago in 1886, the Kerr Company is the oldest socialist publishing house in the United States. Reaching its height in the 1900s and the 1910s, the company specialized in presenting socialism to a popular audience. Faced with government repression after World War I, it struggled for over a half century before rebounding in the 1970s and 1980s.

Charles Hope Kerr was born in 1860, the son of Congregationalist liberals active in the abolitionist movement. After graduating from the University of Wisconsin in 1881, he moved to Chicago, where he established Charles H. Kerr and Company as a publisher of radical Unitarian literature. In the 1890s Kerr's focus shifted from religion to radical politics. In 1891 the Kerr Company published The Coming Climax, by labor journalist Lester C. Hubbard, an important book in the movement to pardon the surviving Haymarket anarchists. In 1894 Kerr published The Pullman Strike, an exposé of conditions in Pullman by the Reverend William H. Carwardine. In the 1890s Kerr also began offering company stock to the general public at ten dollars per share. Purchasers of the stock received discounts on publications as well as a chance to share in the "cooperative commonwealth." Throughout the rest of the 1890s the Kerr Company offered titles by a wide range of radicals, including populists, anarchists, utopian socialists, and feminists.

In 1899 the Kerr Company began publishing the Pocket Library of Socialism, also known as "little red books" because of their red cellophane wrappers. This series of thirty-two page, five-cent pamphlets on socialist economics and politics included works by Jack London, Clarence Darrow, and Upton Sinclair. In 1900 Kerr began publishing the International Socialist Review (ISR), which survived until 1918.

In the early 1900s the Kerr Company continued publishing a variety of radical works, including the original edition of Gustavus Myers's muckraking History of the Great American Fortunes, Lewis Henry Morgan's anthropological study Ancient Society, Austin Lewis's The Militant Proletariat, Edward Carpenter's sex-reform classic Love's Coming of Age, Daniel DeLeon's translation of Marx's The Eighteenth Brumaire of Louis Bonaparte, Irish revolutionary James Connolly's Socialism Made Easy, and Mary Marcy's pamphlet Shop Talks on Economics. The Kerr Company also specialized in printing English translations of major European socialist works, including those of Marx and Engels—Kerr was the first publisher of the complete text of the three volumes of the English-language text Capital (1906–1909)—Paul Lafargue, Karl Kautsky, Wilhelm Liebknecht, Joseph Dietzgen, and Antonio Labriola. In 1905 Kerr began publishing the multivolume Library of Science for the Workers with Wilhelm Boelsche's The Evolution of Man. In 1908 the Kerr Company brought out a deck of socialist playing cards illustrated by Industrial Workers of the World poet/artist Ralph Chaplin, and a few years later produced a board game called Class Struggle that played like dominoes.

The financial strain of the government's repression of the ISR during World War I caused the Kerr Company to cease printing pamphlets in 1917. The company rebounded somewhat after the war, bringing out several new titles in the early 1920s, including Marcy's The Right to Strike, former assistant secretary of labor Louis F. Post's The Deportations Delirium of Nineteen-Twenty, and The Autobiography of Mother Jones. But the company never approached its prewar popularity, and in 1928 Kerr retired and passed control of the company to John Keracher and members of the Proletarian Party. Party members ran the Kerr Company until 1971, primarily keeping Marxist classics in print and occasionally bringing out new titles. In the 1930s the Kerr Company published Keracher's pamphlet The Head-Fixing Industry, a critique of American mass media, and distributed defrocked Episcopalian bishop William Montgomery Brown's Communism and Christianity. In 1935 Kerr brought out the first English translation of Engels's Anti-Dühring. By the late 1960s, the company operated only as a small mail-order concern. But in 1971 a group including Fred Thompson (longtime member of the Industrial Workers of the World) and Joseph Giganti (onetime leader of the International Labor Defense) took control of the Kerr Company and brought out a series of new titles and reprints of radical classics.

CHICAGO FEDERATION OF LABOR. Led by the militant John Fitzpatrick, the Chicago Federation of Labor (CFL) became a hotbed of labor insurgency during the decade from 1914 to 1924. An avid promoter of union democracy, Fitzpatrick drew support for CFL campaigns from a talented array of progressives, syndicalists, socialists, and communists who sought to use the local affiliate of the American Federation of Labor (AFL) as a base for transforming the labor movement. The CFL also enjoyed organic connections with many area immigrant communities, which often provided critical assistance during strike and political activities. Influenced both by its socialist constituents and by the critiques of local anti-war immigrant groups, the CFL vigorously opposed President Wilson's preparedness campaigns and U.S. entrance into World War I. The pacifist activities of the CFL and other city labor councils led AFL president Samuel Gompers to exclude representatives of these municipal affiliates from the March 1917 meeting, at which AFL delegates pledged their loyalty to the government in the event of U.S. entrance into the war.

As AFL leaders were drawn into government agencies designed to mobilize the country for war in 1917-1918, the CFL became, in the words of James Barrett, the "heart and brain of the two great World War I drives to organize mass-production workers in the steel and meat-packing industries." Pressured by AFL leaders to endorse the AFL's loyalty pledge and to support the war effort, CFL leaders nonetheless remained critical of the collaborative relationship developing between AFL officials and business and state leaders. Rather than relying on war boards to secure gains for workers, they suggested, the AFL should be using the opportunities afforded by war to enlarge and strengthen the labor movement.

At war's end, CFL leaders defied AFL mandates against independent labor political action and formed the Chicago Labor Party. Often viewed primarily as an heir to the traditions and doctrines of a badly splintered Socialist Party, the Chicago Labor Party represented a new strain in U.S. politics. Born of war, the Chicago Labor Party exhibited a unique preoccupation with repudiating the cozy partnership that had developed between business, labor, and state leaders under the rubric of promoting the national military effort. Although commending the war boards and arbitration commissions for their wartime work, Chicago Labor Party leaders demanded that labor be represented on such councils in the future "in proportion to its voting strength." Signaling their continued interest in foreign policy issues, they also asked that workers be represented at the peace conference and in any international organizations it created "in proportion to their numbers in the armies, navies and workshops of the world." Exhibiting striking political imagination, Chicago Labor Party leaders reinterpreted American democratic ideals to justify democratic control of industry, majoritarian rule by a labor party, and international labor solidarity.

Although not the most successful of the some forty-five local labor parties that erupted in the postwar era, the Chicago Labor Party played a leadership role in creating the national Farmer-Labor Party and in rallying large numbers of central labor unions and local labor parties behind it. The party nominated the relatively unknown attorney Parley Christensen as its 1920 presidential candidate, who unsurprisingly fared poorly in the election. The Farmer-Labor Party nonetheless continued to provide an independent political outlet for local AFL activists disillusioned by the policies of the AFL leadership throughout the early 1920s. Bitterly opposed by Samuel Gompers, the party was ultimately destroyed by an internal communist offensive against its progressive leadership. Communists accounted for approximately one-fifth of the delegates to the CFL in 1922. The Chicago communist newspaper, the Voice of Labor, had grown critical of the progressive factions within both the CFL and the Farmer-Labor Party for not promoting a more revolutionary agenda. When ordered by Lenin to penetrate the U.S. labor party movement, American communists "packed" the 1923 Farmer-Labor Party convention with sympathetic delegates and gained control of the party's executive committee. Much disillusioned, Fitzpatrick disavowed the party that he had played such a critical role in creating. The CFL renewed its support for the AFL's nonpartisan political policies in 1924, symbolically bringing its decade-long insurgency to an end.

CHICAGO STAR. A Left weekly tabloid published from 1946 to 1948, the Chicago Star was supported primarily by the progressive unions of the Chicago area such as Farm Equipment, United Auto Workers, United Packinghouse, Fur and Leather, Food and Tobacco, Longshoremen, and Mill, Mine. Left fraternal bodies, including then-important affiliates of the International Workers Order, as well as the Communist Party of Illinois, also vigorously supported the paper. Grant Oakes, international president of Farm Equipment, was elected president of the People's Publishing Association. At its peak, the paper attained a circulation of twenty-five thousand, with special enlarged editions for independent election campaigns.

Issues, news, and editorial coverage of the Star reflected the domestic and international concerns of the postwar recovery period. The paper highlighted the postwar strikes and the problems of inflation, unemployment, housing, and rent control that these strikes reflected. It documented racial discrimination in Chicago and elsewhere, and championed equality. It called for intensified unionization, defense of civil liberties, and greater independent political activity. The Star warned in an editorial that postwar U.S. foreign policy was leading to the "preservation of the prewar status quo or its replacement by a new American big money imperialism."

After nearly two years of publication, the Star agreed to sell the paper to a newly formed group within the emerging Progressive Party. Renamed the Illinois Standard, it was short-lived, and merged into the national progressive publication the National Guardian. In that sense, the Chicago Star offered a preview and an important boost to the National Guardian as well as to the Progressive Party throughout the Midwest.

CHILDREN'S LITERATURE. Both the Socialists and Communists produced children's literature to transmit radical ideas to children. During the first half of the twentieth century more than forty children's books were published whose characters, plots, and settings were intended to help children to identify with the radical movement and to absorb its ideology and culture.

The first socialist children's book, Nicholas Klein's Socialist Primer (1908), was published by the Appeal to Reason newspaper and was modeled on the simple school reader. Following Klein, John Spargo's Socialist Readings for Children (1909) included short biographies of Robert Owen and Karl Marx, descriptions of socialist meetings, and a "little talk on evolution."

Caroline Nelson's Nature Talks on Economics (1912) and Mary Marcy's Stories of the Cave People (1912) and Rhymes of Early Jungle Folk (1922) all used science to explain the logic of socialism to children. In Nelson's book the lessons of biological evolution and cooperation are used to show children why socialism is the necessary next step in social evolution. Mary Marcy, an editor of the International Socialist Review, used a kind of socialist anthropology, borrowed from Engels and Lewis Henry Morgan, to show how human society originated and evolved, and to make the point that further social evolution was necessary.

The first Communist children's book, Fairy Tales for Worker's Children (1925), by Herminia zur Muhlen, was originally published in German. It was followed by Battle in the Barnyard (1932), by Helen Kay, which contained stories of working-class children engaged in political struggle, as well as fables and fairy tales with socialist morals.

The Communists published the works of Geoffrey Trease, a British author who later went on to become quite well known for his mainstream historical fiction for young adults, the first among radical children's books to move beyond the simplistic Sunday-school lesson or fairy tale. Bows against the Barons (1934), for example, was a radical retelling of the story of Robin Hood, while in Call to Arms (1935) three young people in a Central American country are drawn into a revolution.

U.S. Communist writers during the 1930s and 1940s also created stories for young adolescents. Eric Lucas's Voyage Thirteen (1946) described the adventures of two boys serving on a merchant marine ship in the closing days of World War II. Its form is similar to many boys' stories of ship life, except that the seamen include a Spanish republican, a militant Afro-American, and a Communist, who teach the boys about life from a class-conscious, antifascist perspective. Jean Karsavina's Tree by the Waters (1948) is about the ethnic and class conflict between Polish American workers and Yankees in a New England mill village.

The attention given to biological evolution in the books by Caroline Nelson and Mary Marcy was an expression of the socialist belief that evidence for evolutionary change in the natural world supported the possibility, and necessity, of social evolution. In only one Communist children's book, Science and History for Boys and Girls (1932), by the former Episcopal archbishop-turned-Communist William Montgomery Brown, did Darwinism play as important a role.

The Communist children's books were more focused on teaching children about class divisions in capitalist society and the importance of activism in the radical movement. Furthermore the Communist children's books contained more on current social problems, and included ethnically and racially diverse characters.

The children's literature published by the Socialist and Communist movements was an example of how radicals in the United States attempted to provide an alternative culture for their children to grow up into. The authors of these books believed that the ideas of socialism were accessible to children, and that exposing children to radical ideas when they were young would predispose them to political radicalism as they grew older.

CHINESE AMERICANS. Chinese immigrants came to the United States in large numbers during the California gold rush in the late 1840s, and were employed as cheap labor by the railway companies in the 1860s and 1870s. The Chinese Exclusion Act of 1882 restricted the immigration of Chinese laborers to the United States for more than half a century. Until World War II, most Chinese Americans lived in ghettos—the so-called Chinatowns—in the big cities and were engaged in low-paying jobs such as restaurant and laundry work.

The experience of being excluded, exploited, and discriminated against in America strengthened Chinese Americans' tendency to look to China for their future. Thus, the first Chinese-American socialist/Left organizations were inspired by the revolutionary movements in China, and they accepted Marxism as a solution not only to the problems that existed in the Chinese American community but also to those that their motherland confronted. This China orientation made the Chinese American Left vulnerable to the vagaries of Chinese politics, and political splits in China always caused Chinese Americans to divide into factions whose history was complicated and often confusing.

The radical organizations that emerged in the Chinese American community in the 1920s to support the Chinese Revolution included San Francisco's Samminzhuyi Yanjiushe (Association for the Study of the Three Principles of the People, 1926; later reorganized and renamed the Kung Yu Club, 1927, and Chinese Workers Club, 1928), the San Francisco Chinese Students Club (1927), and the Grand Revolutionary Alliance of Chinese Workers and Peasants (1927; reorganized as the Chinese Anti-Imperialist Alliance of America [CAIA] in 1930). The CAIA's organ, the Chinese Vanguard (Philadelphia, 1929–1930; New York, 1930–1938), was the first Marxist Left weekly newspaper published by Chinese Americans, and it received some help from the Communist Party, USA (CPUSA). Some Chinese leftists joined the CPUSA and established a branch of the Party in San Francisco's Chinatown in the late 1920s.

In the 1930s the Chinese American Left successfully combined its efforts to organize Chinese workers to survive the hard times of the Depression with its Popular Front movement to save China from Japan's invasion. The Left also inspired and promoted the establishment of many labor organizations. Among them the Chinese Workers Mutual Aid Association in San Francisco and the Chinese Hand Laundry Alliance (CHLA) in New York City were the most influential. The CHLA provided essential support to establish the first Chinese radical daily newspaper—the China Daily News (1940–). The Chinese Youth Clubs in both San Francisco and New York City were also active in supporting China's war efforts against Japan and participated in the American youth movement. In addition they initiated many cultural programs and activities.

Even in the peak years of their influence in the Chinese community, leftist activities weakened but could never shatter the established power structure in U.S. Chinatowns. Nor was the Left ever able to seize the leadership of the Chinese community or successfully mobilize the masses as they hoped to do. There were many reasons for this: limited membership, factionalism, dogmatism, a militant tone that was alien to most ordinary Chinatown residents.

After the outbreak of the Korean War, Chinese leftists were harassed by U.S. government agencies because of their sympathetic attitude to the New China. Many of them had been born in China and were subject to immigration officials' endless investigations and harassments. Some were deported or jailed, and many were forced to remain silent. Their organizational membership declined and most of their newspapers closed. By the mid-1950s, many Chinese left-wing organizations were dissolved.

The 1960s and early 1970s saw the emergence of New Left activists in Chinese American communities. They were inspired by the civil rights movement and consisted of native-born students and professionals. Unlike the Old Left, these New Left activists concentrated more on community issues and sought more direct participation in American politics.

CHINESE QUESTION. The immigration of Chinese workers into the United States was the first serious test of American socialists' adherence to the principle of the international solidarity of the working class. From the birth of the First International in the 1860s to the death of the Socialist Party after the First World War, though many principled socialists stood by their internationalism, American socialist organizations opted to support the trade union movement's demand for a racial ban on the immigration of Chinese workers to the United States.

Arising first in California in the 1860s, the demand for an end to Chinese immigration was soon taken up by trade unions and labor congresses throughout the nation. The International Workingmen's Association (IWA) divided on the issue. Those who followed Marx's advice of focusing their energies on supporting and radicalizing existing trade unions, such as Friedrich Sorge and most German American socialists, echoed labor's demand for the exclusion of the Chinese, while Yankee veterans of the movements for abolition and women's rights stood by the principles of internationalism and egalitarianism.

In California during the late 1870s, where the anti-Chinese agitation was most powerful, socialists threw in their lot with the Workingmen's Party of California (WPC)—a violently racist organization whose credo was "The Chinese Must Go!"—and succeeded in steering the WPC into line with the Socialist Labor Party (SLP). During the Greenback Labor Party's national campaign in 1878, the WPC's vitriolic leader, Denis Kearney, rode the hustings with the SLP's P. J. McGuire and ranted before socialist rallies throughout the East. In 1880 the National Executive Committee of the SLP recommended that the two organizations unite. Seven years later the SLP voted to unite with the WPC's successor, the newly founded Pacific Coast IWA, in spite of the fact that this ersatz IWA had assumed the leadership of California's anti-Chinese labor movement and had gone on record as favoring the forced expulsion of Chinese from San Francisco.

Likewise, a strong trade unionist faction steered the Socialist Party toward an anti-Chinese stance. Socialist Party delegates to the Amsterdam Congress of 1904 introduced a resolution calling on the Second International to declare against the immigration of "backward races." Three years later the Socialist Party's National Executive Committee endorsed an anti-immigration resolution and again fought against the Stuttgart Congress's plank in favor of the free migration of workers. Not all socialists acquiesced to nativism, however; that same year the Industrial Workers of the World took a strong public stand in defense of the equal rights of Asian workers.

CHOMSKY, NOAM (b. 1929). In the 1960s–1980s arguably the foremost public, radical critic of U.S. foreign policy and the ideological system that supports it, Noam Chomsky has also become one of the most hated radical writers of the era. He was a veritable symbol for the "Vietnam Syndrome" of popular revulsion at U.S. intervention into and subversion of the Third World.

A Depression child of liberal, Zionist parents, Chomsky attended the University of Pennsylvania, from which he gained a Ph.D. in 1955, and studied linguistics with Zellig Harris. Vaguely anarchistic (or anti-Leninist) in orientation, he lived in an Israeli kibbutz in 1953 and planned a long-term settlement but abandoned the idea. He emerged during the later 1950s and 1960s as perhaps the most internationally famous linguistic theorist, literally changing the nature of linguistic study from classification of speech elements to a major challenge of behavior science models. His "generative grammar," explained in Syntactic Structures (1957) and other works, has been widely called the "Chomskyan Revolution" in thought.

Chomsky was first drawn into public political debate by the Vietnam War. His writings on Indochina, especially American Power and the New Mandarins (1969), were among the most rigorous and well documented of any written for a general audience. He became an important political speaker, particularly but not only in the Boston area. He also became a much-admired figure by the New Left because of his uncompromising moralism and his anarchist-influenced sense of social alternatives. His sympathetic treatment of the Asian revolutionaries inspired a special admiration among blossoming New Left Asian scholars. It also inspired hatred in the White House (he was placed on Nixon's "Enemies List"), and the beginnings of attacks upon him from Cold War liberals who viewed his sympathy for American foes as proof of Chomsky's "totalitarianism."

As the Vietnam War wound down, Chomsky turned his attention to the roots of foreign policy, the dynamics of the Cold War, and the role of the intelligentsia. While he followed other Left scholars in an examination of unequal exchange and U.S. support to Third World dictatorships, Chomsky offered original insights into the logic and role of the state in decisively reducing human rights. Next, Chomsky examined the sources of the Cold War, arguing that it was in fact functional for the superpowers both as a means of popular mobilization and (particularly in the United States) a technique of economic management. He also sought to define precisely the content and limits of the doctrinal system to which all "responsible" criticism of U.S. foreign policy must conform—that is, the assumption of American good intentions and the ascription of accompanying atrocities to error rather than modus operandi.

With Towards a New Cold War (1982), Chomsky had become a pariah of neo-liberalism, especially Jewish neo-liberalism. Chomsky's entanglement in a freedom-of-expression case involving a French scholar whose work denied the Holocaust offered the New Republic among other journals the opportunity to attack Chomsky as an enemy of Western values and of Jewish life. He ceased to be invited as contributor to major liberal outlets, and reviews of his books from those outlets virtually disappeared.

Chomsky's attention to the Middle East and Central America has deepened both admiration for him on the Left and hatred of him in neo-liberal circles. As an adamant critic of existing Zionism who views liberal intellectuals' uncritical support of Israel as similar to uncritical support of Stalinist Russia in the 1930s–1940s, he has been fearless. As a supporter of Third World causes in the face of post-1960s apathy and repugnance, he has been unbendingly strident. As a radical scholar with roots in the anarchist, moralist critique of the security state, he has remained unique.

During the 1980s and 1990s, Chomsky gradually has become a kind of underground figure of resistance, his work utilized by environmentally-oriented rock bands abroad (especially in Australia) even while steadily ignored by the New York Times. Even in large sections of the international Jewish community, where he had been caricatured as a self-hating Jew, his life's work and moral commitment have gained grudging respect.

CHRISTIAN SOCIALISM. Nearly forgotten until quite recently, Christian Socialism has played a vital role in the life of the American Left. Several of the most popular and widely read U.S. theologians of the first half of this century were outspoken Christian Socialists, Walter Rauschenbusch (1861–1918) and Reinhold Niebuhr (1892–1971) above all. While rarely holding high party (or union) offices, Christian Socialists have served to connect radical ideas with sections of the working class—especially the poor and racial minorities—and with a wide stratum of intellectuals.

Henry James, Sr., was the first prominent American to argue (in 1848, that fateful year) that the goals of Christianity and socialism are identical. Christians heavily populated the utopian socialist settlements across the continent. But with a few exceptions, abolitionism absorbed and drained the reform energies of mainstream northern churches at midcentury. In 1872 a group of Bostonians led by the Congregationalist Rev. Jesse H. Jones founded the Christian Labor Union and published the first two Christian Socialist periodicals, Equity and the Labor Balance. These institutions had faded by 1879.

During the 1880s, a large number of crusading ministers joined reform and radical movements. The vast majority of the Social Gospel advocates opposed radical ideologies. But a minority of New England Social Gospelers, including Jones, spread the evangel of Christian Socialism. W. D. P. Bliss, a Massachusetts Episcopal pastor, became a prominent figure in the New England Knights of Labor, and later editor of the Dawn: A Magazine of Christian Socialism and Record of Social Progress. The reform writings of Richard T. Ely, and the utopian burst of activity following the publication of Edward Bellamy's Looking Backward, helped ministers such as Bliss develop both public interest in and Christian approbation of a cooperative, spiritually inspired solution to the "Social Question."

Christian Socialism (intermixed with Bellamy nationalism, British-inspired Fabian socialism, and radical offshoots of Christian Science) had a special appeal to women reformers repelled by the class-struggle doctrines of the generally patriarchal immigrant socialist milieu. Several of the most prominent women leaders of the day, including Woman's Christian Temperance Union leader Frances Willard and Civil War-era Sanitary Commission leader Mary Livermore, publicly pronounced themselves as being for a cooperative solution. Vida Scudder, an English professor at Wellesley College with extended experience in the settlement house movement, would continue these themes of class reconciliation in religious understanding for decades into the twentieth century.

In 1901 Congregationalist minister George D. Herron (1862–1925) played a leading role in the convention that united various rival factions of the Socialist Party. As the Worker, a contemporary socialist weekly, noted, his selection as temporary chair of the party "was unanimous and satisfactory to all parties. . . . He steered the convention through some threatening breakers during the opening and most trying hours. . . ." One of the most effective agitators of the day, he did much to bridge the gap between presumably "atheistic" immigrant socialists and frequently evangelical American radical reformers.

Although Herron lost his public position and his ministry owing to a divorce scandal, the ranks of American-born socialists, especially in the Plains States and the Southwest, filled with church and unchurched Christians. While much socialist rhetoric (including that of Eugene V. Debs) turned upon Christian metaphors, organized Christian Socialism had a special role to play. The Christian Socialist, published by the Reverend Edward Ellis Carr in Danville, then Chicago, Illinois, achieved a circulation of twenty thousand, including two thousand ministers, and led to the formation of the Christian Socialist Fellowship (1906–1917) with twenty-seven chapters and fifteen hundred members. The Christian Socialist, devoting special numbers to various denominations, shrewdly played to its appreciative audience. But it also took moral positions advanced even for the socialist movement.

Of these, its antiracism was easily the most important. Nearly all the early black socialists of note were Christian ministers, such as George Washington Woodbey (1854–?), a San Diego Baptist, contributor to the Christian Socialist, and former slave. One of Woodbey's converts, George Slater, achieved special prominence. Pastor of the Zion Tabernacle in Chicago and active in that city's Socialist branches, he was elected to the executive committee of the Christian Socialist Fellowship and made the fellowship's Secretary for the Colored Race. Slater published several popular socialist pamphlets, notably Blackmen, Strike for Liberty, and also a pro-socialist monthly, the Western Evangel.

The Reverend Carr, accusing a Socialist Party national figure of moral turpitude, ran afoul of the organization. Expelled and then restored by the national party, he was expelled again by the immigrant-dominated Chicago party branches. In any case, much of the Christian Socialist milieu left the Socialist Party in order to support the First World War, while a small section of young Christian intellectuals became socialists as a result of their wartime pacifist commitments. The ranks of religious-influenced rural and semirural Socialists, their newspapers repressed through government action and their faith shattered by the precipitous decline of the Socialist Party, turned quiescent or joined the farmer-labor movements active during the 1920s.

But in a diminished Socialist Party—its militantly atheistic wing now a part of the Communist movement—the prestige of Christian Socialism grew relatively. Former Presbyterian minister Norman Thomas, the party's perennial presidential candidate from 1928 onward, imparted a spiritualistic or moral tone to even the most economic-political message. Around Thomas ranged such institutions as the World Tomorrow, a highly influential monthly drawing the energies of Christian pacifists and veteran travelers through the impoverished colonial world. At the local level, many Socialist branches gained the active participation of clergy, especially during the Depression and the years shortly before the U.S. entry into World War II. Especially in the South, where a handful of Christian Socialists and Communists such as Claude and Joyce Williams, James Dombrowski, and Howard Kester headed important political institutions, the message carried a strongly interracial gospel.

For the broader Christian public, the works of Rauschenbusch and Niebuhr exerted significant influence. Never joining the Socialist Party, Rauschenbusch argued vigorously for the idea of socialism and sometimes for public support of the party. Niebuhr, an editor of the World Tomorrow, founded in 1931 the Fellowship of Christian Socialists and served as editor of its publication, Radical Religion. A prolific writer, teacher, preacher, and activist, he resigned from the Socialist Party in 1940 in order to support armed resistance to fascism but remained a socialist until 1948. Considered thereafter to be a theological mentor of the Cold War neoconservatism, he returned to dissent with belated opposition to the U.S. war in Vietnam. His successors at the Union Theological Seminary published Christianity and Crisis, an influential monthly that bridged the religious gap between Old and New Left. Meanwhile, one section of Christian Socialists, led in part by former New Haven Socialist Party luminary (and chaplain of the Congress of Industrial Organizations) Willard Uphaus, militantly opposed the Cold War and sought to guide Christian Socialism toward Soviet-American reconciliation. Others, dedicated pacifists, participated in anti-war and anti-Bomb activities and organizations such as the Fellowship for Reconciliation.

Christian Socialists, as individuals, played a notable role in the civil rights and 1960s anti-war movements, but remained ideologically in the background. With the collapse of the 1960s movements, they assumed greater importance in the 1970s, around such campaigns as the United Farm Workers' grape boycott and the empowerment of women clergy. By the later 1970s, they had become key backers of Third World support movements such as the North American Committee on Latin America. Their prestige and ideological clarity arose with the forceful appearance of liberation theology movements in Latin America, Africa, Asia, and the Philippines. Christians for Socialism (1974–1983), a network of activists, never achieved wide support. But Christian Socialist ideas found their way into major denominational publications, and fairly dominated such Left-leaning journals as Sojourners, the Witness, and Christianity and Crisis. The Democratic Socialists of America has maintained a Religion and Socialism Commission, and published the newsletter Religious Socialism, by the middle 1990s the eldest of Christian Socialist publications in North America.

Christian Socialism suffered heavily, from the middle 1980s onward, under the Catholic Church's attack upon liberation theology as well as the defeat of the Sandinista government with its "people's church" and of the Central American resistance movements energetically supported by left-wing Catholics and Protestants. On the domestic front, the steadily more conservative church hierarchy successfully isolated socialistic priests and nuns in many places, while apparently tolerating their presence in others. The National Council of Churches meanwhile distanced itself from much of its past militancy, although some denominations welcomed gay and lesbian parishioners and promoted social programs treating poverty, racism, women's rights, labor causes, and environmental degradation. The black Christian Left, more politically cautious than before and out-organized by the Muslims' Louis Farrakhan, had few national figures beyond Jesse Jackson. Among the journals, Christianity and Crisis was a victim of the downturn, closing its doors in 1994; the sometimes social democratic Commonweal took a sharp rightward turn; and of the "slick" publications, only the Witness, relocated to Detroit, remained solvent.

Yet the crisis of the secular Left, the persistence of church progressives, and the presence of impoverished American populations (now increasingly Spanish-speaking) continued to inspire much local religious-political activity. "Faith-based" organizing, mostly connected to community issues, was best known through the Philadelphia-based Sojourners group.

CIVIL RIGHTS CONGRESS. It was called the most successful “Communist front” of all time. Dashiell Hammett, author of The Thin Man and long-time companion of Lillian Hellman, went to jail because of his association with it. Paul Robeson was stoned at Peekskill as he raised money for it. What stirred such passion was the Civil Rights Congress (CRC), which during its existence from 1946 to 1956 fought for and established a number of civil rights and liberties rulings that expanded the rights of all in the United States.

CRC was formed in the early postwar period when the impending Cold War and McCarthyism could be sensed but had not yet been established. It was formed as a result of a merger among the International Labor Defense (which was catapulted to prominence as a result of its vigorous defense of the Scottsboro Nine and Angelo Herndon, among others), the National Negro Congress (an early effort to form a “Black United Front” among Afro-Americans), and the National Federation for Constitutional Liberties. Early on they developed a specialty in fighting “black” and “red” cases.

One of CRC’s earliest black cases was that of Willie McGee, a Mississippi truck driver whose white lover accused him of rape after her husband discovered their affair. In their attempt to save McGee’s life, CRC launched a national and international campaign that made his name a household word. They helped to publicize the fact that rape of white women had been used historically as a reason to lynch or execute black men. A significant percentage of their cases had this theme, including the Martinsville Seven—another one of their more significant cases. Even in their declining days, they were still able to mobilize masses around the case of black teenager Emmett Till, the Chicago resident who was lynched on an ill-fated trip to Mississippi in 1955 after allegedly “getting fresh” with a white woman. The flip side of this emphasis was their defense of Rosa Lee Ingram, a black female sharecropper from Georgia who was assaulted by her white landlord, whom she then fatally dispatched. This emphasis touched a raw nerve in the national consciousness among blacks and whites, as CRC linked sensitive questions of race, sex and exploitation.

Long before Montgomery, CRC was “softening up” the racists in the Deep South for the subsequent onslaught led by Rev. Martin Luther King, Jr. In the early 1950s they led “Freedom Rides” to Virginia to save the Martinsville Seven. But their success in bringing domestic racism to the international arena may have been their most significant contribution. In the post-war period Jim Crow was becoming an aching Achilles heel in the execution of U.S. foreign policy. How could hearts and minds be won in an increasingly “colored” world when people of color were being subjected to such pernicious discrimination here? CRC seized upon this contradiction when it published the landmark study We Charge Genocide, which detailed the heinous crimes committed against Afro-Americans and was filed at the United Nations. Reprinted in many languages and many thousands of copies, this work was an international embarrassment for the U.S. government and was a factor in bringing down the walls of Jim Crow.

Still, as dramatic and riveting as their “black” cases were, perhaps more controversial were their “red” cases. CRC was the major organization fighting the Smith Act frame-ups, the McCarran Act, the Communist Control Act, the House Un-American Activities Committee (HUAC), and the panoply of laws and institutions formed to enforce a Cold War consensus. Their opinion was that defense of the Communist Party was the first line in the defense of civil liberties generally. Hence, they were avid in their defense of the Communist Party leadership, which ultimately involved imprisonment for scores of activists on the grounds of “teaching and advocating” Marxism-Leninism—not seeking to overthrow the government, as is commonly misunderstood. Despite this gargantuan labor, a number of Communists in CRC felt that not enough attention was paid to these cases or to repression of the labor movement, as evidenced by the passage of the Taft-Hartley Act. Others felt that the battle for Afro-American equality was the cutting edge in the battle for democracy generally, thus justifying this emphasis. The fact that the beginning of the end for HUAC came when they brought their traveling roadshow to Atlanta and encountered a united civil rights leadership does lend some credence to the last notion.

The practical and theoretical battles were conducted within an organization that at its zenith may have had ten thousand members, during a time when progressive organizations were not proliferating. The CRC's strongest chapters were in such critically important cities as New York, Detroit, Seattle, the San Francisco Bay area, and Los Angeles. Though it was derided as a "Communist front," a number of the Party's internal weaknesses did not unduly influence CRC negatively. For example, during a time when the Communist Party was conducting a vigorous campaign to uproot white chauvinism that was later deemed by the leadership to have been conducted improperly, the brunt of the deleterious impact managed to escape CRC despite—or perhaps because of—their own vigorous campaigns on behalf of McGee, Ingram, and others.

CRC had titanic clashes with both the American Civil Liberties Union (ACLU) and the National Association for the Advancement of Colored People (NAACP). "Free speech" for racists and the Ku Klux Klan was a bone of contention with the ACLU, though that organization's ingrained anticommunism certainly played a role in their conflicts. CRC's conflicts with the NAACP were more complex. That group was avowedly "anti-imperialist" and experienced tremendous growth during those days of lessened anticommunism, 1941–1945. This was the time when black Communist Ben Davis was elected to the New York City Council from Harlem with the support of NAACP executive secretary Roy Wilkins; but the alliance was not able to withstand the blows of the Cold War. Nevertheless, just as Booker T. Washington publicly disdained battles against aspects of Jim Crow while secretly funding them, the NAACP maintained forms of cooperation with CRC while hewing to the official line publicly. This was aided by the contradictions of Jim Crow itself; Wilkins lived across the hall from CRC leader William Patterson in a segregated Harlem apartment building, 409 Edgecombe Avenue.

The U.S. government, a major target of CRC broadsides, was a major factor in bringing on their dissolution. The Subversive Activities Control Board, in particular, forced the liquidation not only of CRC but also the Council on African Affairs (the premier organization pushing decolonization and anti-apartheid) and other Left-led organizations. Yet, there was significant continuity between CRC and the post-Montgomery movement, as many who had honed their skills fighting for McGee went on to press for the Civil Rights Act of 1964 and the Voting Rights Act of 1965, and to counsel the Black Panther Party. This was CRC's ultimate legacy.

CIVIL RIGHTS MOVEMENT. The movement to uproot segregation laws in the South and obtain full civil liberties for African Americans in all states was sparked by a 1954 Supreme Court decision that declared segregated schools unconstitutional. Despite the seemingly modest aim of simply obtaining rights already guaranteed by existing federal law, the movement's goals could not be realized without a fundamental change in American society. Massive popular resistance to that change was immediate and was vigorously supported by local and state governments, which often tolerated antimovement vigilante violence. The federal government, while ostensibly supportive of the movement, usually intervened belatedly and halfheartedly.

From the onset the civil rights movement was "charged" with being Communist-inspired and subversive. The struggle would indeed attract many radical activists, and rebels of varied ideological orientation and in specific locales would reactivate radical-liberal alliances destabilized by McCarthyism. Three major currents came to dominate a multifaceted and national movement. The largest group accepted the leadership of the Reverend Martin Luther King, Jr., and his Southern Christian Leadership Conference (SCLC), which was founded in 1957 following the successful Montgomery bus boycott of 1955–1956. From this general orbit came the younger and more dynamic Student Nonviolent Coordinating Committee (SNCC), founded in 1960. Separate from the two southern-based organizations but converging with them over a period of time were black separatist currents, mainly headquartered in northern cities and informally recognizing the Harlem-based Malcolm X as their major spokesperson.

Martin Luther King first came to prominence when the leadership of the Montgomery bus boycott was all but forced on him. Many of his closest advisers were also Baptist ministers, but two, Bayard Rustin and Stanley D. Levison, were representatives of what came to be called the Old Left. Rustin, who had been a Communist for a brief period in the 1930s, was closely allied with the most militant pacifist organizations, while Levison had been a fundraiser for Communist Party causes for many years and still retained informal ties to the party.

The tradition represented by Rustin was not new to King. He had studied the ideas of Walter Rauschen-busch, Reinhold Niebuhr, Mahatma Gandhi, and A. J. Muste while in college and had concluded that the Hegelian dialectic could be interpreted in a Christian context. King believed nonviolent resistance to evil could activate the moral center of humanity, effecting a profound and lasting change in human relationships. This view would be the hallmark of his political commitment. Rustin provided King with a direct link to the established pacifist Left and served as a logistics officer for specific campaigns such as the historic 1963 march on Washington.

Levison embodied the Popular Front approach in which the interests of labor, the nation, and racial minorities were seen as convergent. With ties to various elements of the New Deal coalition, he was a highly sophisticated and successful fundraiser. A nearly irreplaceable figure in the early years, he was sought for advice on all major problems, and like Rustin, he edited some of King's writing. When the issue of his links to the Communist Party was raised by the Federal Bureau of Investigation (FBI), the Kennedy brothers forced King to promise that he would cease consulting with Levison, but King continued to do so in a semisecretive fashion. Levison ended his informal ties to the Party in 1963.

Another SCLC staffer with Communist links was Jack O'Dell, a black organizer recruited by Levison. O'Dell had been active in Communist causes throughout the 1950s, and FBI reports stated he was a concealed Party member with a seat on the National Committee. For a short time, Levison and O'Dell constituted the New York SCLC, and various appointments and contacts flowed through their office. O'Dell eventually resigned his post under the pressure of the Communist issue because SCLC was determined to avoid being labeled "subversive."

King never made a public statement that he was a socialist, but he had questioned capitalist ethics as early as college and often told his aides that he was indeed a socialist. Upon Levison's advice he adopted the term "socialized democrat" for public utterances. King was greatly impressed by the social democracy he witnessed in Scandinavia when he accepted the Nobel Peace Prize (1964), and in the United States he had contacts with socialists such as Michael Harrington. Late in 1967 various radicals approached him about heading a third-party effort, a course he ultimately rejected.

The war in Vietnam was another radicalizing force on King. Conservative civil rights leaders urged him to remain silent on the issue because opposition to the war would further strain the already fragile federal support for the movement and would surely alienate some segments of the general public. Although he held the view that the war was a moral blight for many years, he did not make a public statement until 1966. After that his leadership of parades and other anti-war efforts brought him more deeply into the orbit of traditional radical-liberal coalitions.

Leftist influences, however, had been present in King's movement from its very genesis. Rosa Parks, the woman whose refusal to move to the back of the bus set off the Montgomery boycott, had previously attended training classes at the radical Highlander Folk School, and a major boycott organizer, E. D. Nixon, had been a lifelong associate of A. Philip Randolph. SCLC would have continuing contacts with Highlander and with Left support groups such as the Southern Conference Educational Fund. Although the National Association for the Advancement of Colored People and other established civil rights organizations had expelled Communists from their ranks to accommodate McCarthyism, any local campaign was likely to include radical veterans of battles in which the Communist Party had played a major role.

The perspective of SNCC was different. Rather than concentrating on building campaigns around a single issue and a celebrated leader, SNCC organized communities for long-term structural change. SNCC organizers lived in the communities being mobilized and tried to develop indigenous leaders. Nonviolence was less a philosophical imperative than a chosen tactical option given that the immediate opposition was often led by sheriffs, police chiefs, or officers of the National Guard. Rather than taking counsel from the Old Left, some of the founders of the New Left looked to SNCC as a model. Several of the early members of Students for a Democratic Society (SDS)—Casey Hayden, Betty Garman, Jim Onsonis, Bob Zellner, and Maria Varela—had first been active in SNCC. Tom Hayden, for one, has stated that SDS's concepts of participatory democracy and organizing oneself out of the organizer's job were directly inspired by SNCC.

Unlike SCLC, which was terrified of being tarred as Communist-dominated, SNCC adopted a policy of barring no one on ideological grounds. Against the advice of and despite occasional threats by established leaders, SNCC accepted the assistance of radical groups such as the National Lawyers Guild. FBI reports stated that children of prominent Communists could be found working on SNCC projects and that SNCC facilities carried literature from many radical groups, including the Communist Party. The FBI also noted that SNCC knowingly cooperated with the Communist Party-sponsored W. E. B. DuBois Clubs during demonstrations at Texas Southern University, allowed the Socialist Workers Party (SWP) and its youth group, the Young Socialist Alliance, to raise funds on its behalf, and sent representatives to SDS conventions.

The origins of SNCC, however, had not been ideological. SNCC had come into existence as a response to segregation laws in the South and what was perceived as inadequate militancy on the part of SCLC. Disappointed that the United States failed to live up to its ideals when called to account, and themselves victims of state-sponsored and state-tolerated violence, SNCC activists sought philosophical and ideological grounding. Frantz Fanon and Che Guevara were more widely read than Marx, and current events in China, Africa, and Cuba seemed far more relevant than the October Revolution. SNCC representatives accepted invitations to visit North Vietnam, Cuba, the Dominican Republic, Japan, Israel, and the Soviet Union. SNCC became involved with the war crimes tribunal headed by Bertrand Russell and administered at the time by Trotskyist Ralph Schoenman. The most frequent of the SNCC travelers was Stokely Carmichael, who began to shape a Pan-Africanist Marxist perspective. His most dramatic foreign appearance was at a congress of intellectuals held in Havana in 1967.

No single ideology ever captured the SNCC core. In some areas of Mississippi, activists were inclined to the perspectives of the Industrial Workers of the World, while in Atlanta, one of the major SNCC centers, influential individuals had ties with the Revolutionary Action Movement. At the same time that black Trotskyists were active in SNCC's National Black Antiwar Antidraft Union, other SNCC members attended youth conferences in Moscow. This internal search for a unifying political perspective ultimately was resolved not by the adoption of a revolutionary theory but by the sense that the time had come for an all-black organization whose message to would-be white allies was to organize their own communities. This concept emerged into public view as the "Black Power" slogan of 1966 and soon swept the entire civil rights movement.

The appeal of Black Power was directly related to the murders, bombings, beatings, and other brutal reactions to the voter registration drives, the failure of the federal government to protect the constitutional rights of activists, and the rejection of the Mississippi Freedom Democratic Party at the 1964 Democratic National Convention. Disillusionment with what could be expected from white power structures also amounted to a de facto repudiation of nonviolence. In 1967 SNCC came out in support of the Puerto Rican independence movement and signed "treaties" of cooperation with Hopi leader Tomas Banyaca and Mexican-American rebel Reyes Tijerina. But Black Power cost SNCC dearly. Trusted white organizers had to leave and former sources of financial support dried up. Most damaging of all was the disaffection of large segments of a black southern constituency whose desire remained integration, not voluntary separatism.

If SNCC were to survive, it would have to find a new base of African American support. Stokely Carmichael believed the future lay in an alliance with the Black Panther Party (BPP) founded in Oakland, California, in 1966. The BPP founders had said SNCC was their direct inspiration and that their logo had been taken from SNCC graphics found in Lowndes County, Alabama. The appeal of the BPP was that it was in a period of rapid growth and its strength in the black community was augmented by good relations with white radicals organized in groups such as California Newsreel and the Peace and Freedom Party.

California was also home to black groups hostile to the BPP. Among these was the Los Angeles-based US, an organization espousing a blend of black nationalism and socialism created by its flamboyant leader, Ron Karenga. US and the BPP had had physical as well as verbal confrontations. Carmichael believed a revitalized SNCC could halt such infighting and meld militant local groups scattered throughout the country into a powerful national presence. He agreed to a fusion of SNCC and the BPP as a starting point, and he presided over a large rally in Los Angeles in which US and other smaller organizations peacefully participated alongside the BPP.

The fusion with the BPP was mainly a one-man show, for most of the SNCC core no longer recognized Carmichael's leadership, much less supported his nearly unilateral dissolution of their group into another. The official SNCC leader was H. Rap Brown, but he soon went into hiding when car bombs killed his closest associates, one of whom was longtime SNCC activist Ralph Featherstone. James Foreman tried to guide SNCC toward organizing black workers and eventually led a number of associates into the Detroit-based League of Revolutionary Black Workers as a prelude to building a socialist Black Workers Congress. Frances Beal used SNCC elements to build the Third World Woman's Alliance, an organization that would have considerable impact. Other SNCC workers persevered in local projects that often included municipal or state electoral campaigns. The various SNCC factions went in so many different directions that a 1971 FBI report declared that the organization had ceased to exist.

The Congress of Racial Equality (CORE) experienced a process similar to that of SNCC. When James Farmer became head of CORE in 1961, he and Bayard Rustin organized conferences in various cities with the cooperation of direct-action pacifist groups. The result was the Freedom Rides campaign, which was modeled on an earlier effort organized by the Fellowship of Reconciliation, the group from which CORE originated. The heroic Freedom Rides established CORE as a major civil rights group. The most racially integrated of the action organizations, CORE played a role in community organizing, voter registration, and support of the Mississippi Freedom Democratic Party. But as beatings and murders mounted without adequate federal response, many CORE cadre became disenchanted with nonviolence as a way of life and began to carry arms. In 1964 whites were asked to play a less prominent public role at the urging of James Farmer, who wished the organization to remain racially integrated, but in 1967, under the leadership of Floyd McKissick, CORE became all-black. Its influence faded quickly. Roy Innis became leader in 1968 and transformed CORE into a black nationalist organization without any ties to its pacifist origins. The organization survived as a personal forum for Innis but without any mass base.

The separatist tide that prevailed with the "Black Power" slogan was linked to a black nationalism that went back to 1920s activists such as Marcus Garvey and black scholars such as J. A. Rogers, who had traced the contributions of Africans throughout world history. During the years when SCLC, SNCC, and CORE were most active, their strategy was to confine actions to the South and use the North to raise funds and recruit volunteers. Their target constituencies for organization were churchgoers and the college educated. One result of this perspective was that direct action in the North was mainly left to local groups, and the needs of the most blighted sectors of the black community, particularly the population that came to be called the underclass, were rarely addressed.

The organization that emerged to fill some of the political vacuum in the North was the Nation of Islam, much of whose appeal was a black separatism based on personal regeneration and discipline. Popularly called the Black Muslims, the Nation of Islam was highly unorthodox in its teaching that white people were representatives of the devil. Although the formal leader was Elijah Muhammad, an aged figure who spent most of his time in Chicago, the charismatic leader of the Black Muslims was Malcolm X. Like many Black Muslims, Malcolm X had been a criminal. Under his direction the Nation of Islam intensified an already vigorous recruitment in urban ghettos and prisons. While espousing a communal self-sufficiency that was sometimes dubbed "black capitalism," the Muslims offered a merciless attack on America's racial hypocrisy at home and abroad, and the Muslims were adamant about their right to self-defense. Many African Americans who could not accept the Muslims on religious grounds admired their pride, militancy, and self-sufficiency.

Malcolm X developed a speaking style that provided a systematic critique of U.S. foreign and domestic policies in terms easily comprehended by urban audiences of limited formal education. His speeches also began to attract the admiration of radicals. The SWP, in particular, believed he would eventually drop his separatist views and become a major leader of black America and perhaps the socialist movement itself. Acting on this premise, the SWP sponsored forums at which he spoke and diligently collected his writings and made recordings of his key speeches. While Malcolm X was not about to join the SWP and it is not clear exactly what he thought about Trotskyism, he was certainly aware that socialists were responding to his message.

Following a 1964 trip to Mecca and extensive travel in North Africa, Malcolm X set out in a new political direction. He broke with Elijah Muhammad on grounds of religion and personal corruption. Although he remained an orthodox Muslim himself, Malcolm X's new political base, the Organization of Afro-American Unity, had no religious or ideological criteria. He was now ready to mobilize a vast range of admirers, including leftists such as actor Ossie

Davis, militant writers such as James Baldwin, influential journalists such as the Amsterdam News's James Hicks, and prominent nationalists such as Harlem bookstore owner Louis Micheaux. Although Malcolm X expressed a growing interest in what was happening in China, no less a figure than Martin Luther King announced his pleasure that Malcolm X had joined the mainstream civil rights movement.

Malcolm X undertook a speaking tour of college campuses, where enthusiastic audiences were often predominantly white. He was also the object of constant death threats. As he dictated his autobiography to Alex Haley, he said he did not expect to live long enough to read his own book. He was assassinated in 1965 just as the book was becoming available. Black Muslims were eventually convicted for the murder, but there is considerable scholarship that points in other directions. Before his death, Malcolm X had said he had created the military apparatus of the Nation of Islam and knew what it could and could not do. In his opinion, the attacks and pressures he had experienced were beyond their power and could only be possible through governmental assistance.

The anger that Malcolm X had sought to channel into political action exploded in the Watts riots of the summer of 1965. A string of uprisings followed, culminating in the massive Newark and Detroit rebellions of 1967, the costliest in American history. These insurrectional outbursts made it evident to all that urban blacks had not been appeased by the passage of the Voting Rights Act (1964), school desegregation efforts, and other gains secured by the King-led movement. King himself thought the concessions he won were often only sops to stave off more violence. While King accepted any gains that were available, the advances were not the result of the moral regeneration he had sought to foster through nonviolent resistance. He also understood that the personal respect shown to him was often a means of keeping the spotlight from more volatile leaders. While personally willing to suffer whatever misfortune might flow from continued nonviolent resistance, he questioned how long he could continue to ask others to follow a course that was inevitably met by violent counterattacks. Whatever viability remained in the nonviolent tradition was largely dispelled when King was assassinated in 1968.

No successor to King was able to emerge from the SCLC milieu, and, like SNCC and CORE, SCLC was doomed to political oblivion. New organizations such as the BPP and the League of Revolutionary Black Workers were unable to regroup the collapsing movement. Malcolm X would prove as irreplaceable as King despite the attempts of Eldridge Cleaver, George Jackson, and Stokely Carmichael to carry his banner. The Nation of Islam also split, with the largest formation becoming totally orthodox in its teachings but also largely apolitical.

Rather than expanding to ever larger arenas in the 1970s, the civil rights movement contracted to local venues. Many individual activists and grass-roots organizations took part in efforts to win city, county, and state offices. In the North as well as the South, there was a rising tide of black mayors and state legislators along with a minor uptick in black congressmen. During the Carter administration, there were some opportunities at the federal level as well, the post of ambassador to the United Nations going to Andrew Young, one of King's closest advisers. The ultimate heir of the electoral tradition, however, was to be Jesse Jackson, formerly one of SCLC's younger staffers and not especially close to King.

After creating a self-help group in Chicago, Jackson emerged in the 1980s as leader of the Rainbow Coalition, a vaguely defined movement that sought to unite various dissident sectors of American society with a sharp focus on race, class, and sexual exploitation. Some members of the coalition hoped it would become a third party while others saw it as a pressure group within the Democratic Party. Although the Rainbow Coalition eventually disintegrated, the black voting blocs made possible through the civil rights agitation centered around SCLC and SNCC had become the most dependable Democratic constituency and the most liberal voters in the United States. Not coincidentally, former activists of SNCC and the BPP were elected under the Democratic banner to Congress and a variety of lesser offices. Movement veterans who felt a third party was essential for fundamental change were attracted to the New Party, the Labor Party, various Green formations, and independent campaigns, particularly for non-partisan local office.

The phase of the historic drive for racial equality that began in the 1950s and persisted to the early 1970s had always been a house of its own, a reaction to American injustice under the direct inspiration of American ideals as stated in the Declaration of Independence and codified in the Civil War amendments to the Constitution. Many radical individuals and organizations were attracted to its massive and heroic efforts to redress historic wrongs. These radical forces never dominated, much less led, the movement, but they were part of the broad process of change, their ideas influenced by, as well as influencing, the dramatic course of events.

CLASSICAL STUDIES. Critics on the Left have never been entirely comfortable with the idealized image of ancient Greek and Roman civilization captured in the famous verse "the glory that was Greece and the grandeur that was Rome." According to this story, Greece is the fountainhead of democratic values and institutions, as well as of literature, philosophy, art, and history, while Rome is the model of a stable and powerful empire, bestowing the benefits of peace and Hellenic culture upon the known world. As the twin sources of "Western civilization," the virtues of Greece and Rome have been appealed to as evidence of the superiority of European over other cultures.

There is, however, an alternative picture: Greek and Roman civilization was built upon a brutal system of slavery; women were excluded from civic roles; both Athens and Rome developed empires that were perceived as tyrannical by their subject populations; the Roman aristocracy was as greedy, arrogant, and powerful a ruling clique as any; so great a thinker as Aristotle believed that "barbarians" were biologically inferior and thus naturally fit to be slaves of the Greeks. Oddly enough, much of what was truly democratic about classical culture, like its theater and sculpture, has been perceived in modern times as elite art, known through difficult languages or stored up in museums.

Recent decades have seen the emergence of a critical perspective on classical civilization that has focused attention on oppressed and marginalized populations in the ancient world. Scholars on the Left, especially feminist critics, have to a large extent inspired this new approach, and it has begun to affect the teaching of the classics in colleges and schools.

Classics had a special status for socialists of the late nineteenth and early twentieth centuries. To many theorists and popular readers, capitalism and class society seemed a passing phenomenon, embraced by ancient collectivity (cf. August Bebel's Frau und der Sozialismus) and the socialism to come. C. Osborne Ward, one of the outstanding intellectuals of the First International's U.S. affiliate, in The Ancient Lowly (2 vols., 1887), presented the Christian Revolution as an attempt to recuperate a recollected ideal of ancient equality, though it was ultimately defeated by the bond between church and state. After the First World War, with the failure of socialist reform, the authority of the Russian Revolution as the model of scientific socialism, and the rise of modernism, the importance of the ancient world as a source of socialist perspectives tended to diminish in the United States, and few scholars on the Left looked beyond the linear model of social development adumbrated in Engels's The Origin of the Family, Private Property, and the State and canonized in Stalin's Dialectical and Historical Materialism (1938).

In the 1960s, the Women's Classical Caucus was formed within the professional society of classicists (the American Philological Association) in order to address the status of women in antiquity in a critical way. These women and men did not take it for granted that, in classical Athens, a respectable woman did not appear alone in public, and rarely appeared in public at all; that she was deprived of juridical as well as civic rights (in the law courts, it was considered indecent even to mention the name of a citizen woman); that in all legal transactions she was represented by a guardian (called the kyrios), who, in marriage, transferred her to the authority of a husband, who in turn became her kyrios (women in Rome suffered comparable disabilities, although they were not so rigorously segregated from male social life as they were in Athens). Feminist scholars were not content to describe such oppression; they were also concerned to understand how it was legitimized. As a result, a new word has entered the vocabulary of classicists: ideology. The great texts of antiquity, from Aeschylus to Virgil, are now seen, by some, as complicit in sustaining or reproducing systems of domination, and not just as timeless repositories of high values; the sexist aspects of ancient medicine, or of Aristotelian biology, are increasingly being subjected to critical scrutiny. To address the problem of ideology, classicists borrowed from other disciplines, such as anthropology and semiotics (the analysis of language and meaning); new journals came into being to accommodate the new methods (in this country, especially Arethusa, Helios, and others), and the whole field became the scene of political, as well as antiquarian, controversy.

After World War II, leftist scholars such as Moses Finley brought a new sophistication to the analysis of the ancient economy and elucidated the class structure of classical societies. In 1972 a panel (still unique) on "Marxism and the Classics" was presented at the American Philological Association, which led to a special issue of Arethusa (1975). In the process, another term has entered the lexicon of classical scholarship: class struggle. Wealth in ancient Greece and Rome took primarily the form of land, although there was some manufacture and export of commodities like pottery. Poor citizens, struggling to maintain a small plot, constantly ran the risk of falling into debt and thus being expropriated by the rich, who exploited dependent labor on their estates. Materialist historians have interpreted ancient democracy as the collective effort of the lower and middle strata to protect their interests, and its failure coincided with the victory of the large landowners. During the Roman Empire, there was a progressive lowering of the status of the average citizen, under competition from mass slavery and intensive exploitation, until the condition of tenant farmers and serfs was socially and legally little better than that of slaves.

It remains controversial to what extent slavery may be understood as a specific "mode of production" in antiquity. Slavery was, as one ancient testimony by a slave informs us, the worst catastrophe that could befall a human being. Slaves have had little chance to have their own voice recorded in the annals of history, but scholars are collecting what evidence they can, often in the form of inscriptions, to understand how slaves responded to a condition in which marriages were regarded as mere cohabitation, and slave children were said to be fatherless. At Rome, manumitted slaves received citizen rights, and funerary inscriptions offer some insight into the careers of those who, in the first two centuries A.D., achieved a measure of economic success.

In this way, classical studies has responded to women's (and more recently gay and lesbian) liberation, the civil rights movement, and new developments in Marxist theory. A self-consciously left-oriented women's tendency within the discipline remains the most important stimulus to reevaluating the classical heritage. The plight of slaves, the poor, women, foreigners, and other oppressed groups is at last receiving something of the attention it deserves, and has in turn called into question the notion of a privileged and superior "Western" tradition. It is a sign of the relevance of the Left to classical studies that the third edition of the Oxford Classical Dictionary will, for the first time, have an entry titled "Marxism."

CLEVELAND CITIZEN. "America's Oldest Labor Newspaper," as its subtitle still proclaims, the Cleveland Citizen played an especially important role in socialist and trade union movements of 1891–1920 through the political influence and personal forcefulness of its leading editor, Max Hayes (1866–1945). Founded as an organ of the new Central Labor Union, which had broken from the Knights of Labor in 1887 and adhered to the American Federation of Labor (AFL), the Citizen was simultaneously pro-socialist and pro-AFL. Despite Hayes's national reputation of leading socialist opposition to Samuel Gompers for three decades, Hayes consistently argued against any break with the AFL. He adamantly opposed the Socialist Trades and Labor Alliance in the 1890s, the Industrial Workers of the World in the 1900s and 1910s, and the Congress of Industrial Organizations in the 1930s.

During the 1890s the strongest and most durable of many local socialistic labor papers, the Citizen functioned as an organizing tool for the Central Labor Union and for national AFL unions in the Cleveland area, and as a free, open forum for discussion of all the hotly debated issues in the working class and the Left. In addition to a wide range of national and international labor news, the weekly characteristically covered the economic, political, social, and cultural activities of Cleveland's multiethnic labor and community groups—with special emphasis upon those involved in the skilled trades. Reputedly, Gompers began publishing the American Federationist in 1894 to counter the Citizen. On the other side of the political lines, in 1895–1896, Hayes was among the first important union leaders to break with Daniel DeLeon's Socialist Labor Party and to call for an alternative socialist movement more accepting of labor's institutional autonomy. The Citizen fended off several further threats from Right and Left in subsequent decades, losing the subsidy of the Central Federation of Labor but not its endorsement.

In 1920 the Citizen again took the national spotlight when it became the official organ of the Cleveland and Ohio Labor Party with Hayes the candidate for the national Farmer-Labor Party ticket. Hayes remained at the helm of the paper, advocate of the AFL and of independent political action, until incapacitated by a stroke in 1940. The paper subsequently lost its socialistic character, and was purchased in 1977 by the Cleveland Building Trades Council.

CLOTH HAT AND CAPMAKERS. In its formation and early years an almost classic Jewish socialist union, the Capmakers suffered from inordinate Left infighting and drifted under moderating leadership toward the center of the political spectrum. Heir to a succession of unsuccessful or short-lived union efforts and an increasingly successful (but hardly socialist) Hatters Union among blocked hat makers, the Capmakers grew up economically out of a vast expansion of the headwear industry in the New York area. Organized in 1887, Cloth Hat and Cap Operators Local No. 1 turned first to the Socialist Labor Party for aid, but it resisted affiliation with the Socialist Trades and Labor Alliance on the grounds of union autonomy. Led by socialists, some of the most important being former DeLeonites—the union also resisted affiliation with the American Federation of Labor until 1905. By then, the union had been rechartered (in 1901, as United Cloth Hat and Cap Makers of America) and had thrown its energies against the efforts of the Industrial Workers of the World (perceived as a newfangled DeLeonism) to create a presence in New York through a Wobbly capmakers' affiliate. Intent upon a more "constructive" socialist labor policy, the Capmakers enthusiastically endorsed Socialist Party candidates and participated widely in New York socialist activities into the 1930s.

The union came of age under the unchallenged leadership of Max Zaritsky. Erstwhile underground revolutionary and son of a prosperous Minsk merchant, Zaritsky had entered the trade from the business side and rapidly rose to leadership. Enjoying a small-scale version of Amalgamated Clothing Workers president Sidney Hillman's success, Zaritsky in 1917 became the union's first president and directed it through its World War I-era growth and consolidation.

By the 1920s, when Zaritsky had considerably moderated his socialist practice, he faced opposition from undiminished old-time Socialists and from younger Communists, both emboldened by deteriorating conditions. Winning abandonment of the piece rate, he soon insisted on its return for the sake of labor productivity and manufacturing profits. He resigned in 1925, taking a position with the Jewish Daily Forward, but returned in 1927 and remained for the duration of this career. The Trade Union Education League had organized against him from the early 1920s, at one point nearly taking a majority of capmakers' locals. Led by organizer Gladys Schechter, the Communists again challenged in 1926–1927, but were beaten back through the gerrymandering of locals.

The Communist shift to the dual unionism of the Trade Union Unity League, and Zaritsky's subsequent expulsion of dissidents, virtually destroyed Left influence in the trade. Zaritsky's own loyalties had by this time become markedly Zionist, and he later abandoned socialist ideas altogether for something approaching a corporate view of labor and management.

Unlike the case in a number of other needle trades, the Left posed no further threats to Zaritsky's leadership of the proliferating unionization under the New Deal. Politically a wholehearted supporter of the American Labor Party, he led his troops in alliance with the David Dubinsky wing of the party. After Sidney Hillman's death, Alex Rose (a leader of the millinery workers, a Labor Zionist, and a bitter anti-communist crusader since the early 1920s) maneuvered the formation of the Liberal Party, dedicated to a Cold War liberalism and to patronage. Into the 1940s–1950s, a persistent strain of Jewish (especially Yiddish) radicalism, in all varieties from anarchist to communist, nevertheless remained among the old-timers. Although it cooperated widely with employers in the postwar years, the union grew dramatically smaller owing to the shrinking of the hat trade. Merger with the Amalgamated Clothing Workers Union (later Amalgamated Clothing and Textile Workers Union) brought it back eventually toward a progressive milieu. By that time, Jewish membership—concentrated in the leadership—had diminished within the union, which was itself to become steadily weaker because of the incoming rush of imported goods.

COLD WAR REVISIONISM. In the early 1950s, Cold War assumptions dominated American public life. Almost unnoticed, three books were published, one by a young, unknown academic, one by a jailed Communist, and one by a maverick reporter. These books began the effort to break through the closed-mindedness of American public opinion about the "struggle for freedom" with the Soviet Union. They marked the first appearance of Cold War Revisionism—an argument against the virtually unanimous view that Soviet expansionism and worldwide subversion had necessitated a defensive military buildup by the United States and its allies and even defensive wars in Greece, Korea, and French Indochina.

Professor William A. Williams authored American-Russian Relations, 1787–1947 (1951). He placed the beginning of the Cold War in the broad historical context of U.S. imperial concerns. The U.S. government had tried to reverse the revolution in Russia after 1917 and was aggressively opposing Soviet interests in Eastern Europe. The book was a strong scholarly rejoinder to the George Kennan school of containment. In the era of the Truman Doctrine and Korean War even such a measured critique was too much for the establishment. The publisher submitted the chapter on Kennan to Foreign Affairs, the magazine of the foreign policy elite, but they returned it to Williams stating it was interesting and provocative but too personal in its rebuttal of Kennan (whatever that meant!). The book made no apparent impact in academia, but was approvingly reviewed in the small left-wing press.

Carl Marzani, serving a prison sentence for contempt of Congress, wrote We Can Be Friends (1952) from published sources available in the prison libraries. This book showed that a careful reading of U.S. government documents, speeches of politicians, memoirs like those of Winston Churchill, and the New York Times could cast doubt on the consensus about Soviet blame for the Cold War. Meanwhile, journalist I. F. Stone, no supporter of Stalin, had discovered that the Korean War may very well have been caused by intra-Korean issues and not by the Soviet Union. Furthermore, he argued that the intervention of the Chinese was a result of legitimate Chinese security concerns. With no one willing to publish his book, Paul Sweezy and Leo Huberman of the Monthly Review took his manuscript as the first Monthly Review Press book. Stone's Hidden History of the Korean War (1953) provided a useful summary of evidence suggesting that the Korean War was not necessarily a case of unprovoked aggression.

In historiography, revisionism means just what it sounds like. It represents the revising of previously accepted interpretations—a challenge to "received doctrine"—on the basis of new evidence, previously ignored evidence, new interpretations of agreed-upon evidence, or some combination thereof. New material becomes available. The bias of earlier historians may have blinded them to some evidence. The passage of time permits perceptions of events to become more detached, and the issues of succeeding eras to shed new light on those of the past. Thus, our understanding of historical events changes quite drastically as time passes. In the case of judgments about the origins and course of the Cold War, this is a particularly important phenomenon because one's beliefs about the history of the Cold War can lead to two possible conclusions.

I. F. Stone went on to found I. F. Stone's Weekly, which regularly pricked holes in the various balloons of disinformation loosed onto an unsuspecting public. William A. Williams expanded his investigations to include U.S. foreign policy in general. After publishing a number of articles he put out a book-length interpretation, The Tragedy of American Diplomacy, in 1959. In 1960 Professor D. F. Fleming published a two-volume work, The Origins and History of the Cold War. These two books mark the upsurge of post-McCarthy Cold War revisionism, with different emphases. Whereas Williams put the Cold War in the context of long-term U.S. economic and political expansionism—in a word, imperialism—Fleming felt that the Cold War was a serious departure from the more cooperative policy with the Soviets that had been followed by Franklin Roosevelt during the wartime alliance. In the early 1960s, opposition to U.S. moves against the fledgling Cuban Revolution (as opposed to the virtual silence in this country as the United States toppled governments in Iran and Guatemala in the early 1950s) provided a context in which such revisionism could resonate. Williams brought out a second, expanded edition of Tragedy in 1962 and published The United States, Cuba, and Castro with the Monthly Review Press in the same year. In 1964 Gar Alperovitz wrote Atomic Diplomacy, which interpreted the decision to use the atom bomb at the end of World War II as the opening salvo in the post-war struggle against the Soviet Union.

The intellectual anti-interventionism of the early 1960s grew with opposition to the Vietnam War into a fuller critique. Writing in the revisionist tradition expanded. Williams's colleagues and students even constituted a "school" within Cold War revisionism, emphasizing the concept of an "open door" empire that had been implanted into the ideology of American leaders at least as early as the late nineteenth century. By 1968, Cold War revisionism was so successful in challenging "received doctrine" that Arthur Schlesinger, Jr., published an article saying "it's time to call a halt" to this subversive, revisionist doctrine. Meanwhile, the Fleming and Williams strands of Cold War revisionism were joined by a third in 1969 when Gabriel Kolko published The Politics of War, which opposed Fleming's interpretation by tracing U.S. hostility to the Soviets and radical nationalist movements back into the years of the wartime alliance. Kolko eschewed the Williams "open door" imperialism interpretation. He gave no credence to the rhetoric of idealism sounded by individuals like Woodrow Wilson. To Kolko such verbalizations merely represented the most cynical of manipulations and not a genuine contradiction of ideals and practices as in Williams. This approach is also taken by that meticulous foreign policy critic Noam Chomsky. (See, for example, American Power and the New Mandarins [1968] and Turning the Tide [1987].)

In 1973 Princeton University Press published an attack on Williams, Kolko, Fleming, and others for committing fraud by, for example, basing their arguments on deliberate misquotations (James Maddox, The New Left and the Origins of the Cold War [1973]). The book received a favorable front-page review in the New York Times Book Review. Despite such attacks, revisionism has continued to develop. Graduate students and even undergraduates are at least aware that there is an alternative interpretation of the role of the United States as an alleged "defender of the Free World." Writers who don't accept revisionism have to respond to it with their own writings. Scholarship in the revisionist tradition informed the movement against intervention in Central America in the 1980s.

Williams had argued that when the expansionist impulse contradicted our national commitment to self-determination, we sacrificed that alleged commitment. As congressional hearings during the 1980s indicated, pursuit of certain imperial aims in Central America caused collaboration with drug runners. Meanwhile, the Chomsky/Kolko school have seen this as evidence for their view that our nation's idealistic commitments are the rhetoric of imperial self-justification and nothing more. Cold War revisionism remains alive and well.

COLLECTING THE LEFT. The collecting of materials associated with labor history and other aspects of the American Left has grown rapidly in popularity since the 1980s. The rise in interest has been driven not only by institutions but by a loose and lively network of individual collectors who have assumed real importance in preserving and assessing the various types of ephemera—photos, broadsides, rare magazines and newspapers, sheet music, trade cards, banners, pinback buttons, ribbon-badges, and union-labeled items as well as the personal effects of notables—otherwise almost certain to be lost or misunderstood.

In past decades, many rank-and-file left-wingers kept a box of favorite buttons commemorating political candidates, demonstrations, and other causes. Photos of families and friends, and since the late 1960s a selection of posters, often filled out a personal collection. A handful of institutions, especially the Tamiment Library of New York University and the Museum of American Political Life at the University of Hartford, amassed and cataloged quantities of such materials.

During the 1980s, a transgenerational network arose through individual collecting (often at flea markets or from aged family members) and personal contacts. Growing interest in labor and working-class ephemera, from train workers' lanterns to the "union-made" brewery or cigarmakers' emblems, alerted many collectors to the widespread public curiosity about the material culture of the American Left. The excitement aroused by the 1994 auction of one large collection—that of Hartford, Connecticut, collector

Bruce Rubenstein—prompted amused commentaries in the mainstream press (including Time magazine) as well as wider interest among would-be collectors. Advertisements in the left-wing press and publicized mail auctions led to a small business for some but a hobbyist pursuit for many more.

Collecting is not amassing. A well-thought-out collection adds substance to academic and public discourse. Collections of radical Americana help both to define historical events through the eyes of participants and to bridge the gap between generations. Some collectors concentrate on the ephemera, or throwaways, such as pamphlets, broadsides, leaflets, and pinback buttons that are intended for immediate use and then discarded. Others collect more lasting (and expensive) materials such as autographed books, limited editions, manuscripts, lithographs, and other artwork. The "tireless bloodhound," as Oliver Barrett, the great collector of Lincolniana, described himself, networks, attends flea markets and estate sales, and circulates "want" lists among dealers. Materials related to the exciting personalities, underdogs, tragic and cataclysmic events, and literary and artistic achievements of the past inevitably turn up as "lucky" finds. Multiplied many times over, they offer a priceless resource to the student of the American Left.

COMMUNIST PARTY, USA. From its factionalized 1919 origins well into the 1950s, the Communist Party (CP) was the most important radical organization in America. Since that time, the Party has played a far more modest but not unimportant role within various social movements. During its most dynamic periods, the CP guided a multitude of non-Party organizations and alliances with a far greater following and more impact than the Party proper. At less auspicious times, the CP has isolated itself or, worse, expended most of its energies simply to survive government persecution. Through good and bad times, the Party has had to combat the charge that its politics simply reflect directives passed down from Moscow.

The origins of the Communist movement can be found in the left wing of the Socialist Party (SP) and in the alternative political and industrial movements that sometimes cooperated with and sometimes combated the Socialists. This radical spectrum of groups and individuals did not ultimately set Communist policies, especially after the first turbulent years, but they did provide the first wave of American Communists. Their struggles and disputes also underscore the complex native-born and immigrant roots of the new movement.

Left disaffection with the SP had two large components. By emphasizing an electoral politics, Socialists alienated members of the Industrial Workers of the World (IWW) and many other militants who believed the road to revolution lay through direct or "mass" action. The same critics generally upheld industrial unions as the primary means of organizing and preparing the masses for revolutionary activity.

In contrast to the IWW's sanguine expectations, Socialists generally held a more realistic view both of the problems to be confronted in creating mass industrial unions and of the long-run uncertainty of those unions' political commitment. But in minimizing the importance of the foreign-born, and maintaining a bureaucratic leadership drawn for the most part from the early years of the movement, the SP alienated the post-1912 influx of new members, who felt themselves less than fully welcome. The SP position regarding world war, crucial elsewhere in fostering Left and Communist dissent, was not a major factor in the United States, despite rhetorical attempts to make it so. The precipitating factor, the October Revolution and the resulting Comintern, did not so much create as bring together earlier dissent and give it the slogans for a formal split.

The Socialist Propaganda League, located in Boston with the support of the strongly pro-Lenin Latvian-American socialists, was the first to send out a call for American socialist adherence to the principles of the Bolshevik Revolution. The Friends of the Russian Revolution, or Friends of New Russia, formed at the end of 1917, and the American Bolshevik Bureau of Information formed in 1918. Both provided positive information about the Russian Revolution to the general American public. Like the first book popularizing the event, Louis Fraina's anthology The Proletarian Revolution in Russia (1918), these phenomena were American in origin rather than responses to Russian initiatives.

Although the Bolsheviks anticipated splits within the socialist movements as precursive of new communist parties, they had less direct influence in the United States than elsewhere. The course of the conflicts among the language-federation groups and those groups' largely Pyrrhic triumphs within the SP proved decisive. Furious factionalism and preparations for a split incited moderate, essentially parliamentarist-inclined Socialists to stage their own walk-out and to maneuver against a Left seizure of organizational power. Over a six-month period in 1919, a rump National Executive Committee was able to expel or suspend approximately two-thirds of the SP membership.

The left wing now quarreled over the best course to pursue. A majority favored a continuing struggle within the SP, at least until the time of the next national convention. A substantial minority, led by the large and prestigious Russian Federation, called for the immediate abandonment of the SP. Naming itself the Communist Party of America, this group immediately turned its most bitter attacks upon rival left-wingers. The other, largely English-language group remained in the SP until duly expelled at the 1919 SP convention after a notable floor-flight; it then formed the Communist Labor Party. These battling twins faced, in turn, the Palmer Raids, which (along with the mass strikes of the day, and the brief anticipation of the Russian Revolution sweeping Europe) temporarily reinforced a near-insurrectionary sentiment.

For the next three years, mostly "underground" but under the close watch of federal spies, the Communists accelerated the internecine propaganda war, largely against each other or against other Left groupings. Each of the parties sought membership in the Comintern, and each was told that Moscow would not favor one over the other and that they would have to unify. Each of the original Communist organizations suffered various schisms with departing groups often appropriating the organizational name. Efforts also continued to unite the multiplying factions into a single organization. In 1922 those who had remained in the original Communist Party of America joined with the United Communist Party (a merger of the Communist Labor Party and a faction of the Communist Party of America) to establish the Workers Party of America as a unified aboveground entity. The Workers Party of America was able to gain the adhesion of most other Communist formations within a matter of years, most notably the United Toilers of America, which had also presented itself in 1922 as an aboveground Communist party seeking unification. The new merger was named the Workers (Communist) Party, a name which prevailed until 1929 when it was changed to Communist Party, USA.

During the underground period, the Communists had lost some five-eighths of their initial Left adherents within the SP, including the vast majority of American-born and older-generation supporters. Two of the most significant segments, the Jewish and German federations, sat out most of the warfare, negotiating their entry at a late point in the process. Much of the working-class membership had in practice done the same, ignoring the internecine political excitement for the more customary Left social and cultural activities.

The emerging Workers (Communist) Party bore the stamp of a new Communist international strategy, the United Front. Conceived by the Comintern to meet the perceived delay in the world-revolutionary process, this policy entailed a strategic reorientation of major proportions. Unlike the old left-wing Socialists and the IWW, the Communists would work within non-Left, mass institutions, including the American Federation of Labor (AFL) and labor or labor-farmer parties. Many moderate socialists had long urged these policies, but with their revolutionary aims, Communists were forced to carry out their work in semiconcealed fashion. The tarring of Bolsheviks as bearded bomb-throwers had by this time been so successful, and the general defeat of the revolutionary Left so complete, that concealment of one's affiliation and ideology seemed necessary. No satisfactory theoretical articulation followed from the Communist leadership to address the complex and difficult implications of this maneuver. At a minimum, it tended to make the Communists' electoral efforts in their own name essentially propagandistic and pro forma. Communists did not seriously expect to be elected, and for that matter no longer held the socialist faith in transforming society primarily through patient, open educational efforts.

Through much of the 1920s, the Communists' own internecine warfare continued unabated, although with shifting lines of controversy. Midwestern enthusiasts of industrial unionism put most of their energies into the International Labor Defense, while mostly Eastern and predominantly Jewish veterans of the needle-trades struggles called for a more directly political-educational approach. The second group, more content in a sense with the enclave status of the Party's stubborn ethnic support, proclaimed an "American exceptionalism" based on the unique status of being the home base of the foremost capitalist power and prescribed a patient, strategic advance upon state power. This view was tolerable to the Comintern during the brief ascendancy of Bukharin, but it could not ideologically survive Stalin's wide Left turn in 1928, and seemed disproved in actuality by the stock-market crash of 1929. The Communist theoretical monthly, the Communist, a generally difficult publication, reached its apex of readability during this period but swiftly declined thereafter to wild attacks upon perceived heretics (such as literary editor V. F. Calverton) and reaffirmations of current doctrine.

The Communist factions thus engaged in organizational jousting and traded fierce polemics over the appropriate application of the Russian example to the American scene. With the dubious counsel of Comintern representatives (themselves actors in a far larger, international factionalism), American Communists struggled first of all to create a Left presence within the AFL. The Trade Union Educational League, the most successful of their efforts, indeed rallied many traditional unionists for a fighting program. The rightward retreat of the AFL, along with a number of Communist tactical blunders, ended the adventure and returned many activists back to the budding fraternal, ethnic institution-building over which the Party had little direct control. The second major effort at mass influence, the formation of a Left-oriented farmer-labor movement, failed for the same internal and external reasons, resulting in the Communists' isolation from the Progressive Party campaign of 1924 headed by "Fighting Bob" La Follette. The third and last major effort, the Trade Union Unity League (TUUL), set out to form new unions of unorganized and unskilled workers. The TUUL filled some of the vacuum left by the IWW collapse and by AFL indifference toward the unskilled. It would be remembered, in later years, for the "shop papers" published by activists with particular grievances aired—a clear anticipation of and preparation for the Congress of Industrial Organizations (CIO). On the debit side, the TUUL's presence tended to pull Left activists away from some important points of influence (such as the needle trades) without being able to build up self-sustaining organizations.

Along the way, the Party had critically reduced its ethnic base in a variety of ways. "Bolshevization"—an attempt to eradicate the Balkanization of the Party and produce a single, unified leadership—proved widely unpopular and among some groups catastrophic. The attempted breakup of language sections in favor of geographic organizations successfully discouraged for a time the insular cultural activity derided as "Banquet Socialism," and demonstrably weakened language-federation authority. But in the hostile political climate of the 1920s, public activity proved difficult and even economically hazardous to immigrant workers and their middle-class supporters. In any case, the struggle to build up ethnic radical institutions had its own dynamic within working-class life, a factor often regarded too casually by Communist leaders in these early years. In deprecating the priority of choral and theatrical groups, literary circles, clubhouses, language schools for children, and the like, Party political decisions weakened the capacity of the working-class Left to speak for, and build a lasting base within, the immediate community. Ethnic workers, for their part, often came to regard the Russian authority as unerring, but the American Communist movement as confused and misled.

Among the casualties of this cultural conflict could be counted the Italian group, mostly older men who had never entirely given up the anarcho-syndicalist faith of their younger days; and the Finns, who bolted in large numbers at the insistence upon Party control of their cooperatives' financial resources. The simultaneous emigration of Finns by the thousands to work in Soviet Karelia permanently weakened the Finnish-American Left. The Party also lost widely on several other fronts, for a variety of international reasons. Polish nationalism, detached from socialism, buried Left influence for some years to come. South Slavs, who had supported World War I for nationalist reasons, remained largely in the SP or became politically inactive. Jews, bitterly alienated in large numbers by the Party's characterization of the 1929 Palestinian riots as a liberation struggle rather than a pogrom or manipulated conflict between two oppressed peoples, fled the Party and (perhaps more important) its mass organizations in significant numbers. Even Armenians, roused to a high level of mobilization by the Turkish slaughter of homeland nationals and by the Red Army defense of Armenians, lowered levels of activity by the end of the 1920s as the Armenian crisis eased.

Relative to these major losses, the expulsions of "Left" and then "Right" deviationists was less destructive in terms of numbers or influence immediately lost. Only in the needle trades did the expelled carry many members out of the Party with them, and those were mainly a thin stratum of leaders. The long-term impact of the expulsions, however, was considerable. The actions were judged to be the result of direct Soviet interference in leadership of the American Party and reflected struggles about the direction of the Soviet Union rather than that of the United States. Those driven from the Party charged that its basic policies were now being set by the Comintern and that the Comintern reserved the right of final approval of Party leadership. These accusations reinforced popular perceptions of Communism as an inauthentic national movement.

The rightist group led by Jay Lovestone soon formed a relationship with anticommunist labor leaders and would play a major role in the continuing effort to deny Communists any role in the trade union movement. Lovestoneites became particularly influential in the post-1950s reunited AFL-CIO. The Left faction headed by James Cannon founded American Trotskyism, which presented itself as a genuine Leninist movement and a democratic alternative to the Stalinist policies of the CP. The Trotskyists provided a continuing critique of the Soviet Union that gradually won a wide intellectual following. Many of the charges brought against Stalin by the Trotskyists would be validated by future Soviet leaders, tentatively by Khrushchev in the late 1950s and more emphatically by Gorbachev in the late 1980s.

In short, Communists entered the era of the Great Depression—at approximately eighteen thousand members and with a following perhaps five times that size—considerably weaker than might have been expected from earlier levels of activity. They had made, however, several important gains. Despite much confusion and sectarian posturing, they had placed black liberation on the Left political agenda as it had not been placed before, and had taken preliminary steps to appeal to poor blacks north and south. Second, they had in their labor work increasingly encouraged the cadre whose groundwork most definitely prefigured the CIO. Third, they had regularized many internal institutions (such as the Daily Worker) and functions (such as the ethnic-based International Workers Order established in 1932) that could serve better as the Party emerged from sectarianism.

That emergence took some years and exacted considerable costs. William Z. Foster's 1932 book Towards a Soviet America demonstrated little appreciation for the unique qualities of the American mentality even in a potentially prerevolutionary situation. His presidential campaign of that year, despite the backing of noted intellectuals, had little impact relative to Norman Thomas's Socialist effort, which recorded almost a million votes. Moreover, wild sectarian attacks upon Socialists and reformers delayed or prevented potential alliances treating the worst effects of the Depression. Marches upon city halls frequently evoked more violence than a wide potential following felt itself prepared to accept. Some of the best work, rent strikes and related neighborhood relief efforts, grew up among the unprestigious women supporters of largely Jewish neighborhoods, and the lessons sunk in slowly. Veteran youth leaders, such as Gil Green, seemed to grasp most readily the need for a broad new orientation. Hundreds of young Communists entering factories strove to put their ideas into practice, but without a general Party line that would facilitate this work. Perhaps only southern Communists, offering a virtual black insurrectionary line, found a constituency whose dire condition might instill faith in Communism—and here, with repression so intense, little opportunity for open organizing existed.

The San Francisco General Strike of 1934 signaled the changing attitudes. Labor activists fought their way to rejoin a sluggish but awakening left-of-center. Permitted to move into wider spheres, with fewer ideological restrictions, activists in many arenas began to find a wide acceptance. Communist participation in the movement for social security indicated another measure of political realism. Harlem activists dared to work with controversial evangelist Father Divine on the one hand, and invite the participation of noted jazz musicians to protest events on the other. Ethnic fraternalists, now striving to reinterpret their cultural traditions in a radical way and to argue openly for the survival of these traditions, began to find new links with economic discontent and labor yearnings around them. Students of socialist, communist, and liberal leanings started to share podiums and finally united a few years later into one organization.

The Communist approach to the 1936 election set the tone for the virtual abandonment of its traditional strategies and slogans. Roosevelt's promulgation of a "Second New Deal," replete with real and promised social benefits, had won over millions of immigrant voters (or previous nonvoters), including the mass base of industrial unions. As veteran SP notables abandoned their party to support Roosevelt, Communists pronounced a de facto support of Roosevelt against Alf Landon—the first time an official U.S. Marxist organization had taken such a position. In a broader sense, the Communists had gone over to a Center-Left alliance with measured emphasis upon the Left.

Shifts in the Communist press reflected this broad reorientation. The New Masses became a popular magazine among the left-liberal middle classes, especially in the East, and the Daily Worker toned down its earlier sensationalism for a more workmanlike approach to creating a solid Left journalism. The Communist, however, revealed the most dramatic shift. Long an arid mechanism of doctrinal self-justification, in the hands of political-intellectual chief Alexander Bittelman the monthly became notably more strategic and tactical-minded. His own editorial essay, considered at the time the definitive up-to-the-moment political statement from the Party, shrewdly argued for something like an advanced social democracy.

At the climax of this reorientation, during the later 1930s, the Party reached sixty-five thousand members and attained a very wide following in many sections of American life. Providing national, regional, and local leadership of many important industrial unions as well as liberal, student, and cultural organizations, Communists and "fellow travelers" served as a dynamic wedge of radicalism within the dominant New Deal liberalism. Left activists had, in an important sense, followed the inclinations of their own constituencies toward Roosevelt. For the moment, this strategic adaptation largely coincided with imperatives set out by the Comintern.

Influence in labor, especially, grew rapidly after John L. Lewis agreed to use Communist organizers in the nascent CIO. Communist leaders, rising out of the ranks, won wide approval through their fearlessness and their dedication. Communists in New York State's American Labor Party (which repeatedly sent the radical Vito Marcantonio to Congress), in Minnesota's Farmer-Labor Party, and in the progressive wing of the Democratic Party, came to be looked upon as agents not of Moscow but of the democratic agenda. Influential Communists could be found in cinema, the theater, music, and the graphic arts. The vital social theater and mural art of the Works Progress Administration, especially, were at their highest creative levels often quite pro-Communist in sympathies. Communist identification of racism as the running sore of democracy and the mark of incipient fascism, combined with Communists' ardent efforts to uplift the cause of minorities both politically and culturally, prompted liberal respect almost bordering upon awe.

Communist efforts in international affairs had more mixed results. The Spanish Civil War became a liberal cause célèbre, and its fallen heroes the martyrs of a generation—even if millions of unquestioning American Catholics did not think so. For many East European immigrants, anti-Nazi Russia with all its flaws seemed vastly preferable to its alternative—such as the collaborationist regimes in Hungary, Yugoslavia, Lithuania, and other nations. Liberals, dismayed by the lack of resistance against fascism from democracies like France and Great Britain, were likewise willing to forgive Soviet shortcomings. Jewish support for the Communist movement rose precipitously.

On the other hand, the public portrayals of Russia as a virtual paradise for workers and peasants required great credulity, even in the best of times, and the later 1930s were far from the best of times. Stalin's purges of the "Old Bolsheviks" through the Moscow Trials required ideological overkill from American Communists, which baffled and pained their liberal allies. The unquestioning acceptance of such positions by ordinary Communists raised serious questions for nonmembers. The undemocratic character of American Communism's inner organizational life did not greatly exceed that of the Republican or Democratic parties, but the perceived gap between deed and word expanded just as Communists staked their claim upon being the tribunes of democracy.

The Hitler-Stalin Pact and the turn of Communists to extreme anti-war positions permitted conservatives their long-awaited opportunity at legal repression. The pact might have been defended as a forced necessity, but Communists mercilessly attacked those who held to the anti-Hitler front, alienating themselves from the very groups with whom they had been most intimate. Loss of Party membership was slight, but sympathizers were stunned at the sudden shift in directions, broadly rekindling old fears of American Communism as a Soviet pawn. Opponents of the Party within the CIO and liberal circles took advantage of the opportunity to puncture Communist moral authority. Congressional committees played upon public fears to savage the most left-leaning New Deal programs. Party leader Earl Browder went to jail on a passport violation, reminding Communist regulars that their gains in American life had never been secure. Roosevelt's new "Doctor Win-the-War" strategy signaled the virtual collapse of the liberal agenda, but Communists had long since come to the point of no return. To remove themselves from the Democratic Party coalition meant isolation.

Following the German invasion of the Soviet Union, the Communists again switched their line to unrelenting opposition to the Nazis. Under the Democratic Front policy the Party worked with all other democratic forces to rally new levels of popular support for Soviet-American cooperation. Party membership would hit its all-time peak of eighty-five thousand in 1942. If there was a moment when the Communists might have totally surfaced all their members in the trade union movement and other organizations, this was it. Earl Browder, in fact, attempted to tailor his organization to American conditions by formally abandoning the designation of "party" for the Communist Political Association, which indicated the organization would now function as a political pressure group.

The Communist influence in certain regions became considerable in the 1940s. In New York City neighborhoods where housing struggles continued to be popular and where Communists offered the only thoroughgoing perspective for the creation of a multiracial and multicultural democracy, Communist candidates were elected to municipal offices. Moreover, major social-political figures considered close to the Party, notably Harlem's Rev. Adam Clayton Powell, exerted even wider influence. Simultaneously, and for the first time, Communist spokespersons, such as Elizabeth Gurley Flynn in her Daily Worker column, began to argue for a forceful advancement of women's rights, not merely protective legislation or special consideration as women workers. In such matters, especially in relation to liberal organizations of many types, subtle shifts from proletarian to lower-middle-class orientations served the Party well.

Despite the obvious strengths of the Communist movement, there were numerous handicaps. The frequent zigzagging in political line, with equal ferocity brought to instantly changing positions, had sapped its intellectual credibility. The near-fanatical attachment to wartime national unity seemed all too characteristic of past adaptations. Across a wide spectrum of efforts, the Party paid a heavy price, as such Popular Front organizations as El Congreso del Pueblo de Habla Española (the Congress of Spanish-Speaking Peoples) that had been created under difficult conditions were now suddenly abandoned or dissolved. In like manner, Communist insistence upon the no-strike pledge in war industries and other curbs on militancy, while not universally applied, nevertheless created hostility among some of the most militant industrial workers. Support of the Smith Act usage against Trotskyists and support of the confinement of Japanese Americans raised serious doubts about Communist commitments to civil liberties.

The Party also had an unrepresentative geographic spread, being concentrated mainly in a few urban areas, particularly New York. Communist membership on the New York City Council and a factory base not unlike modest-size European Communist parties were totally unrepresentative of national Communist strength. A majority of the Party was female and worked from neighborhood rather than factory bases. Many male Communists who joined the armed forces would return from war greatly changed and in many instances would be propelled from the working class by benefits offered in the GI Bill.

By the time the war drew to a close, the Communist accommodation to the liberal and labor establishment swelled to a crescendo without, however, winning over or neutralizing stubborn opponents who awaited an opportunity to isolate the Party. The emerging Cold War soon placed Communists at an enormous disadvantage. The problem was compounded when Browder was removed as leader of the Party after Russian disfavor was signaled via a critical letter issued by the head of the French CP. Considerable internal confusion ensued and Americans already skeptical of CP independence saw Browder's fall as another sign of the Party's domination by a foreign power.

The Party, now gravely weakened, reestablished its form in 1945, but its leadership was in disarray. Organizational feuding resulted in numerous individual expulsions and in collective cynicism among many longtime supporters. Left ethnics faced a considerable influx of new, largely middle-class, and in some cases, formerly collaborationist refugees bitterly hostile to Communism. They, as Communists in general, also faced the hard reality of oppressive Russian rule in Eastern Europe and growing perceptions about the long-term prospects for Stalinist restrictions on rights and liberties. Rapid reorientation of the Left under these conditions became almost impossible.

The first hints of a cohesive anticommunist campaign—from Cold War liberals and social democrats to far Right organizations to government agencies—offered disturbing glimpses of the future in store. The Union for Democratic Action, predecessor of the Americans for Democratic Action, announced Communist exclusion as one of its main tenets. The more conservative CIO and AFL leaders began to pinpoint Communist centers of influence to be eliminated, and to buttress significant labor support (the Association of Catholic Trade Unionists offered a semimass base, while liberals such as the Reuther brothers supplied organizational muscle) behind a drive to marginalize the Party faithful.

In response, the Party led a spirited anti-Cold War effort across many sectors. Among liberals who hoped for postwar détente between America and Russia, the Progressive Citizens of America used celebrities such as Frank Sinatra and a compulsive mobilization of well-placed activists to fight the lure of President Truman's mix of domestic reforms and international aggressiveness. The American Veterans Committee, farm groups, race leaders, and others rallied opponents of American leaders' de facto plan to dominate the postwar world through economic power and atomic weapons.

The Party threw itself desperately into the Henry Wallace campaign of 1948, and suffered dire consequences both before and after Wallace's ignominious defeat. By pressuring friendly union leaders to support Wallace at a time when the CIO had shifted rightward on foreign policy and was simultaneously cracking down bureaucratically on its own rebellious ranks, the Party propelled some of its former stalwarts and their unions out of the Left orbit. Individuals who accepted CP positions faced expulsion from the CIO in 1949, either from their office or with their entire unions. With ever fewer institutional defenses to support liberal and labor activists, the Red Scare tactics of government and business found ready prey. Thousands of activists, members and former members of the CP or Left-linked movements, were grilled by agents of the Federal Bureau of Investigation (FBI), their family and fellow workers intimidated, mail and phone service intercepted, and (especially for those in conservative districts) a public outcry incited against them by the active Right.

Desertions accelerated on all sides. For instance, while the Party shifted away from support of third parties after the Wallace defeat, many "progressives" such as those grouped around the National Guardian asserted their independence, taking up causes such as Vito Marcantonio's last congressional campaign, which was viewed askance by the Party. For such people, the Communists had ceased to be the center-point of progressive politics, not only because of the Party insistence upon unquestioning loyalty to Soviet pronouncements, but also because Communists could no longer deliver organizational muscle.

The anticommunist movement that had been building since the 1940s thus fell upon the Party at its weakest moment. With most leaders and celebrities already gone, investigators could pick off remaining supporters through a combination of jail threats and deprivation of public access. Communist opposition to the Korean War impelled wide fears about a coming world conflict, with American Communists as a "Fifth Column" subverting defense efforts. Newspaper tabloids whipped up a frenzy, with headlines like FBI TO STRIKE AT 20,000 REDS, identifying Communists with potential military subversion. The Hiss case, the Rosenberg case, and a host of others were orchestrated—with careful preparation by the FBI, often in the form of prompting witnesses with pat answers—to demonstrate that America had "lost" China and the A-bomb secrets owing to Communist infiltration of government. Meanwhile, fishing-expedition hearings essentially demanded of witnesses that they repudiate their past Left activities, and furthermore give testimony against their trusted friends and co-workers of many years.

Two sectors suffered especially from these varied forms of repression. The fraternal International Workers Order, a financial backbone of the Party and a symbol of Communist respectability among aging European immigrants and many of their descendants, was quashed. Communists lost contact with several generations of working-class activists who, without joining, had taken Party teachings and local representatives seriously. Fraternal and folk-dance groups, summer-camps, shuls, choruses, and other activities remained, but far smaller and more insular. Second, the youth sector, reorganized in 1949 as the Labor Youth League, practically had to operate underground. The Party lost, in effect, virtually an entire generation that might have bridged the gap to the New Left.

Political opportunities to advance the Left-liberal program therefore fell by the wayside. Urgently needed contemporary reform projects—such as the National Negro Labor Congress, established with wide black support to further racial equality within the labor movement—attracted only hostility from liberal-minded non-Communists. Remaining local activists worked on their own at any rate, as the foremost Party leaders had gone underground, and (preparing for the worst by reducing Party membership to hardened cadres) the organization dropped many faithful members who had merely neglected their membership renewals.

Two international events of 1956 brought new chaos to the Party: the Soviet suppression of the Hungarian Revolution and the revelations of Stalin's horrendous misdeeds at the Twentieth Soviet Congress. Individuals long faithful to the Party now felt betrayed and wondered privately and openly if their political lives had been built upon self-delusion.

Self-appointed reformers centered around the Daily Worker briefly sought an internal transformation into an open, democratic movement. An unprecedented wave of collective self-criticism appeared in the pages of the Party's national organ. The departure of many like-minded members, filled with despair or disgust, contributed to their defeat by doctrinaire loyalists. With the victors stood a considerable section of the ethnic faithful, many of whom had personally experienced the Palmer era repressions and now refused to be cowed by or to accept the various revelations as sufficient cause to leave the movement. Their now increasingly prominent presence, in a smaller organization, revealed a new demographic reality: the Party had been aging. This process was not as abrupt as it seemed. Recruitment of young people had peaked in the 1930s. That tendency would now become a dominant trend.

Greatly weakened as the Party ranks were, they still included many extraordinary individuals, and within the Party's surviving peripheries were many more. Ironically, the Party's weakness made for better work in alliances. Party activists rarely felt the necessity, much less the opportunity, to impose their positions on non-Communists. Some of their opponents in mass movements had also grown weary of ideological and organizational struggle, frequently having moved upward to bureaucratic office or occasionally recognizing the harm done to labor and reform movements by the old internecine squabbling. Anti-Stalinism lacked left-wing credentials in a society whose obsessive anticommunism had become a primary public rationale for the arms industry, persistent racial segregation, and the unhampered political activity of operatives of the FBI and the Central Intelligence Agency. All this did not mean that future fellow activists with Communists accepted the persistently claimed virtues of the Communist-led nations, only that the issue had been put aside as less pressing than matters at hand.

As the Cold War eased, and Third World liberation struggles replaced great power face-offs as the immediate focus of foreign policy, Communists began to reemerge. Communists played a key role in the new Africa-support movement, in many cases educating church people to the real effects of neocolonialism and helping to establish liaisons between liberals and the newly independent states. CP supporters, meanwhile, continued their longtime pioneering work in the South, quietly establishing themselves within the new civil rights movement, although never becoming the dominant or manipulative force that conservatives imagined. Freedomways magazine, established with Party assistance, had an authoritative quality among many, especially older, black activists. Comparable political work was accomplished in northern industrial areas with minority populations and militant trade unions. The Party retained pockets of labor strength, especially among officials and older rank-and-filers among the West Coast longshoremen, but also in other scattered industries and locations. The ethnic networks, however reduced, continued to maintain a sufficient following for a dozen weekly presses and a variety of other activities.

When a renewed radical movement took shape in the 1960s, the CP—for the first time in its existence—was not the dominant force on the Left. In major cities, the CP network of trade union contacts—seasoned veterans of Left-liberal coalitions and ethnic activists—could be counted upon to form broad alliances against war and racism, but there were other radical formations of equal or greater strength. Frequently, Party commitment to work within the Democratic Party and the broad liberal spectrum put local Communists at a disadvantage within the embryonic New Left. In 1964 nearly all activists could agree upon the defeat of Barry Goldwater as a pressing priority. Thereafter, the role of the Democratic Party mainstream gave the arguments for liberal coalitions more obvious contradictions. Communist political sniping at New Leftists, while never reaching the orchestrated heights of 1930s–1940s anti-Trotskyism, precipitated an uncomfortable generation gap between many veteran militants and their own children or grandchildren, a conflict that New Leftists' own youthful arrogance personalized and exacerbated.

As a result, while Communists took a leading role in some specific fronts of the anti-Vietnam War movement, pacifists and Trotskyists ultimately staffed most of the movement's infrastructure. The new W. E. B. Du Bois Clubs (organized in 1965) renewed campus activism but with far fewer members than Students for a Democratic Society and fewer chapters than the Young Socialist Alliance. Successful CP mechanisms among youth, such as the Che-Lumumba Club of Los Angeles, tended to be local in nature and dependent upon particularly accommodating CP leaders. One strong point, the Party's fraternal links with revolutionary movements in Vietnam, Mozambique, South Africa, Cuba, and elsewhere in the Third World, gave the Party its highest contemporary prestige and influence, without however prompting any wide-scale recruitment even among Third World support activists.

The Communists had few contacts with the emerging sexual liberation movements, notwithstanding the past Party membership of the Mattachine Society founders and past Popular Front links with some senior women's liberation figures such as Bella Abzug. While some parts of the now "Old Left" would rally to the gay movement as it emerged, the CP remained aloof. Likewise, while the CP had long supported women's rights as part of the progressive agenda, it was not prepared for an autonomous feminist movement that appeared to replace class with gender as the primary contradiction. Like the painfully antifeminist perspectives of some black liberation leaders, Communist fears of black women not supporting black men's activities betrayed a lack of fundamental commitment to gender issues. Communists could not place themselves on record for so mild a measure as the Equal Rights Amendment, and therefore benefited little from the women's liberation movement with all its ramifications.

Little improvement could be seen with the collapse of the New Left. Trotskyists and, especially, Maoists rather than Communists recruited most of the New Left activists turning toward Leninism in the late 1960s and early 1970s. Intense factionalism and disillusionment with the Chinese regimes soon destroyed hopes for a "new communist party" with the strength of the old CP, but relatively few younger activists on campus (many now notably influenced by religious ideas) or in communities turned to the Party for leadership. Continuing uncritical support for the Soviet Union, especially in the face of Eastern European dissent and occasional uprising, sustained the anxieties of the middle 1950s and provoked further internal discontent. The resignation of West Coast leader Dorothy Healey in 1973 was taken as a signal to many outsiders that the established Party leadership had determined to remain impervious to the democratic challenges heard in Eurocommunism.

Nevertheless, American Communism had over the decades acquired an invaluable asset upon which it would now draw freely. The most historical-minded generation in the American Left, graduating from campus and community activism, collaborated with Party stalwarts and sympathizers as well as non-Communist radicals in celebrating American traditions of militancy. A wave of documentary films, written histories, memoirs, and public events, some widely acclaimed and even government-funded, commenced in the middle 1970s. At the local level, high officials turned out for prestige banquets to sanctify and vindicate the lives of elderly Communists. Over the objections of many critics, and despite the virtual end of controversial public funding in the Reagan era, American Communism became a recognized and even respected part of American reform history.

Communists also gained from long-standing political contacts in the black community. Victories of black mayoral and congressional candidates with decades-old ties to the CP—a short list would include Coleman Young and George Crocket in Detroit, Gus Newport in Berkeley, and somewhat more ambiguously, Harold Washington in Chicago—helped to rehabilitate the Party image. Like the continuing struggle against racism within unions, this public vindication brought a trickle of new black and Latin members, although never enough to compensate for the attrition in the aging fraternal networks.

The CP managed to emerge from the early 1970s in far better organizational shape than might have been expected. While the Trotskyist and Maoists groups splintered or otherwise failed to hold on to post-New Left members, the CP experienced the return of some former members and modest recruitment among African Americans and Chicanos. Like the Democratic Socialists of America, the CP had a network of union members, officials, and sympathizers, and it was the only organization to maintain a daily newspaper, partly on the strength of library subscriptions in the Soviet Union and its bloc. In 1988, however, the People's Daily World was forced by falling revenue and readership to become the People's Weekly World.

Communists were no longer central to international movements opposing apartheid in South Africa or supporting the Sandinista movement in Nicaragua, but they placed themselves within significant coalitions. CP influence was predominant among Chilean exiles and their supporters, and the CP had a significant influence, shared with Christian radicals, on pro-Salvadorean movements. Unlike the era of the Spanish Civil War, however, Communists could not make large gains of their own on these issues. The eventual eclipse of the era of guerrilla wars and the electoral defeat of the Sandinistas marked the end of another era of support of foreign liberation movements.

The rigid leadership of Gus Hall weighed heavily against recuperation as did the significant aging of the active membership. The emergence of Mikhail Gorbachev in 1985 as leader of the Soviet Union placed American Communists in an unexpected spotlight, but Hall became a critic of Gorbachev's reforms. At the time of the attempted coup against Yeltsin and Gorbachev, Hall issued a private message of support to the leaders of the coup. This proved the last straw for many dissidents in the CP who set out to challenge his leadership.

The Communist national convention that took place in Cleveland in October 1989 saw Hall outmaneuver an apparent voting majority seeking drastic democratic reform of the CP. Hall's tactics precipitated the most significant split in a quarter of a century. Along with many of the most active new members went past heroes and high party officials, including Gil Green, Herbert Aptheker, Angela Davis, and Charlene Mitchell. Further darkening the picture were lawsuits involving the ownership rights to funds and property left to the CP by deceased members.

Unlike dissidents of 1956–1957, the dissidents of 1989–1992 were determined to launch a new political organization that embraced many of the Popular Front traditions. In July of 1994 the founding convention of the Committees of Correspondence took place in Chicago with 388 delegates representing 1,500 paid members and 132 observers. Despite the recruitment of some notable radicals such as Manning Marable, the Committees experienced great difficulty gaining momentum.

At century's end, the Communist tradition in America appeared to be in its final phase, but its ultimate fate remained uncertain. Although taking in few new recruits or returned members and bereft of any support from abroad, the CP managed to maintain its weekly paper through the efforts of skilled journalists, determined local distribution (mostly by affable senior citizens), and hearty death bequests. The CP also remained active in a number of labor-related support organizations and some local Democratic campaigns. The Communist historical legacy remained a matter of fierce intellectual debate. While detractors emphasized the unhealthy aspects of the Soviet connection, other historians focused on the positive achievements of the Popular Front period and the CP's unique contributions to civil rights movements. The CP continued to maintain bookstores, schools, and other activities, waiting for a new surge of radicalism to replenish its aging ranks.

COMMUNIST WORKERS PARTY. See Greensboro Massacre.

COMPOSERS COLLECTIVE. Between 1933 and 1936, the Composers Collective brought together in

New York a dozen or more conservatory-trained composers to create a body of music for use as a weapon in the class struggle. Originally an offshoot of the Pierre Degeyter Club, named for the composer of the "Internationale" (1871), the collective was affiliated to the Workers Music League, which published music and coordinated the activities of proletarian choruses, mandolin orchestras, and other groups.

The tradition of revolutionary music in America consisted largely of lyricists, like Joe Hill, writing new words to old hymns and popular melodies. With his hour-long cantatas October and Storm, Jacob Schaefer was one of the few who wrote original music for left-wing audiences. But in the 1930s, when mass organizations of the Left arose in response to Depression conditions, sympathetic musicians wanted to contribute their skills to the cause. Some of the Composers Collective members, comfortable with brasher twentieth-century harmonies and even atonalism, followed European models such as Hanns Eisler, Stefan Wolpe, and Dmitri Shostakovich in trying to amalgamate modern musical idioms with proletarian texts. In form, their work consisted of rounds, mass songs, four-part choruses, and solo songs; some of these composers found a large new public at demonstrations, picket lines, and benefit concerts. The Composers Collective sent out "shock troops" with programs of varying length and content to support the Left movement.

Aside from Schaefer, other members of the Composers Collective included Lan Adomian, Charles Seeger, Elie Siegmeister, Norman Cazden, Alex North, Herbert Haufrecht, Henry Leland Clarke, and Earl Robinson. Marc Blitzstein served as secretary. Hanns Eisler and Aaron Copland attended occasional meetings. For subject matter, they turned to themes such as the Scottsboro Boys, Lenin, strikes, proletarian internationalism, unemployment, and satires of the bourgeoisie. For texts they took poems by such writers as Langston Hughes, Alfred Hayes, and the Communist Party's chief cultural authority, V. J. Jerome. In 1934 and 1935 the collective issued two volumes of the Workers Songbook. Collective members also wrote instrumental music with social content, such as Siegmeister's symphonic movement May Day.

In 1935-1936 the Communist Party shifted its strategy to the Popular Front. In this more populist phase, almost all of the collective members retracted from their international beaux-arts style and began turning toward native American folk music for their inspiration. Shortly thereafter, they went their separate ways and the collective fizzled out. None of the sophisticated, crafted music of the Composers Collective period, with its supermilitant texts, ever truly took root in the working class. But the collective was an important proving ground for its members, leading to such major statements in music as Blitzstein's The Cradle Will Rock and Robinson's Ballad for Americans, and to the ideas in Siegmeister's essay "Music and Society" (1938).

CONGRESO DEL PUEBLO DE HABLA ESPAÑOLA. The exact details of the origins of El Congreso del Pueblo de Habla Española (the Congress of Spanish-Speaking Peoples) are obscure, but the initial and main organizer was Luisa Moreno. Born in Guatemala, Moreno emigrated first to Mexico and then to the United States in 1928. Moreno was educated in the United States and graduated from the College of the Holy Names in Oakland, California. In a 1976 interview with Albert Camarillo, Moreno noted that she had worked as a seamstress in a New York City garment factory near Spanish Harlem. Sweatshop conditions plus association with leftist Latino workers led to her radicalization. Moreno first worked as an organizer for the Needle Trades Workers Industrial Union in the early 1930s and then with the American Federation of Labor organizing Florida cigar workers. Moreno joined the Congress of Industrial Organizations (CIO) in 1937. She helped organize striking Mexican pecan shellers in San Antonio as an organizer for the militant United Cannery, Agricultural, Packing and Allied Workers of America. Living and working with Spanish-speaking people, Moreno recognized the need for a mass organization of the Spanish-speaking in the United States.

In 1938 Moreno traveled throughout the Southwest as well as to other parts of the country organizing Committees for a National Congress of Spanish-Speaking Peoples (Comités en Pro del Congreso). She received support from a variety of sources: Mexican-American community groups, CIO unions, and progressive whites. The founding national convention of El Congreso took place in Los Angeles on 28–30 April 1939 with an estimated fifteen hundred people in attendance. While the exact role of the Communist Party in the establishment of El Congreso is not clear, the congress largely reflected a Popular Front strategy linking radical and liberal elements in the Mexican communities on a range of issues affecting Mexicans in the United States. It stressed the unity between Mexican American workers and Mexican immigrant workers. Besides their common working-class roots, Mexicans were further united by history, culture, and oppressed conditions. Instead of regarding Mexicans in the Southwest as constituting a nation, El Congreso viewed Mexicans as a national minority that possessed inextricable ties with the rest of the American working class.

Between 1939 and the commencement of World War II, El Congreso engaged in a number of activities, principally in the greater Los Angeles area, aimed at protecting the rights of the Spanish-speaking as well as providing effective organization. These included relief assistance; protesting anti-alien legislation, police abuse, and the lack of low-cost housing; education; youth activities; the right to unionization; the rights of women; the neutrality movement; and wartime employment for Mexicans.

During its existence, El Congreso was led by its executive secretary, Josefina Fierro de Bright. At age eighteen Fierro became the main organizer and fundraiser for El Congreso. Born in 1920, in Mexicali, Fierro had fled the Mexican Revolution of 1910 with her parents. Her mother had been a follower of Ricardo Flores Magón, who represented the anarcho-syndicalist faction of the revolution. Politicized by her mother, Fierro later married the Hollywood screenwriter John Bright, who, according to Nancy Lynn Schwartz in The Hollywood Writers' Wars, was an early member of the Hollywood branch of the Communist Party.

Although portrayed as a national organization, El Congreso consisted primarily of the California organization headquartered in Los Angeles. At least twelve branches of El Congreso functioned. These included branches in Central Los Angeles, East Los Angeles, Watts, Lincoln Heights, San Pedro, San Fernando, Wilmington, and Anaheim. Additional branches operated in Sacramento, Shafter, San Francisco, and San Diego. It is difficult to determine the exact number of members affiliated with each branch; however, one branch reported a membership of two hundred in 1940.

El Congreso's shift from workers' struggles to wartime unity led to its demise. Militant reformism during the war, it was believed by Popular Front groups, would only play into the fascists' hands. By the middle of 1942, El Congreso effectively ceased to function. Still, activists such as Fierro did not remain silent when particular cases of social discrimination surfaced. Fierro helped organize the Sleepy Lagoon Defense Committee in 1942 to defend several young Mexican Americans who were unjustly accused of murder. During the "zoot-suit riots" in Los Angeles the following year, Fierro personally flew to Washington to appeal to Vice President Henry Wallace to help put a stop to the attacks started by servicemen against young Mexican Americans.

Following World War II and the commencement of McCarthyism, El Congreso leaders such as Moreno and Fierro suffered political harassment and persecution. Luisa Moreno exiled herself to Mexico. Josefina Fierro de Bright, who had never become a U.S. citizen, left the United States for Mexico because she did not want to remain, face arrest, and possibly incriminate friends if subpoenaed.

CONGRESS OF AMERICAN WOMEN.

The short-lived organization known as the Congress of American Women (CAW) was founded in 1946 as the U.S. branch of the Women's International Democratic Federation (WIDF), a postwar antifascist alliance of eighty-one million women in forty-one countries dedicated to women's equality, security and opportunity for children, and peace for all. The founders and leaders of CAW were a group of prominent American women, black and white, of left-liberal to Communist political orientations. Among them were Cornelia Bryce Pinchot, a suffrage leader and wife of a former governor of Pennsylvania; the aviator Jacqueline Cochran, a director of Eastern Airlines; Communist Party leaders Elizabeth Gurley Flynn and Claudia Jones; the actress Faye Emerson Roosevelt; anthropologist Gene Weltfish, author with Ruth Benedict of The Races of Man; black leaders Dr. Charlotte Hawkins Brown, Thelma Dale, and Vivian Carter Mason; and Muriel Draper, chairperson of the women's division of the Soviet-American Friendship Council.

In 1949 CAW claimed 250,000 members and branches in the major industrial cities. On the grass-roots level, in neighborhood clubs, CAW organized black and white women around civil rights issues, against lynching, for lowering the cost of living, and against the Taft-Hartley Act. More than any feminist organizations before or since, CAW incorporated black women in its leadership and made racial equality an important plank in its program. The foreign-policy platform of CAW, like other American Popular Front organizations of its time, was dedicated to the fight against fascism, friendship with the Soviet Union, and international peace. What was distinct about CAW, however, what that in its program, rhetoric, and tactics, it combined a simultaneous demand for women's rights, world peace, and economic and social justice at home.

CAW supported the principle of equal pay for equal work, called for free public child-care centers, low-cost carry-home dinners and low-cost in-plant feeding for industrial workers, and large-scale kitchens and dining halls in every public housing project. The CAW Commission on the Status of Women supported an Equal Rights Amendment, but not in the form proposed by the National Women's Party, charging that it would wipe out protective legislation "built up over the past fifty years." With a sense of women's history rare for its time, the preamble to the CAW constitution invoked the memory of such historic women as Anne Hutchinson, Harriet Tubman, Sojourner Truth, Lucretia Mott, Harriet Beecher Stowe, Susan B. Anthony, Elizabeth Cady Stanton, and the Lowell mill girls. A CAW pamphlet proclaimed, "In the past the fight for women's rights was part of the fight against slavery and economic exploitation; today it is also part of the fight for peace and security everywhere."

As the Cold War escalated, the issue of world peace became the central focus of CAW. Its active opposition to the Truman Doctrine and the Marshall Plan and the frequent visits by its leading members to WIDF conferences in Communist countries provoked an investigation by the House Committee on Un-American Activities (HUAC). Ironically HUAC singled out for attack Susan B. Anthony II and Nora Stanton Barney, granddaughter of Elizabeth Cady Stanton, who were both active members, and charged CAW with exploiting the legitimate women's rights movement for Communist gain. "There is even an Elizabeth Cady Stanton branch of CAW in the Bronx," HUAC complained in its report. CAW withstood the HUAC attack, but it could not survive the 1950 order by the Justice Department to register its officers and its board as foreign agents. At that point CAW voted, reluctantly, to sever its ties to WIDF. But there was no way of continuing the organization without a legal battle, which the officers and the Communist Party decided would be too expensive, too draining, and probably futile in the political climate of the day. In late 1950 CAW voted to disband, and with it went the connection between the suffrage generation, the Old Left, and women's peace activism.

CONNOLLY, JAMES (1868–1916). Irish Left-socialist with an international impact, James Connolly ended a life of industrial and political struggle in an act of violent revolution. A leader of Ireland's Easter Rebellion, he was captured by British troops, later taken from a hospital bed, propped up in a chair, and shot.

Already a figure in the Irish nationalist and socialist movements, Connolly emigrated to the United States in 1902 and immediately began touring for the Socialist Labor Party (SLP). An outsider to the conservative Catholic leadership of most Irish American communities, he proclaimed a message of industrial unionism, women's rights, and Irish consciousness. Most Irish American workers, steeped in parochialism and racial values, could not accept his vision of socialism. Yet he was a widely admired figure for his personal courage and moral vision.

He found too little common ground with most of the U.S. Left. The SLP—and its leader, Daniel DeLeon, in particular—could barely tolerate his nonreductive view of nationality, his spiritual predilections, and above all his opposition to divorce. Not inside or outside the SLP did Connolly find sufficient support for his small, short-lived newspaper, the Harp, the sole Irish-American socialist publication of the time. After 1906 he turned his attention to the Industrial Workers of the World, in 1910 becoming editor of the New Castle Free Press, a Wobbly-oriented newspaper published in the heart of the area dominated by the Steel Trust.

Thereafter, he considered his American sojourn “a mistake” and said he “never ceased to regret it.” Perhaps most difficult to him, beyond penury and political problems on the Left, was the general indifference of Irish American nationalists to class exploitation and to the suffering of the poor. He returned home to become a beloved (and hated) figure in Ireland and England, of increasingly mythic proportions after his martyr's death.

CONROY, JACK (1898–1990). A premier mid-western novelist, editor, and folklorist, Jack Conroy was connected with the region from the time of his birth in the Monkey Nest coal camp on the outskirts of Moberly, Missouri. His Irish immigrant father, who had studied for the priesthood, died in a mining accident when Conroy was quite young, as did a brother and two half-brothers. In his teens, Conroy started work as an apprentice carman in the Wabash Railroad shops in Moberly and served as recording secretary for his union local. After joining the great strike of 1922, Conroy found himself blacklisted from any further railroad employment. He spent much of the 1920s as a migratory worker, sometimes riding the rails with Wobblies. His main source of education was the famous “Little Blue Books” of E. Haldeman-Julius.

After writing some poetry and deciding it was not his genre, Conroy joined with Ralph Cheney in establishing the Rebel Poet group and magazine in 1928. This magazine proclaimed “The Internationale of Song,” and it established Conroy as the center of an energetic, talented, and discontented group of writers and artists, including H. H. Lewis, "Plowboy Poet of the Gumbo" (Conroy himself later became known, in Populist fashion, as the "Sage of Moberly"). During this period, Conroy coedited militant anthologies entitled Unrest, 1929–1931. After differing with Cheney, Conroy began a new magazine called the Anvil (1933–1935), a parallel experiment to the John Reed Clubs. The Anvil's motto was We Prefer Crude Vigor to Polished Banality, and it attracted both readers and contributors from a widespread working-class audience. Its authors included Richard Wright, Kenneth Patchen, and Meridel Le Sueur. Communist Party support made possible a circulation of some five thousand.

Meanwhile, Conroy's stories and sketches of working-class life had caught the eye of H. L. Mencken, who published several of them in his American Mercury. With Mencken's encouragement, Conroy drew these together for his best-known work, The Disinherited (1933), a novel. Widely praised as a broad-ranging chronicle of a young worker's exposure to life in rural and mining villages in the context of deepening economic and social crises, The Disinherited was one of the most authentic and important "proletarian" novels of the age.

Conroy successively worked on the staff of the Federal Writers Project, where he became the center of a rowdy, dissident group of midwestern bohemians called the "Parallel Centrists," gave an address at the American Writers Congress in 1935, and left Missouri for Chicago. In the meantime, he had been pressured by Communist cultural functionaries to relinquish control of the Anvil to a group of New York editors and writers around Philip Rahv and William Phillips, who excluded Conroy and soon transformed the project into a modernist-Trotskyist magazine, the Partisan Review. In Chicago, Conroy joined Nelson Algren in publishing the New Anvil (1939–1940), which continued the earlier project of publishing working-class writers, this time including Frank Yerby, Margaret Walker, Tom McGrath, and Karl Shapiro. He also collected stories of industrial folklore (some of which appeared in B. A. Botkin's Treasury of American Folklore) and befriended Arna Bontemps, with whom he wrote an account of the rural-to-urban migration of black Americans, They Seek a City (1945).

In order to support his family, Conroy became the literary editor of an encyclopedia in Chicago for two decades, returning home to Moberly in 1966. He continued to play an important role encouraging younger writers, during a career in which by his own account he "must have written a million letters." In 1984 Moberly honored her "Sage" with a day of celebrations and discussions.

COPLAND, AARON (1900–1990). Composer and self-styled "good citizen of the Republic of Music," Aaron Copland devoted his talent as both composer and musical commentator to the cause of political music in the mid-1930s. He spent a comfortable childhood in Brooklyn that included piano study at an early age. By 1917 he had begun to define his personal sensibility as a modernist in response to the more traditional aesthetic of his teacher, Rubin Goldmark. Between 1920 and 1924, Copland studied with Nadia Boulanger at the American Academy at Fontainebleau. The years after his return from Paris saw the flowering of Copland's talent as an advocate for modern American music. He was a member of the League of Composers and a major contributor to Modern Music. A founder (with composer Roger Sessions) of the Copland-Sessions Concerts, he helped to bring new music to New York, and he lectured on music at the New School for Social Research from 1927 to 1937. In the late 1920s, Copland was among a group of American modernist composers who incorporated the sounds and technical features of jazz into his works for the concert hall. In the mid-1930s, he was associated with left-wing musical activists as a participant in the Composers Collective and a writer for New Masses. He asserted the importance of mass singing as a vehicle for communicating the "day-to-day struggle of the proletariat" as part of the development of a working-class movement in the United States and asserted that American workers needed a music appropriate to their own struggles. In 1934, Copland's setting of "Into the Streets, May First!" (text by Alfred Hayes) won a song competition sponsored by New Masses and was subsequently published in the collective's second Workers Songbook (1935). A year later, Copland composed an opera for children, The Second Hurricane, that includes a chorus of parents. This work, along with the "Outdoor Overture," written in 1938 for New York City's High School of Music and Art, serve as examples of Copland's commitment to making concert music accessible to wide audiences and groups of performers.

During the following decade, Copland's explicitly political activity was transformed into an effort to incorporate American folk and popular music along with regional settings into many of his concert and stage works. His ballet scores for Billy the Kid (1938), Rodeo (1942), and Appalachian Spring (1943–1944) all reflect the composer's interest in portraying regional history in music and in treating songs that might be familiar to American audiences as materials for motivic development. The Lincoln Portrait, for speaker and orchestra (1942), utilizes popular tunes of the famous president's time as well as his speeches and writings. While Copland's concern with class struggle as reflected in art did not continue beyond the period of the mid- to late 1930s, he made a significant contribution to music on the Left and helped to bring the popular music of the American people into the concert hall.

COUNCIL COMMUNISM emerged in Germany and Holland in the 1920s, spreading to the United States by the time of the Great Depression. Though council communists never built organizations of any size or led struggles of particular note, they kept alive a vision of self-emancipatory communism that, at key points in American history, connected with oppositional movements. Independent of both the reformist and the Leninist Left, council communists have long offered a vision of a "third path," both Marxist and libertarian.

Council communism as a body of ideas was constructed on two pillars: (1) that the spontaneous explosions of working-class activity that characterized the Russian Revolution of 1905, the Industrial Workers of the World (IWW) mass strikes of 1909–1913, the Russian Revolution of 1917, and the German revolution of 1918–1919 showed the way forward; in particular, that workers could organize themselves directly at the point of production and then connect organizations to challenge for social power; and (2) that vanguard parties constructed on the Leninist model would stifle and subvert such activity, block self-organization, and blunt any thrust toward self-emancipation.

The council communists locked horns with the Bolsheviks when the Third International insisted that all communist parties enter the trade union movement and participate in parliamentary politics in their own countries. The councilists argued that Western capitalism had entered a stage of crisis in which no reforms were possible, and that it was therefore counterproductive to rebuild reformist institutions like trade unions and parliamentary parties, particularly when workers themselves had shown an ability to transcend those institutions in the heat of struggle.

In 1921 Lenin read the council communists out of the Third International when he published Left-Wing Communism: An Infantile Disorder. Herman Gorter, the famous Dutch poet, answered that a model based on a largely peasant country ought not be imposed on an industrialized one (Response to Lenin, 1921). By the 1930s, the councilist critique of Leninism had deepened into a reinterpretation of the Russian Revolution. In his "Theses on Bolshevism" (International Council Correspondence, October 1934), Anton Pannekoek argued that the Bolsheviks had actually carried through the tasks of the bourgeois revolution—"the destruction of absolutism, the abolition of the feudal nobility as the first estate, and the creation of a political constitution and an administrative apparatus that would secure politically the fulfillment of the economic tasks of the revolution." Otto Rühle argued in "The Struggle against Fascism Begins with the Struggle against Bolshevism" (Living Marxism, September 1939) that the Communist parties in the West had become a major obstacle to the development of the self-emancipatory tendencies expressed in the revived labor movement.

In was in the 1930s that council communism reached America, as part of the diaspora of the European Left. There were some contacts made with the IWW and the Proletarian Party. But the councilists' main activity remained the circulation of ideas within fairly small circles, primarily through their own journals (International Council Correspondence, New Essays, and Living Marxism), occasionally in journals with a broader audience (V. F. Calverton's Modern Monthly or Dwight Macdonald's Politics), and through books (Karl Korsch's Karl Marx [1936] and Anton Pannekoek's Workers' Councils [1946]). Council communism's emphasis on spontaneity and self-organization, as well as its critique of bureaucracy and institutionalized leadership, touched responsive chords in the sit-down strikes of 1936–1937 and the wildcat strikes of World War II.

Council communism again touched oppositional movements in America during the 1960s and 1970s. Its emphasis on self-emancipation and direct democracy, as well as its critique of bureaucracy and reformism, resonated with the outlook expressed by the campus-based New Left. A new journal and pamphlet series was begun (Root and Branch), which reissued Pannekoek's Workers' Councils, and explored the American student movement and Afro-American history. Jeremy Brecher's Strike (1972) presented a councilist interpretation of American labor history. It was originally subtitled The True History of Mass Insurgence in America from 1877 to the Present and was published by Straight Arrow, then connected with Rolling Stone magazine. Over the next two decades, Strike sold more than 35,000 copies and helped to shape a new activist generation's understanding not only of labor history but of the role of the working class in future social change.

The best known of all the council communists in America was Paul Mattick. Born in Germany in 1904, he worked as a skilled tool-and-die maker and participated in Rosa Luxemburg's youth group before World War I. He played an active role in the revolutionary events of 1918–1921 and helped build Left and mass syndicalist organizations in the 1920s. Mattick emigrated to America in 1926, where he collaborated with cultural radicals like Max Eastman and labor radicals like the IWW in Chicago before assuming responsibility for editing councilist journals. He became best known in the 1960s and 1970s as a Marxist economic theorist.

Mattick applied and elaborated Henryk Grossmann's interpretation of Marxist crisis theory—that the falling rate of profit resulted from the "overaccumulation" of capital and would lead to a "breakdown" in the capitalist economy. It was during such a crisis, Mattick posited, that spontaneous working-class revolutionary activity could be expected to revive (Critique of Marcuse, 1971). Mattick made an original contribution in his analysis of Keynesian economics. At a time when many on the Left as well as in the mainstream argued that state intervention and economic "fine-tuning" had banished all threats of depression to the historical past, Mattick applied a rigorous Marxist framework of value analysis and concluded that state intervention would soon reach its own "limits" in which the expenses of state expenditures would come to be viewed as a drag on corporate profits, as a siphon on investment capital (Marx and Keynes: The Limits of the Mixed Economy). Mattick's framework continues to prove useful in the analysis of the "stagflation" of the 1970s and the Reaganite "supply-side economics" and "deregulation" in the 1980s.

CRIMINOLOGY. During the post-World War II period, up to the mid-1960s, criminology was an extension of the theoretical perspectives that were formulated in the 1930s. This was a liberal criminology that sometimes stressed the social sources of crime, but focused primarily on the individual pathologies of offenders and promoted rehabilitation of criminals. Although radical ideas about crime existed among nineteenth-century utopian socialists, anarchists, and Marxists, these ideas had little effect on mainstream criminology in the United States during this period.

Early Marxist thinkers had not given much attention to crime. A few late-nineteenth-century and early-twentieth-century scholars who wrote about crime had been influenced in a rudimentary way by Marxist ideas. The Italian socialist Enrico Ferri rejected the biological determinism of Lombroso and sought the causes of crime in the social and economic conditions of the criminal. Willem Bonger argued that competitive capitalism gave rise to selfish individualism and the egoistic act of crime. There were studies by others of the relationship between crime rates and various economic conditions, including unemployment and food prices. In the United States at the turn of the century, reformist penologists and lawyers, especially Clarence Darrow, related crime to the economic conditions of the country. Later, in the 1930s, the critical thinkers Georg Rusche and Otto Kirchheimer, drawing from the Frankfurt Institute, documented the relationship between penal sanctions and the labor market.

Eventually, at the end of the 1950s, academic criminological research began to take a radical turn as it gave attention to the legal system, uncovering its social and economic sources and its selective definition of crime. However, it was with developments in the larger society of the 1960s that a truly radical criminology emerged, responding to the civil rights movement, the anti-war movement, the student movement, black power, and the feminist movement. Many criminologists—still largely educated in sociology departments—began to reject the belief in a benevolent state and a capitalist economy that had informed a liberal, positivistic criminology.

The “new” criminologists—variously called conflict, radical, critical, or Marxist criminologists—had a marked influence on the criminology of the 1970s. Mainstream criminology was severely challenged as the ideas of the New Left provided criminologists with new and controversial ways of understanding crime. At the beginning of the 1970s, criminologists began to read Marx for the first time and to apply Marxism to law and crime. Crime was understood in relation to the underlying mode of production and to class struggle. The solution to crime was seen in the transformation of society and in the creation of socialist political and economic institutions. The new criminology brought into mainstream academic criminology the realization that as capitalist society is further threatened by its own contradictions, “criminal justice” is increasingly used to protect and legitimize the capitalist system.

Marxist criminology, among many of its practitioners, continued to emphasize the material foundations of crime and criminal justice. At the end of the 1980s, however, there emerged a new appreciation of the cultural and spiritual aspects of human existence and the appropriateness of such an appreciation in a developing critical criminology.

Critical criminology of today assumes a Marxist critique of social and economic life. Added to this critique are the various critical perspectives found in feminism, deconstructionism, Left realism, semiotics, and chaos theory. A socialist humanism continues to be explored and applied to crime and criminal justice. This includes a peacemaking criminology that employs such ideas and practices as mediation, reconciliation, and the abolition of punishment and the death penalty. It is a criminology that is based necessarily on human transformation in the achievement of peace and justice.

The ideas of critical criminologists have reached several generations of college and university students in the United States and Canada, Europe, and Latin America, presenting an understanding not only of crime but of capitalist society. Critical criminology has become part of the larger humanist and socialist movement. The struggles for liberation around the world—in response to repressive regimes and capitalist domination—are integral to the most recent developments in a criminology of the Left.

CRITICAL LEGAL STUDIES is a political-intellectual movement in legal thought that took root in U.S. law schools in the late 1970s. Its original proponents had been influenced by the experience of the anti-war and particularly the civil rights movements, where appeals to legality played an important part in assisting organizing efforts and were sometimes successful in the courts. Most of its proponents found the formulations of classical Marxism attractive but ultimately unsatisfyingly rigid, and an important theme in some works is the importance of abandoning grand social theories in favor of close attention to the details of particular historical moments.

Critical legal studies focuses on several propositions, though they are not all linked together in a tight logical unit: (1) Law is rife with contradictions. In particular, law attempts to express both our fear of and our dependence upon other people. At any single time, individual legal rules may subordinate one pole of the contradiction to the other. But other legal rules will reverse the hierarchy, and over time even the rules dealing with a single topic may flip from preferring one pole to preferring the other. (2) As a result, law is indeterminate, at least in any socially significant case. No single legal outcome or rule is required to the exclusion of other, often radically different, outcomes or rules. (3) When people assert that the law requires some result, several things might be going on: (a) If the people are members of the dominant class, they are attempting to construct a coherent ideological universe in which their positions of power are seen to be both justified and inevitable. (b) If they are members of subordinate classes, they may be deceiving themselves, making their lives more bearable by persuading themselves that there is nothing that can be done about their circumstances. (c) Or, more important, they may be appealing to the currently subordinated pole of the contradictions inherent in law. When they do so, appeals to legality take on a valuable utopian cast by demonstrating that within the present forms of law there are opportunities for radical change.

By the end of the 1980s, critical legal studies became a persistent irritant to mainstream legal thought, which responded by attempting to domesticate weaker versions of the ideal of indeterminacy while rejecting the other themes in critical legal studies, and by using traditional forms of Red-baiting and job-related penalties. In the 1990s the critical legal studies movement became associated with Left "identity politics" groups. Meetings of "critical networks" drew together left-leaning law professors and students in efforts to connect their political activities to the sort of intellectual program that academics found both attractive and necessary. Responding to criticisms from some identity politics groups interested in legal reform strategies, proponents of critical legal studies were persuaded that some of their more severe critiques of law as such were overstated. The harder edges of critical legal studies softened, easing its assimilation into the legal academy.

CROATIAN AMERICANS. The Croatian American community included a significant Left presence that grew out of both Old Country politics and the American experience. Socialists pioneered labor mobilization and secular education. Especially during the 1930s–1940s, the Left provided much of the community's leadership. Throughout, radicals played important cultural roles. After World War II, American cultural and political influences, along with the burgeoning of a powerful Croatian American Right, cut many of the old ties. Unlike that of most other European communities, however, Croatian American cultural life retained roughly social-democratic influences of enduring significance.

The Croatian Left was deeply rooted in the historical conflicts of the Old World. An internally diverse group, Croats had struggled for a thousand years to rule themselves. The Austro-Hungarian Empire had abridged their freedom in the nineteenth century, and the Serbs took control after World War I. A radical peasant movement developed in response, pursuing economic justice and political democracy as much as national autonomy. Participants in this movement emigrated to America, and organizers frequently visited the "colonies" to proselytize and raise funds. They helped form radical culture clubs—especially around the famed Tamburitza (mandolin) orchestras—which grew up in Croatian American neighborhoods and which, like the German American Turnvereins before them, effectively bridged the gap between recreational activities and socialist politics. In 1907 a Croatian socialist movement, the Croatian Workers Organization and Political Association, officially formed, with Radnicka Straze (Workers' Outlook) its organ. Croatian immigrants, numbering perhaps a quarter-million in the United States, were handicapped by their widespread lack of education; unlike the Slovenes, their sister nationality, they had little exposure to European urban life and education. Jurisic Glumac, a noted Croatian intellectual who came to the United States to edit their paper, helped Croatian American socialism make its first significant progress.

Drawn primarily to three industries—coal, steel, and meat-packing—and to such associated districts as Pittsburgh, Cleveland, and Chicago, Croatians became active in the radical industrial unionism of the 1910s and in the all-Yugoslav (but in practice, mostly Croatian and Slovene) South Slav Socialist Foundation. Their industrial lives, dominated by large corporations, high injury rates, and low wages, instilled the need for strong mutual-benefit associations and job protection. It also inspired, to a considerably greater degree than the more politically minded Slovenes, a spirit of syndicalism or revolutionary unionism. This experience, and the events in Europe, evoked a deep sympathy with the new Soviet Union. Of the South Slav groups, only Croatians joined the Communist movement in considerable numbers, publishing Radnik (Worker), Glas Radnika (Voice of the Worker), and Radnicki Glas (Workers' Voice) over the decades as Left influence rose and fell.

Unique in another sense, Croatian radicals remained active within the generalized, secular, and ostensibly nonpolitical Croatian Fraternal Union (CFU), whose leadership shifted from one broad orientation to another without demanding adherence at the local level. The CFU, ardently supporting industrial unionism, helped unite Croatian Left and mainstream industrial workers in common tasks of labor and politics. The New Deal seemingly answered all needs. Later, the CFU's ardent support of Tito and its participation in the American Slav Congress caused it to be placed upon the attorney general's list of subversive organizations as a Communist-linked group. Obtaining legal extrication from the list, the CFU went on to prosper in future generations of Croatian Americans, noted for its large membership (more than 100,000 in the middle 1980s), its Tam-buritza bands, and its mildly left-of-center national leadership. Its national weekly, Zajednicar (Unity), has continued (in Croatian and English) to urge upon its readers a generally progressive perspective. In the face of conservative, post-World War II immigration from Yugoslavia, the growing strength of the Croatian Catholic Union, and occasional right-wing bombing incidents, the survival and positioning of the CFU is (along with that of its sister Slovene National Benefit Society) unique within the European American ethnic world.

CRUSADER. The monthly magazine the Crusader was one of a group of black radical Harlem periodicals that gave voice to the militant New Negro movement while also propagating Socialist causes. Founded by Cyril Briggs (1887–1966), who edited it throughout its three-and-a-half-year run (1918–22), it was first the organ of the nationalistic Hamitic League of the World, then of the African Blood Brotherhood (ABB), a black affiliate of the Communist Party. The magazine reflects the important influence of West Indian immigrants on black radicalism in America, the intersection of a class analysis with Negro nationalism, and the organization of a black radical opposition to the policies of Marcus Garvey.

Briggs emigrated from the West Indies in 1905, and was a reporter and editor for the New York Amsterdam News before beginning the Crusader. He made the Crusader both a political organ and a journal of black culture, featuring African history essays intermixed with radical editorials and coverage of Harlem dramatic, musical, literary, artistic, sports, and business affairs. The magazine also carried original and reprinted fiction and poetry, as well as a short-lived women's department edited by Bertha De Basco. Featured writers included T. Thomas Fortune, Andrae Razafkeriefo, Paul Laurence Dunbar, Claude McKay, John E. Bruce, Eugene Debs, Agnes Smedley, Richard Harding Davis, Maxim Gorky, W. A. Domingo, and Charlotte Perkins Gilman. Gertrude Hall and Ben and Theo. Burrell were among the regular members of the editorial staff.

The proclaimed goals of the magazine, as stated in the November 1918 issue, were the "renaissance of Negro power and culture throughout the world," and propagation of "the doctrine of self-government for the Negro and Africa for the Africans." Briggs offered his readers both Pan-African and Socialist means to achieve these goals. From December 1918 to December 1920 the Crusader was identified as the official organ of the Hamitic League of the World, an Ethiopianist organization founded by George Wells Parker. It carried regular articles by Parker and advertisements for his Children of the Sun, which chronicled Africa as the ancient source of civilization. While celebrating African heritage, Briggs also urged class consciousness and support for Socialist candidates, including the 1918 New York races of A. Philip Randolph, Chandler Owen, and George Frazier Miller, and the 1920 presidential bid of Eugene Debs. Briggs told his readers that the Socialist Party platform represented equal opportunities for laborers of both races as well as an end to the special forms of oppression—lynching, segregation, disfranchisement—faced by blacks. Importantly, it also advocated self-government among blacks in Africa and areas of the Caribbean.

Briggs's central themes of class alliance and nationalistic self-determination were underscored by news coverage of the Sinn Féin and other nationalist liberation movements, as well as of the foreign policy of the Soviet Union. By 1921 Briggs was advocating a dual strategy of embracing Communism at home, while also backing the establishment of an independent black state (to be located in Africa, Latin America, or, as he had suggested earlier in his career, within the territory of the United States). His 1921 editorials further praised Bolshevism for its anti-imperialist stance, and urged alliance between the Soviet Union and African nations seeking liberation from colonial rule.

The increasingly militant tenor of the magazine coincided with the announcement in June 1921 that the Crusader had become the organ of the ABB, soon followed by Briggs's open rejection of the American Socialist Party, his call for support of the Third International, and his participation in the founding of the Workers Party. Briggs had begun advertising the ABB in the magazine in October 1919, urging a policy of active self-defense in reaction to racial violence. The ABB was primarily a propaganda organization, but it also functioned as a radical underground society open to the participation of both men and women of the Negro race, organized internationally in local posts with a New York-based administration. Estimates of the size of the secret fraternity at its peak range widely, from one thousand to fifty thousand members.

While the platforms of the Hamitic League and the ABB characterize the first two phases of the publication of the Crusader, the final phase was devoted to attacks upon Marcus Garvey. Crusader coverage of the Garvey movement had originally been positive. In December 1919 Briggs described Garvey's Universal Negro Improvement Association (UNIA) and the ABB as two "parts of one movement." By 1921, however, this support had shifted to open animosity. Briggs attacked Garvey's reliance on capitalistic enterprise as a means of African liberation, and the UNIA leader's autocratic refusal to participate in black coalition politics—a line of criticism exacerbated by Garvey's expulsion of ABB and Workers Party members from the 1921 UNIA convention. The last four issues of the Crusader were devoted to exposés of the fraudulent administration of the UNIA, including articles by prominent ex-Garveyites who had moved to the ranks of the ABB. The propaganda war was carried on between the Crusader and the Negro World until February 1922, when Garvey was indicted on the fraud charges that would eventually lead to his deportation, and the Crusader ceased publication because of this.

In the early twenties Briggs continued to operate the radical Crusader News Service. The ABB slowly dissolved as a separate organization, its members merging with the Workers Party and later the American Negro Labor Congress. Briggs edited the organ of the American Negro Labor Congress and in 1936 became a contributor to the Negro Worker, the organ of the International Trade Union Committee of Negro Workers. He was expelled from the Communist Party in 1939 for his continued support of black nationalist policies. He rejoined the Party in the late 1940s, and worked as a functionary in the Los Angeles area during the McCarthy era.

CUBAN AMERICANS. The presence of Cuban Americans in the U.S. Left dates to the 1820s, with the publication of the radical exile paper El Habanero in Philadelphia, no doubt intended to be smuggled into Havana to promote independence. The modern movement began under the inspiration of the Cuban workers' movement and the Paris Commune. The failed Cuban insurrection (1868–1878) greatly expanded the Cuban American community by way of emigration to Key West, Tampa, and New York, where cigar manufacturers had located in search of docile labor forces. The failed French insurrection popularized anarchism (and nonparliamentary versions of socialism) as an ideology of the undefeated romantic Left.

All sections of the heterogeneous emigrant generation sought to dislodge the colonial tyranny from Cuba, but they did so from a variety of political standpoints. Spanish and Cuban tobacco workers, centered in Florida, created a culture of labor organizations and of learning imparted through readers to the tobacco operatives. Separately, a rather more petit-bourgeois emigrant Cuban American community, based in the greater New York area, promoted philanthropy and Cuban independence. The link between them, the Cuban Revolutionary Party (PRC), was founded in 1892 and directed by the anarchomystic intellectual and journalist José Martí. Simultaneously, La Liga (The League) was founded by Rafael Serra, with the help of Martí, for the education and achievement of black Cubans, of whom there were many among the independentista generation. La Liga rapidly became a center for PRC enthusiasm and multiracial Cuban identity.

While Martí himself was a nationalist-romantic-utopian at best, his Florida comrades took a more socialistic turn. Carlos Baliño (1848–1926), their outstanding personality, represented cigar workers at the memorable 1886 Knights of Labor convention in Richmond, Virginia. A founding member of the PRC, he often accompanied Martí on tours through Florida, Baliño the practical agitator and Martí the visionary. Eager to establish a Cuban presence apart from the sweatshops of Tampa, Baliño organized a community of PRC-oriented families in Thomasville, Georgia, and another, Martí City (where he became the first mayor), in a township of Ocala, Florida. His newspaper, La tribuna del Pueblo, published intermittently in Tampa during the 1880s–1890s, made him the godfather of Cuban socialism. Meanwhile, a multitude of socialist and anarchist institutions included a Ferrer school and a cultural center, Antorcha, whose main patrons were Spaniards and Cubans, and whose leader was the famed Spanish anarchist exile Pedro Esteve.

New factors emerged in the radical equation. Thousands of Spaniards, many with experience in anarchist movements, emigrated to Cuba and thence to the United States. Black Cubans, excluded from political participation after a failed uprising in 1912, also fled in numbers to the United States. Meanwhile, the intended Cuban revolution of the day, and its would-be facilitator, the PRC, had decisively lost out to the expansive American empire. The intensification of political-cultural activity presaged a chilling repression. No sector of U.S. radicalism suffered more from the effects of government and private vigilantism of the war years and afterward.

Over the following decade of enforced silence, the older, more anarchist-oriented generation of Cuban American radicals gradually faded away. The Russian Revolution stirred a smaller, mostly younger group to new anticipations. According to oral testimony, an autonomous Communist Party was formed by Spanish Cubans in the Tampa area wholly out of touch with the splits and factionalism of the mainstream U.S. communist movements. Not until the end of the 1920s did Communist Party regulars seek to absorb this local movement of several hundred individuals, and at that, their rigorous ideological demands lost the majority of previous enthusiasts.

Communism continued to appeal to Cuban Americans, but rather in the fashion of Popular Front and labor-oriented radical cadre. Antifascist sentiment directed at Franco and the Spanish Civil War sparked widespread support, despite differences among Communists and surviving anarchist factions. Most attention went into civil liberties efforts against omnipresent repression, into union activity (first inside the "red" Tobacco Workers International union, and after its collapse, in the mainstream labor organizations), the distribution of the Daily Worker, and financial support to Communists active in Cuba. Spanish Cubans maintained a small sector of the International Workers Order, mostly in New York and Florida. Unlike other, more substantial groups, they published no newspaper aimed distinctly at Cubans, but they always published a newspaper in Spanish and during much of the Popular Front era published a daily, La Voz.

By the 1930s, meanwhile, a new, more middle-class exile culture solidified in Miami and New York. The later opponents of Batista, as of Machado, included Communists, but less prominently in the United States than in Cuba. Ybor City, a section of Tampa dominated by radical Cuban workers and Cuban American workers' culture, became far less central.

By the 1950s, Fidel Castro, like so many other revolutionaries of the preceding half-century, made public appearances, raising money for his newer revolutionary-nationalist movement. A movement greatly reduced by McCarthy-era repression, by removal of the tobacco industry from Tampa, and by the aging process greeted the Cuban Revolution with excitement. Soon, however, new waves of repression, and the intimidating presence of right-wing, often violent anti-Castro Cuban exiles, effectively eclipsed the Cuban American Left. While a small anarchist (anti-Fidel) tendency could be found in Miami of the 1980s, ultraconservative politics with a few endangered strands of liberalism dominated the life of Cuban Americans, by this time easily the wealthiest and most Republican of Spanish-speaking exile groups. Cubans in New Jersey were just as anti-Castro but produced Robert Menendez, a Democratic congressman who was a classic liberal on most issues except those dealing with Cuba.

CUBAN REVOLUTION. The triumph of the Cuban Revolution in January 1959 coincided with a thaw in the Cold War, the beginnings of a political stirring in the student population, and a general feeling that it was time to get out of the malaise that had hung over the body politic during the nasty years of the Korean War and the rampages of Joseph McCarthy. Fidel Castro became an instant hero in the United States as the romantic guerrilla chief who had led the fight against Fulgencio Batista, a universally hated dictator (except by the Central Intelligence Agency and the U.S. State Department). The Old and the nascent New Left in the United States found the Cuban leader appealing. Castro seemed to epitomize popular democracy and economic and social justice without the ideological baggage of Marxism-Leninism. He also believed that Cuba could not be independent unless it controlled its own economy, whereas U.S. leaders had never believed that a small country inside its sphere should achieve real independence. Fidel Castro's ideology, before and after he became a communist, was designed to bring the Cuban people into the course of history from which they had been excluded first by Spanish and then by U.S. domination.

Most of what was first known about the Cuban Revolution came from the New York Times. Herbert Matthews, a senior reporter, had snuck into the Sierra Maestra Mountains and interviewed Castro in early 1957, just months after Fidel had brought his guerrilla troops to Cuba from Mexico on a yacht called Granma. Matthews created, and other reporters then strengthened, a popular image of Fidel, one that lasted a short time with the mass media but endured for some of the young people who went to visit Cuba during the first two years of the revolution.

The excitement of a people that had taken the first step toward nationhood and the energy that emerged from revolution was a "turn-on." Thousands of students who returned from Cuba joined the Fair Play for Cuba Committee, or the Student Fair Play Committee. During 1960 this organization was in the forefront of the "Hands Off Cuba" campaign. Writers such as James Baldwin, C. Wright Mills, and Jean-Paul Sartre, all of whom had visited Cuba, gave prestige to the organization.

By mid-1960 most of the mass media journalists, except for a few like Matthews, followed the U.S. government line. American officials had been upset by Castro's first moves—slashing rents, taking over the public utilities, and beginning an anti-Yankee campaign. Their feeling was translated into a campaign of public opposition when in March the Cuban revolutionary tribunals ordered the execution of five hundred Batista officials, an event that turned public opinion.

The Cuban Revolution also coincided with the birth of the New Left in the United States and energized many of those who came to play leadership roles. For the first year and a half the Cuban Revolution was the delight of anarchists and Trotskyists. As soon as the Soviet Union made clear its intention to provide Cuba with basic economic and military aid, the Communists also joined the pro-Castro front.

By summer 1960, Paul Sweezy and Leo Huberman, the editors of Monthly Review, had correctly diagnosed the Cuban Revolution's character: socialist. By the fall of 1960, Ballantine Books had published both C. Wright Mills's Listen, Yankee, which characterized Fidel and the revolution as democratic, populist, and quintessentially just, and Jean-Paul Sartre's Sartre on Cuba. The French philosopher proposed that the Cuban Revolution was existentialist in nature, a social movement whose leaders reacted to human need:

SARTRE: And if the people asked you for the moon?

FIDEL: It would be because they needed it.

On the other side, more than half a million Cuban exiles poured into the United States to join an already well established anticommunist movement. The Fair Play Committee was faction-ridden and subjected to enormous pressure from federal police and anti-Castro groups. Under such pressure, both oddballs and agents joined or formed Fair Play chapters. Such characters included Lee Harvey Oswald, unknown by any of the national officers, who opened a Fair Play office in New Orleans.

By April 1961, when the Central Intelligence Agency launched the Bay of Pigs invasion, New Left enthusiasm for the Cuban Revolution had waned. The Soviet Union was clearly involved, and the New Left eschewed association with the repressive nature of the Soviet regime. The revolution itself had also begun to harden: It no longer fit the suit tailored by Mills and Sartre. It had taken on a socialist character in the Soviet sense of the word.

Later, some New Leftists regained their earlier enthusiasm for Cuba as they became disillusioned by the nature of the U.S. system, and as they began to learn about the difficulties involved in confrontations of Third World revolutions with the U.S. empire. By 1968 the Cuban Revolution had become not only permanent but a downright nuisance for the U.S. government's international policies. Havana offered inspiration for anti-Vietnam War activists to be ever stronger in their own struggles.

The centerpiece of American policy toward Cuba was a trade embargo. Active support work for Cuba revived significantly in the 1980s, concentrating on sending food and medical supplies to Cuba, usually with significant public participation by religious and humanitarian organizations. This coalition also lobbied for a general change of policy, particularly the lifting or easing of the embargo, which had grown even more stringent with the passage of the Helms-Burton Act in 1996.

CZECH AMERICANS. Despite their relatively small numbers in the United States (310,000), Czech (or Bohemian) Americans were quite prominent in the Left of several American cities—particularly in Cleveland and Chicago—in the late nineteenth and early twentieth centuries. The Czech American Left first made its influence felt in the wave of strikes that accompanied the Great Railroad Strike of 1877. In Chicago, Czechs dominated both the leadership and the rank and file of a major strike in the lumberyards. In Cleveland, Czechs were similarly noticeable in the coopers' strike at Standard Oil. In both cities, strike activity carried over into politics and the Workingmen's ticket fared well in predominantly Czech neighborhoods.

Less conspicuous, but no less important, was the role of Czech skilled workers who labored in smaller manufacturing establishments. It was these individuals who furnished a large and influential part of the core membership of Czech socialist clubs and fraternal societies. Also important in the 1870s were a small number of worker-intellectuals, such as Lev Palda and Frank Škarda, who attempted to organize and politicize Czech immigrant workers. The Czech Left also found allies in the liberal editors of the influential Czech anticlerical newspapers. These included Charles Jonáš of Slavie (Racine, Wisconsin), Václav Snajdr of Dennice Novověku (Cleveland), Frantisek Zdřubek of Svornost (Chicago), and John V. Čapek of New York Listy.

After suffering a decline in the early 1880s, the Czech Left reemerged in the mid-1880s with renewed vigor as a result of the rise of the Knights of Labor as well as the immigration of several Czech socialist anarchists to the United States. The Czech anarchists are most famous for their role in the Haymarket Incident in Chicago in 1886. Some of the most notable Czech immigrant anarchists included Robert Zoula, Joseph Pečka, Jakub Mikolanda, and Leo Kochman. Owing in large part to the Haymarket fiasco and the setbacks faced by the Knights of Labor, however, the more revolutionary wing of the Czech American Left found itself replaced in influence by more moderate socialists in the late 1880s and 1890s.

Events in the Czech homeland also help explain the ascendancy of the moderate socialists within the Czech American Left. The legalization of the Social Democratic Party in Austria in 1889 allowed for the construction of socialism as a mass movement in the Czech homeland. The revolutionary tactics of the 1880s now appeared anachronistic as party members reveled in the newfound vitality of the Czech socialist movement.

The moderation of the socialist movement in the homeland in the 1890s was mirrored in the United States. Large numbers of socialist Czechs made their way to the United States from 1890 to 1914. By the early part of the twentieth century, Czech socialist immigrants had created a durable subculture within urban Czech communities. They sponsored a number of organizations and institutions including several newspapers such as Spravedlnost (published daily in Chicago beginning in 1905), Americké Dělnické Listy (Cleveland), and Obrana (New York). They also established a wide array of gymnastic, theater, music, and social clubs. By the 1910s, Czech socialists numbered perhaps 10,000 of the approximately 150,000 Czechs living in American urban centers.

Despite suffering a decline in the late 1880s and 1890s, the more revolutionary Czech socialist faction reemerged with renewed vigor in the first two decades of the twentieth century. Its renewed strength was fueled largely by the push toward industrial unionism that was occurring in the years from 1900 to 1920 in both the United States and Europe.

Revolutionary and moderate socialists appear to have been relatively equal in influence within the Czech American Left on the eve of World War I. Differences in political hue were apparent, however, between Czech socialists from one American city to the next. New York Czech socialists had the most radical reputation in the years before World War I, Czech socialists in Cleveland were the most moderate, and Chicago Czech socialists were made up of significant numbers of revolutionaries and moderates. After World War I, New York, Chicago, and Detroit Czech socialists joined the Communist Party, while those in Cleveland remained with the Socialist Party.

The Czech American Left maintained its influence within urban Czech communities in the United States until well into the 1950s. By that time, the deaths of most first-generation Czech socialists combined with the left-wing purges of the McCarthy period spelled the end for the Czech American Left.

CZOŁGOSZ, LEON (1873-1901). Commonly depicted as the "crazed anarchist assassin" of President William McKinley, American-born Leon Czołgosz, the son of immigrant working-class parents, explained his rationale for the deed: "I killed the president because he was the enemy of the good people—the good working people." Exposed to politics by his father, who belonged to a Polish branch of the Socialist Labor Party in Cleveland, he became an avid reader of radical literature in English and Polish. Not long after hearing a speech by Emma Goldman, he traveled to Buffalo, where he shot McKinley at the Pan American Exposition on 6 September 1901. His "attentat" resulted in an upsurge of anti-immigrant hysteria and a nationwide roundup of anarchists suspected of conspiracy in the assassination. His trial lasted less than eight hours and he was electrocuted on 29 October 1901. He was roundly denounced by spokespersons of the Left, with the lone sympathetic exception of Emma Goldman, who nonetheless advised against individual acts of political violence.

DADA. Started in Zurich in 1916 by the Romanian Tristan Tzara, the Alsatian Hans Arp, the German Hugo Ball, and other expatriate anti-war artists, poets, and performers from many countries, the dada movement quickly spread across Europe and even to Japan and the United States before it disintegrated in the mid-1920s. Defiant yet playful, its best manifestations were characterized by a wild humor all its own. "No one can escape from Dada," wrote Tzara, the movement's most persistent promoter. "The real Dadas are against Dada. . . . Dada is opposed to the future. Dada is dead. Dada is crazy. Long live Dada."

Anti-academic, anti-institutional, anti-esthetic, in most countries dada tended to be antipolitical as well. In Berlin, however, a Central Dada Council for World Revolution issued incendiary tracts in 1918, and in Cologne leading dasas helped found the Communist Party of the Rhineland. The dadaists' pranks and practical jokes revealed their hostility to the bourgeois order and clearly appealed to revolutionary-minded youth; it is not surprising that Hitler denounced the movement in Mein Kampf. Even where dada did not engage political questions as such, it still functioned as a subversive force. In 1921, for example, the Paris dasas—André Breton, Benjamin Péret, and others who would soon proclaim themselves surrealists—staged an elaborate, prolonged mock trial of best-selling nationalist author Maurice Barrès that provoked a huge scandal.

Dada manifestations in the United States, centered in New York, were fewer and less impressive than those in Europe. Most of what passed for American dada activity was little more than a casual by-product of often brief sojourns of such globe-trotting exemplars of the movement as Marcel Duchamp and Francis Picabia, of France; the eccentric German baroness Elsa von Freytag-Loringhoven; Swiss-born poet/pugilist Arthur Cravan and his English companion, poet/painter Mina Loy. America's ephemeral dada periodicals—the Blind Man (two issues, 1917), Rongwrong (one issue, 1917), and New York Dada (one issue, 1921)—lacked the punch of their European counterparts, and their influence was negligible. More significant was the aggressive vehicle of Cravan's views, the Soil, edited by Robert Coady, which, with its passion for jazz, George Herriman's Krazy Kat, silent film comedies, boxing champion Jack Johnson, and other liberatory aspects of popular culture, actually was closer to the consciously revolutionary orientation of the later surrealists than to the dadaists' naive nihilism.

Unlike such earlier currents as symbolism, futurism, and cubism, in which the role of women was greatly restricted, dada from the start enjoyed the active participation of many women, and the New York dada milieu was no exception. It is a notable if rarely acknowledged fact that dada entered the English language most vigorously through poetry written by Loy and Freytag-Loringhoven in New York in the late 1910s. Interestingly, some of the latter's poems were published in the socialist magazine the Masses.

In a list of active dasas published in the Berlin Almanach Dada in 1920, Tzara included such Americans as the wealthy art collector W. C. Arensberg, socialite Mabel Dodge, novelist Hutchins Hapgood, abstract painter John Marin, and photographer Alfred Stieglitz—not one of whom can be said to have reflected more than the faintest traces of a dadaist outlook. In Chicago, Ben Hecht, who had taken part in the First International Dada Fair in Berlin, 1920, started his Literary Times a few months later, with Max Bodenheimer; more provocative than the New York productions, it was no less eclectic.

America's most notable dadaist was Man Ray. Painter, collagist, photographer, film-maker, and writer, he was born in Philadelphia in 1890 and grew up in New York. Already painting as a child, by 1909 he was attending night classes taught by Robert Henri and George Bellows at the art school of the anarchist Francisco Ferrer Social Center, where he held his first exhibition in 1912. The following year he met the poet Adon Lacroix, who introduced him to the work of Lautréamont and other forerunners of the European avant-garde, and became his "wife." A link between New York's anarchist and dadaist circles, Man Ray drew covers for Emma Goldman's Mother Earth, issued the proto-dadaist Ridgefield Gazook in 1915, and four years later, with the anarchist poet/sculptor Adolph Wolff, produced a one-shot anarchist/dadaist review titled TNT.

In 1921 he moved to Paris and joined the dadaists there. Three years later he helped found the surrealist movement, of which he became a prominent figure. More works by Man Ray were reproduced in La Révolution Surréaliste than by any other artist, and it was a one-man show of his that inaugurated the Galerie Surréaliste in 1925. Although he never shared the Marxist orientation of his surrealist comrades, he regularly collaborated on surrealist books and journals, and participated in the movement's collective exhibitions until his death in 1976.

DAILY WORKER. The most important literary-political expression of the Communist movement, the New York-based Daily Worker and its successor publications have generally echoed the orthodoxy at the center of the Party political apparatus. But they have also sought, in different ways at different times, to become popular newspapers of the Left and (mostly in hope rather than expectation) of a broader "progressive" audience. These two aims, often if not always in conflict, have supplied the dynamic tension in the newspapers' life.

The Daily Worker reflected a historical weakness of the Left English-language press. Only during the heroic era of the Socialist Party (and again, in the political sector of the 1960s "underground" press) could an English-language paper gain a sufficient popular following and advertising base to pay for its production. Heavy subsidies, from readers and Communist sympathizers, made up the difference, but even so the specter of financial crisis never disappeared. The staff received meager wages, just sufficient (with the occasional contribution of a week's pay) to qualify for Newspaper Guild membership. Although rarely trained within the commercial presses, the staff remained largely stable over a considerable period and gradually acquired increased skills. Political demands, however, repeatedly frustrated the tailoring of styles to a sustained perspective.

The Daily Worker was launched in 1924 with $100,000 raised from the Communist-led language-federation groups, which were already supporting their own dailies. During these early years, the publication seemed most intent upon its official status as Party organ, publishing documents and official theoretical interpretations. Among the competing factions of the 1920s it was a fiercely desired object (at one point, William Z. Foster's supporters occupied the newspaper's office at gunpoint) whose proprietorship depended upon the factional control of Party leaders, which in turn depended ultimately upon Comintern favor. These tensions stifled the paper's effort to reach out to a wide audience.

A shift of the paper from Chicago, where it was founded, to New York in 1927 brought early hints of a different journalism. Harvey O'Connor, professional newspaperman and Federated Press wordsmith, joined the staff for a time, as did wry humor columnist Sendar Garlin and a number of talented young writers. With Communist leadership that looked more to the long haul than immediate revolutionary prospects, the Daily Worker sought to become more of a radical labor paper, with a somewhat popular appeal. Continued factional fighting and the opening of the Third Period in 1928 returned the paper to a wild stridency. Yet it had improved, or at any rate had become popularized, as its internal, theoretical character passed to more specialized publications (especially the monthly Communist) and open factionalism ended with the departure of the Trotskyists. Subjects such as developing battles in the Third World against imperialism gained coverage unimaginable in the commercial U.S. daily press.

Like the Communist Party generally, although in more elusive ways, the paper started to shift toward yet a different kind of newspaper style closer to that of the commercial daily press in the early 1930s. Earl Browder, a competent functionary who established his claims over rival candidates for Party leadership, brought with him Clarence Hathaway (1884–1963), a former leader of the Minnesota Farmer-Labor movement, as editor of the Daily Worker. A skilled editor, he provided a continuity and modest support for “Americanization” that took root and developed within the Party. Indeed, the early 1930s Daily Worker had a tabloidlike flavor no more hysterical in tone, certainly, than the New York Daily News or Mirror in their anti-union anticommunism.

By 1935–1936, the Daily Worker had palpably improved. Writing and design had become more professional, and the tone had begun to lighten somewhat with the addition of a sports column and comic strips. If these two features can be considered emblematic, sportswriter Lester Rodney may himself have been the clearest sign of a changing attitude toward Left journalism. Avid sports fan (especially of the Brooklyn Dodgers) and mostly self-taught journalist, Rodney carried on a protracted internal struggle with newspaper staffers and die-hard old-fashioned readers who disdained sports as pure escapism, or as activity best confined to the intramural events of the ethnic Left’s soccer leagues. By 1937–1938, Rodney’s column was widely noted, among sports fans considerably outside Communist circles, for his feeling for the players, his sensitivity to race and ethnic issues, and his close observation of details. His ten-year struggle for the integration of major league baseball has been widely noted by sports historians, and considered by many to have been crucial. In the same years, Little Lefty, drawn in the 1930s by Maurice del Bourgo and then by Louie Furstadt (by the 1940s assisted by, among others, Harvey Kurtzman, later Mad magazine's editor) emerged as the most interesting—if somewhat predictable—Left comic creation since the Industrial Workers of the World's Mr. Block. By contrast, Daily Worker film reviewing tended almost unfailingly toward the heavy-handed didactic. Daily circulation, generally in the twenty-thousand range, reached above thirty-thousand, with a weekend-edition circulation about twice that figure—the maximum ever attained.

The Daily Worker's labor coverage had always been intense, especially in regard to strikes and the activities of Communist-led unions. In the 1920s and early 1930s, it was nevertheless often marred by extreme exaggeration and by a lack of on-the-spot, investigative reportage. A larger staff, both paid (if scarcely) and volunteer, provided more detailed and more accurate coverage—no less accurate in its own way, even at its worst, than the commercial dailies. Sometimes, as Communists covered and simultaneously promoted the new industrial unions and their struggles, the paper became an important tool in providing information and adding a sense of experience to local militants. Communists or near-Communists rising within the Congress of Industrial Organizations in turn became the paper's entrée into the heart of industrial unionism.

By contrast, although this became rather more clear in retrospect, the paper (in articles by Anna Louise Strong and others) maintained a ferociously optimistic perspective of Soviet public cheer and economic growth. The Moscow Trials, demanding vast credulity, brought out the worst in Russian-based American workers and exposed the Daily Worker to charges of smearing honored revolutionaries while glorifying Joseph Stalin to superhuman heights. The cooperation of Left-leaning public intellectuals that had been so marked in the earlier 1930s dissipated.

Such features existed side by side, with little sense of apparent contradiction. At the apex of the Popular Front, Woody Guthrie's regular appearance signified a kind of translation of Communist doctrine into something approaching a radical democracy. Mike Gold's "Change the World" column, in earlier years dour and full of charges against liberals, grew positively rosy in its hopes for American democracy leav-ened (if not revolutionized in any foreseeable short run) by the active presence of Communism. Even coverage of the Democratic Party's liberal wing developed a sophistication, as Communist journalists pinpointed the contradictions within the electoral system, and made themselves the forceful supporters of Vito Marcantonio's righteous voice in Congress and of many other noncommunist but progressive public officials (especially in New York State) and candidates.

Most of all, however, the Daily Worker made itself authentically "American," in the sense of native radical traditions, in support of black causes, especially close at hand in Harlem. During earlier years, the absence of any but the rarest black journalists (and not many black readers) had handicapped the paper; political insistence upon "self-determination" of "black belt" southern counties had an air of unreality about it. The Popular Front's insistent promotion of blacks into the center of American life had a magnetic appeal to the black middle class, and to many white liberals and radicals. The Scottsboro, Angelo Herndon, and other legal cases, the exposure of human tragedies caused by discrimination and segregation, and the promotion of black candidates for office, all gave the paper an impact far beyond its circulation. No other paper cared so much; none, not even the commercial New York papers with their extensive music coverage, had such feelings for the importance of blues and jazz in American culture. No paper in the country could boast a reporter with the brilliance of Richard Wright (Daily Worker Harlem editor) on the Joe Louis-Max Schmeling boxing match.

These tendencies generally magnified during the Second World War, after the brief, confusing, and politically costly Hitler-Stalin Pact ended with Germany's invasion of Russia. The paper was stymied, however, when Hathaway was replaced as editor by the journalistically incompetent Louis Budenz, who sought for a time to ride herd politically upon a staff grown more self-consciously professional. Pressed to glorify the Red Army and, soon, U.S. military triumphs, the Daily Worker retreated to a kind of shrillness even when—relative to other American papers—its interpretation of unfolding world events gave a more correct balance of Russia's importance in defeating Nazism.

At the same time, coverage of women's issues grew dramatically—most notably in the advocacy of women's improved status by Elizabeth Gurley Flynn and others—as women became a major component of the wartime Party and of its middle-level leaders. And in spite of a fanatically single-minded devotion to military victory over Germany (miners' leader John L. Lewis was roundly condemned for leading a major strike, the imprisonment of Minneapolis Trotskyists lauded, and the internment of Japanese Americans not opposed), the paper found space to maintain a vital sports section. It did not, although urged by distributors, seize the United Front moment to install a racetrack tip sheet, which would surely have proved yet more popular among the working-class readership.

Once again after the war, for the second time since the later 1930s, the Daily Worker gathered the momentum to nearly become a solid, professional daily. When Budenz suddenly returned to Catholicism in 1945, the editorship passed to Morris Childs, later famous as a reported informant of the Federal Bureau of the Investigation, then in 1947 to a young John Gates, shaped politically in the Browder era. In terms of sheer journalistic competence, the Daily Worker grew by leaps and bounds. But it found itself pressed hard on two sides. The Party entered the Cold War era disoriented and internally divided, increasingly unable after 1948 to meet the pressures of public anticommunism and the increasingly undeniable revelations about Russian misdeeds. Alarmed at the rightward shift of America, convinced fascism might be only months away, Party leadership isolated the organization and the paper unnecessarily. On the other side, the Daily Worker endured heavy competition, during the 1940s, from PM, a liberal New York daily, and its short-lived successor, the Daily Compass. By 1950, many middle-class "progressive" readers in particular were frightened of receiving a Communist paper and switched to the weekly National Guardian because of McCarthyism. Party membership fell drastically, and circulation of the Daily Worker dipped below ten-thousand.

The Twentieth Soviet Congress brought Gates and his political following into direct conflict with the more hard-line supporters of the Russian successors to Stalin. For a moment between 1956 and 1958, the Daily Worker became a semi-independent player in the Left, condemning the Russian invasion of Hungary and defending dissent within the Party press, even encouraging readers to write in with their opinions about American Communism's true status and its past mistakes. Gates's staff, notably the veteran journalist Max Gordon, used the opportunity to explore the contradictions of Communists less democratic in their internal life than the capitalism they deplored.

As the Party lost members and supporters, the Daily Worker lost readers, and despite a reduced page-size and staff, soon could no longer maintain production without rocketing subsidies. For political and editorial reasons, the daily closed in 1957, and with it, the independent status of the Communist press.

No Communist daily appeared in a decade marked by fresh and unpredicted developments. In 1967 the Daily World took the field, enabled by a union agreement that permitted maximum automation of the office (in advance, one might say, of other dailies). While no other Left daily existed, the Daily World lacked the influence of its predecessors upon the political scene. Young people, who in any case had little attraction to Communist politics, soon formed their own local press, with a vastly greater influence. The Daily World, mostly sold or given away by staunch Communist veterans of many years' standing, seemed pallid by comparison. In the wake of the New Left collapse, it gained new talent (such as Terry Cannon, formerly a New Left journalist of note) and a somewhat greater weight in the Left circles that remained active. It experienced rare moments of triumph, albeit vicarious, in the election of local black officials who (or whose long-standing allies) were close to the Communist Party of an earlier age, and loyal to the sense of multiracial devotion in Communist circles. On international affairs, after the Vietnam War, it found no issue of equal appeal, despite heavy promotion of the African National Congress. Frequent attacks on Israeli policies, and praise for Israel's avowed enemies as well as internal critics, continued to cost the Communist press dearly among once-faithful Jewish readers. Perhaps its most touching pages were devoted to late-life public celebrations of sturdy militants, often by local public or union officials. Then again, by way of comparison, Maoist groups, even before the Chinese turn away from world revolutionism, had no luck at founding a U.S. daily; as a communist organ, the Daily World remained singular if hard to find among the nation's shrinking supply of independent-minded news vendors.

In 1986, against the wishes of many West Coast Communists and their longtime liberal allies, the People's World merged with the Daily World to become the People's Daily World, with color outside pages and center spread. Although some cultural writers came over from the People's World, the New York-based paper was actually a somewhat expanded version of the Daily World, with a daily readership of perhaps fifteen-thousand, including many gift subscriptions, and a weekly paid readership of perhaps twice that. In an exceptionally difficult era for the Left, the People's Daily World lionized Jesse Jackson and the Rainbow Coalition (while maintaining fervent loyalty to Communist political candidates), and castigated anticommunism as a fatal concession to Reaganism.

Perestroika and glasnost, Mikhail Gorbachev's appeals to the West, and likewise the Western fascination with unfolding Russian events, seemed to catch the People's Daily World somewhat ill prepared. Subsequent disappointments confirmed what many had feared, and American Communist journalism now had to train its lens on the out-of-power Russian Communist Party. Although reduced to weekly publication in 1988 and deprived of the subsidy provided by East European library subscriptions, the renamed People's Weekly World survived. It showed a painfully familiar solidarity with the North Korean government (and a remarkable new admiration for the long-despised Chinese government), but it seized on American and world events with sometimes exceptional clarity. Labor reportage, European and Israeli coverage by William Pomeroy and Hans Lebrecht, and even a new environmental interest distinguished the Daily Worker's successor.

DAVIS, ANGELA (b. 1944). One of the few Communists to become a national political figure in the period of the New Left, Angela Davis was the defendant in two major legal cases involving civil and political rights. She was born in Alabama to a black middle-class family whose social circle included Communist activists. A scholarship from the American Friends allowed her to attend high school in New York, where she lived with the family of the Reverend William Melish, an individual known for his radicalism. Davis was exposed to socialist thought while in high school and attended meetings for a Communist Party youth group. At Brandeis University, she became a student of Marxist Herbert Marcuse, who influenced her decision to do her graduate studies at Frankfurt University (1965-1967). During her time in Europe, Davis attended the World Youth Festival in Helsinki and took part in anti-Vietnam War demonstrations. Upon her return to the United States, she again studied under Marcuse.

With the civil rights movement at full steam, Davis joined several organizations, the most important being the Student Nonviolent Coordinating Committee, the Communist Party, and the Black Panther Party. She made a visit to Cuba in 1969 and that autumn caught the political spotlight for the first time. She had been hired to teach philosophy at the University of California, Los Angeles, while she completed her doctoral dissertation. Ronald Reagan, then governor of California, protested the appointment, citing a state law that banned Communist Party members from teaching at state universities. Davis publicly acknowledged her Party affiliation and was immediately dismissed. In the ensuing litigation, which engaged civil libertarians of various tendencies, the law was declared unconstitutional.

Davis intensified her work with the Black Panthers, becoming ever more involved with the plight of black inmates who had begun to call themselves class-war prisoners. She was most passionate about the situation of a group called the Soledad Brothers, inmates charged with killing a prison guard, and she became personally involved with their leader, George Jackson. In August 1970, Jonathan Jackson sought to force the release of his brother by seizing hostages at the Marin County courthouse. During the subsequent gunplay Jonathan and a judge were killed. Angela Davis was immediately accused of involvement in the affair and formally charged with conspiracy, kidnapping, and murder. Within a short time the entire civil rights and New Left movements were mobilized in her defense by the National United Committee to Free Angela Davis. Massive national and international protests soon made Angela Davis a name recognized in millions of American households.

When the case went to trial in 1972, Davis was acquitted of all charges. She subsequently toured the United States to thank her supporters and then traveled around the world, including stops in the Eastern bloc. Her defense committee was renamed the National Alliance against Racist and Political Repression. With Davis as co-chair, the alliance, like the International Labor Defense of old, took on a variety of political cases that did not necessarily have any direct links to the Communist Party. The majority of those actively defended were blacks and Hispanics. Although it has had some successes, the alliance has never gained the wide support enjoyed by its predecessor. Davis ran as the vice presidential candidate of the Communist Party in 1980 and 1984, but was among the group which broke with the Party at the end of the decade over the issue of the leadership of Gus Hall. Davis became a founding member, along with others who had left the Party, of the Committees of Correspondence. The Committees sought to create a new socialist movement that would be more democratic and inclusive than the established parties of the American Left. Davis also remained active in issues such as women's rights.

DAVIS, BENJAMIN J. (1903–1964). A two-term Communist representative on the New York City Council (1943–1947), Benjamin J. Davis grew up in a privileged black family in Atlanta. His father, a Republican national committeeman, was able to send him to Amherst College and Harvard Law School. Davis's radicalization began when he assumed the defense of Angelo Herndon, a black Communist charged with "attempting to incite insurrection" as a result of his Depression-era organizing among Atlanta's unemployed. Conducting his defense before a white-supremacist judge and jury, Davis found inspiration in the Communist Party's advocacy of interracial solidarity and its outspoken criticism of racial segregation. He joined the Party during the trial, but was forced to leave Atlanta shortly after Herndon's conviction because of threats to his life.

Moving to New York, Davis became editor of the Harlem Liberator and an editor of the Daily Worker. Active in the National Negro Congress and numerous Harlem campaigns against racial discrimination, Davis became a popular figure in the community, with ties to ministers and politicians as well as Party activists. When Adam Clayton Powell, Jr., launched his campaign for Congress in 1942, he designated Davis as his chosen successor on the New York City Council. Winning Communist and American Labor Party endorsements, Davis won the election and was reelected by a larger margin in 1945. Popular with his constituents, Davis only lost his seat in the midst of Cold War tensions that led most of his former allies to break with him in the same year that proportional representation in council races was ended. In 1948 Davis was indicted under the Smith Act along with other members of the Communist Party's National Committee. He was convicted and spent several years in the federal penitentiary in Terre Haute, Indiana. When he was released, he returned to Harlem, but with the Communist Party a shell of its former self, he never recovered his popularity or influence.

DEBS, EUGENE V. (1855–1926). The closest thing to a folk hero ever produced by the American Left, Eugene Victor Debs was born to French parents in Terre Haute, Indiana, where his father ran a small grocery store. Named for the French novelists Eugène Sue and Victor Hugo, young Debs was a bright and inquisitive student who enrolled in high school briefly in 1870 before deciding to enter the world of work as a locomotive paint-scraper while continuing his studies as a nighttime business student. He joined the Brotherhood of Locomotive Firemen, not as the youthful firebrand of later legend, but more for the social and civic exposure and benefits that might accrue from membership in a mutual-benefit type of association.

Debs nurtured an idealistic worldview of harmony between employer and employee, with both groups obligated by mutual responsibilities to one another and the community around them. Debs toiled long and hard to fulfill his part of this social contract. He was elected city clerk and state representative in 1879 and 1884, respectively, with majority support in working-class and upper-class wards. The local newspaper christened him "the blue-eyed boy of destiny," as his oratory and political acumen hinted at fame and fortune to come.

His trade union career similarly proved a double helix of success. Debs was appointed editor of the Brotherhood's national journal in 1880 and became secretary-treasurer in 1885. He meted out his conservative philosophy to readers and members with a hiring-hall mentality, so that railroad managers could secure the best and brightest for the aristocracy of the rails. Debs pontificated against strikes in general and labeled the portentous 1877 general railroad walkout as signifying "anarchy and revolution" despite the cumulative wage reductions imposed on railroad workers. The Haymarket martyrs also received his scorn a decade later as upsetters of the social order. Debs's embrace of individual social mobility and liberty within a context of class cooperation became anachronistic in the confines of the Gilded Age's industrial vagaries. He never quite abandoned these youthful philosophies although he reluctantly began to criticize the growth of monopoly and the demise of individual freedom.

As corporate power increasingly threatened traditional American values by employing federal troops, court injunctions, and blacklists against workers, Debs slowly agonized over the changing situation. He reluctantly envisioned a federation of railroad workers to balance the growing power of industry rather than individual, centripetal craft unions. This was no sudden change on his part, but a poignant, time-consuming transformation in outlook much different from the "born radical" image of his contemporary biographers and followers. Nor was this Debs the Christlike figure of legend. He often attacked his foes unscrupulously, supported Jim Crow, and embraced nascent American imperialism.

By 1892 the contradictions between Debs's idealistic, old-fashioned belief system clashed irrevocably with the dictates of a changing world. He sadly resigned from the Brotherhood and developed a new type of organization, an undertaking that would propel him onto the national political scene for the next three decades.

As Debs reevaluated his earlier stands against strikes and union militance, he searched for the ingredient that would provide labor with the unity and power enjoyed by the industrial trusts without unleashing the mob atavism that haunted his visions of an enlightened socialist commonwealth. Abandoning his old emphasis on a skilled and elite work force, and blaming the new industrial order for undermining the skills of that work force, Debs created the American Railway Union (ARU) in 1893, an industrial-style federation open to all train workers who received a paycheck from a railroad corporation. The fledgling organization, as its first order of business, engaged the Great Northern Railroad, the bastion of the powerful James Hill, who had cut wages and fired union supporters in a familiar Gilded Age scenario. Debs wisely bridled the de facto and undisciplined militance of the rank and file into a peaceful and solid phalanx of support among competing crafts, Knights of Labor assemblies, and unskilled laborers. More important, he tactfully turned merchants, most notably Charles Pillsbury—the grain merchant dependent on timely transportation for his perishable product—against Hill and his policies, thus breaking capitalist unity in the strike.

The conflict was eventually settled in arbitration, but an arbitration imposed by the unity of the union. When the arbitrator ruled in its favor and restored wage levels, new members stampeded into the ARU not unlike the deluge the Knights of Labor had experienced in the first flush of their success in the mid-1880s. The boom raised the union's membership to a remarkable 150,000, outstripping the combined forces of all the other brotherhoods, which stood at just below 100,000. Debs still continued to blame individual robber barons like Hill for the ills of industrial society, rather than the system itself. On the heels of this major victory he boldly and prematurely proclaimed a new dawn of cooperation between management and labor through the collective-bargaining and arbitration process. Strikes, he stated, would soon be a thing of the past, a flash of wishful thinking reminiscent of the idealism of Terrence Powderly of the Knights of Labor.

The victory over James Hill, rather than serving as a harbinger of a new day in industrial relations, indirectly led to one of the greatest labor confrontations in U.S. history. The liberal membership policy of the ARU led to affiliation by factory workers at the Pullman car company in Chicago, who went on strike in 1894. The diet of wage cuts in an oppressive company town—"Pullmedown," as the residents sarcastically called it—provided an emotional backdrop to the ARU convention in June of that year. The delegates voted to initiate a national boycott against all trains with Pullman sleepers, which were still rented individually by the various railroads.

The General Managers Association, the governing body of railroad capital in the United States, saw an opportunity to destroy the upstart labor Lilliputian. As the boycott spread, the railroad chieftains had the government cynically invoke the Sherman Anti-Trust Act against the union, the first time that particular legislation was employed. Thousands of federal troops were sent into Chicago despite the lack of violence there. The presence of soldiers ironically engendered rioting, and Debs, like the Haymarket martyrs before him, was indicted for influencing the course of events.

Debs was sentenced to six months in jail in 1895 despite the courtroom heroics of defense lawyer Clarence Darrow. He spent his fortieth birthday there and read The Communist Manifesto. He left as a hero, with 100,000 citizens hailing his release in an impressive rally in Chicago on 22 November 1895. Debs became such a popular symbol that he was offered the Populist Party nomination for president the following year, but turned it down. The McKinley victory finally turned him leftward.

In the waning years of the nineteenth century, Eugene Debs was a soul in search of an institutional anchor and a meaningful ideology after the defeat of the ARU, which never resurrected itself from the debilitating Pullman showdown. He briefly instituted a quasi-political party, the Social Democracy of America, and flirted with a colonization scheme in the western United States. However, he soon gravitated to Victor Berger's new Social Democratic Party, the precursor to the Socialist Party. Debs had finally found the political antidote to the dislocations of the new industrial order.

Debs's own philosophical confusion in these years reflected the uncertainty in his audiences and seemed to create a sympathetic bonding with working-class America, which collectively shared his own anomie. In 1900 Debs was the standard-bearer for the Social Democratic Party, the first of five runs for the nation's top office. He barely polled 100,000 votes but managed to double that four years later. By 1912, Debs had garnered almost a million votes, six percent of the votes cast that year and the electoral high-water for the American Left. His lingering belief in the American Dream, an unsettled ingredient in his own socialist psyche, found sympathetic listeners outside the narrow circle of the already convinced.

Although he remained uneasy with union hierarchies, Debs tried to find a home with the infant Industrial Workers of the World (IWW), attending the founding convention in 1905. He remained close to the rank and file of that organization but was unable to handle the fractious personalities that made up the IWW leadership. By the eve of World War I, the Socialist Party had a flourishing media, a coterie of successful local candidates, and over 100,000 dues-paying members. Debs, while the titular head of the party, suffered greatly from insecurity and uncertainty. His marriage to Kate Metzger in 1885 had quickly turned to one of convenience. Debs often retreated from depression by visiting bordellos or bars. He also detested the internecine battles that rumbled through the Socialist Party and the American Left like thunderstorms on the western prairie. He often sacrificed himself as a peacemaker who never really brought peace but only an expedient, temporary truce.

As the capitalist parties appropriated the demands of the socialists, populists, and trade unions into their own platforms, considerable venom was taken from the socialist sting. When the Progressive era stumbled into World War I, Debs and the American Socialist Party held firm against imperialist war. Debs was determined to take a stand, even as the hard-won socialist gains unraveled in the growing wartime hysteria. Debs, who had always possessed a martyr complex, foresaw his own crucifixion—indeed toiled for it—as the once-powerful European socialist parties succumbed to individual nationalisms. In one of his most quoted passages he wrote: “I am not a capitalist soldier; I am a proletarian revolutionist. I am opposed to every war but one; I am for that war with heart and soul, and that is the world wide war of the social revolution. In that way, I am prepared to fight in any way the ruling class may make necessary, even to the barricades.” That rhetoric was designed to rally the socialists and taunt the authorities, who responded soon after American troops had been dispatched to Europe. Debs was arrested for sedition after a militant anti-war speech in Canton, Ohio, in June 1918.

At the age of sixty-three, with his beloved party hounded and repressed, Debs was sentenced to ten years in federal prison. He believed his incarceration might at least rally his followers and provide the cure to the political impotence he felt. He had proved his citizenship once again and earned the approbation of Lenin in revolutionary Russia. He began his sentence on the eve of the Red Scare, in April 1919, when it seemed that rebellion might shake America, too. But he rode to prison in a union train with not so much as a whisper of protest from his former co-workers.

Once ensconced at Atlanta Penitentiary, Debs became a protest candidate for the U.S. presidency for the fifth and last time in 1920. He railed at the system from within and taunted the prosecutors: “There are no bars and no walls for the man who in his heart is free, and there is no freedom for the man who in his heart is a slave.” His followers wore buttons, much prized by collectors today, that proclaimed VOTE FOR PRISONER 9653. Debs polled more than 900,000 votes, about the same as his 1912 total. He was pardoned on Christmas Day, 1921, in an unusual gesture by President-elect Harding. The convict sent his five dollars release money to the Sacco Vanzetti Defense Committee. The Debs that left Atlanta Penitentiary in 1921 was a different person from the one who had left the Chicago jail in 1895, and it was a different country as well. A large throng greeted him upon his return to Terre Haute, as others had earlier in Chicago, but Debs was in his twilight years now and the promise of social victory so alive a generation earlier had given way to despondency and defeat. He and his party had lost despite the intense loyalty of remaining members. The Russian Revolution had become the standard-bearer of the world Left and eclipsed the native socialism of Debs. He died on 20 October 1926.

DE CLEYRE, VOLTAIRINE (1866–1912). One of the most prolific anarchist writers of her time, Voltairine de Cleyre was educated in a Catholic convent. When her father converted from Free Thought to Catholicism while she was still in her early teens, he sent her to a Catholic convent in Sarnia, Ontario, Canada. Despite her protests and those of her mother, Voltairine's father insisted his daughter must become a nun. She remained in the convent for more than three years, sometimes running away, always disobedient, and forever despairing that she had no means of permanent escape. When she emerged at age nineteen, she was a crusading atheist who believed religion was a repulsive and oppressive institution. Upon hearing a speech by Clarence Darrow, she decided that capitalism should be added to the litany of world evils. She was soon reading Benjamin Tucker's Liberty. Her commitment to anarchism was sealed by the Haymarket affair.

Through the years she moved from individualistic anarchism tinged with pacifism to the direct-action approach of the International Workers of the World. In addition to European influences, she posited American roots for her ideas in the work of Thoreau, Jefferson, Paine, and Emerson. Whatever the momentary emphasis, she always directed her efforts to working-class audiences. She was enthusiastic about the educational ideas proposed by Francisco Ferrer and was among the first writers to argue that detective stories, sports writing, pornography, and even advertising could be regarded as literature in that they reflected the lives of common people. She frequently criticized anarchists such as Emma Goldman for being too elitist and directing their work to intellectuals and the middle class.

De Cleyre's personal life was tragic. Most men were put off by her learning and her lack of physical beauty; and the one man she felt she loved died when she was only twenty-seven. She later had an affair that resulted in the birth of a son. When she refused to live with the child's father, the baby was taken from her and she did not see her son again for seventeen years. This harsh collision with sexist laws and culture reinforced a feminism that found expression in poetry, oratory, fiction, and essays. A second tragedy took place in 1902, when she was shot by an opposing anarchist. Although she recovered, her always fragile health was shattered. Characteristically, she refused to press charges, stating her assailant should be sent to a mental facility, not a prison.

Her base of operations from 1889 to 1910 was Philadelphia, where she lived among poor Jewish immigrants. She taught English and music, and she learned Yiddish well enough to add the Freie Arbeter Shtimme to the many journals to which she contributed. As she grew closer to anarcho-syndicalism, she began to study Spanish in order to participate directly in the Mexican Revolution. Before she could relocate to Mexico she became ill from "brain fever" and died in Chicago on 12 June 1912.

De Cleyre's work soon went out of print and she was rarely cited. More than fifty years passed before her writing enjoyed a revival in conjunction with the reemerging women's movement. In many ways her chief work seemed to be the uncompromising manner in which she had led her life. A statement she had made shortly before her death spoke directly to the new feminists: "I die, as I have lived, a free spirit, an Anarchist, owing no allegiance to rulers, heavenly or earthly."

DE LEON, DANIEL (1852–1914). The first English-speaking intellectual to influence long-run trends in the American Left, Daniel De Leon could not build a successful socialist movement but he did elucidate powerful notions about the evolution of industrial society. He also created, within severe limits, a model "vanguard" party and a resolutely uncompromising daily press generations before the Communist Party undertook these tasks.

Born to Sephardic Dutch-Jewish parents on the Caribbean island of Curaçao, De Leon went abroad with his mother, attending European schools (albeit not the prestigious Leyden Academy, from which he later claimed to have graduated). Arriving in the United States between 1872 and 1874, De Leon taught secondary school in Westchester County, New York, attended Columbia Law School and graduated with honors. He opened law offices first in Texas and then New York, and finally gained a lectureship in International Law at Columbia. There, he lectured notably on the oppression of Latin America. He also was elected president of the new Academy of Political Science, and was one of the earliest contributors to the Political Science Quarterly.

Growing interested in the Henry George mayoralty campaign of 1886, De Leon abandoned his faith in patrician reform and commenced public activity for the Left. Denied the usual offer of a professorship following two terms as lecturer, De Leon resigned from Columbia in 1889. By this time, he had already been converted to socialist ideas through reading Edward Bellamy's Looking Backward, and he plunged himself into the New York Nationalist Clubs. Disappointed with the unclarity of the milieu, De Leon pressed on to the Socialist Labor Party (SLP), joining in 1891.

De Leon would gain much by a close reading of Marx and other socialist writers. But he carried within him the outlines of a general theory formulated in terms of contemporary natural science and social science. Like Charlotte Perkins Gilman and her evocative Woman and Economics or August Bebel and his Frau und der Sozialismus (of which De Leon himself would make the first American translation), De Leon looked to Darwinian "natural laws" of evolution and to the anthropology of Lewis Henry Morgan, which hinted at a return of humanity to a collective stage abandoned eons ago at a lower level of social development. De Leon expounded this theory of socialism's approach with a brilliance of logic no previous English-language speaker could summon.

Almost immediately, he added life to the SLP's municipal campaigns through multilingual oratory. Within months, he had become a touring lecturer, and soon after, the official editor of the new weekly, the People. This paper he transformed into a stern analytic sheet, improving labor reportage but writing editorial matter largely himself. With relatively few socialist papers in English, and most of those filled either with hayseed sentimentalism (as the Coming Nation) or local labor news (such as the Cleveland Citizen), the People appeared more socialist, more Marxist.

Convinced that the severe economic depression of the 1890s meant the end of capitalism, De Leon pursued a political agenda not unfamiliar to veteran socialists. Above all, he intended to throw off the caution accrued in decades of slight success, and the timid unwillingness to criticize the craft unions for their refusal to endorse the socialist movement (as was standard for most European labor). Like earlier dissenters from the SLP's main policies, he therefore called for aggressive political campaigns and a break with the conservatism of the American Federation of Labor (AFL). The exclusion of an SLP delegate from the 1890 AFL convention in Detroit seemed to demonstrate the hopelessness of the familiar tactical approach. De Leon's work from within the Knights of Labor, likewise drawing upon traditions of hostility toward purely economic unionism, ended in 1895 when the Knights' leadership reneged on a promise to make a socialist the editor of their official journal. Breaking off with the AFL the same year, De Leon personally led the creation of the Socialist Trades and Labor Alliance (ST&LA) as the alternative to both existing organizations.

De Leon's insistence upon the absolute political fealty of ST&LA leaders doomed the new movement after a few years. Meanwhile, opponents of De Leon had more and more abandoned the SLP, a development he greeted with jeering attacks upon the personalities of his critics. The SLP might have failed entirely but for a modestly rising vote and De Leon's own powerful rhetoric. During the 1890s and first years of the new century, he delivered a series of addresses that—reprinted in the People and virtually innumerable SLP editions—demonstrated his oratorical abilities and clarified his revolutionary perspectives.

De Leon's celebrity can be traced in no small part to the form of his lectures. He notoriously shunned the familiar crowd-pleasing devices, discouraging applause and seeking earnestly to provoke his audience into hard thought. In one of his most celebrated ruminations, Two pages from Roman History: Plebs Leaders and Labor Leaders (1902), De Leon used the historical example of the Gracchi brothers in Rome to argue his main strategic point. The proletariat, the first social class to emerge heir apparent yet collectively pauperized, had to compensate for its tactical weakness with an absolute clarity of aims. "The proletarian revolution . . . must avoid, as it would a pestilence, all alliance with any other class," any sign of weakness or dependence upon others. Only a political party with unity and clarity, De Leon's followers believed, could prove equal to the task of leading this vulnerable but potentially all-conquering class. Little real evidence of Marxist orthodoxy for these innovations could be demonstrated from doctrine, but De Leon had, like Lenin after him, genuinely captured a sentiment in Marx's interpretation of the Paris Commune as the wholesale replacement of the bourgeois order.

By the turn of the century, the SLP had been reduced to only a few thousand members, soon to be far outdistanced by the growing Socialist Party. Some of De Leon's trusted functionaries deserted him shortly. Efforts by immigrants of various kinds to attach their groups to the SLP rather than the Socialist Party generally ended in disappointment, with De Leon's stern unwillingness to yield any meaningful autonomy. But he and his faithful survived in a kind of splendid isolation. Reduced to personal penury, De Leon managed to bring out a Daily People, ultrarevolutionary if most unentertaining for a daily paper. He translated some thirteen volumes of Eugène Sue's "Proletariat Across the Ages" series, and Ferdinand Lassalle's play of bourgeois revolution, Franz von Sickingen. He made appearances at the Socialist International's European meetings, forcefully backing the sentiments of Lenin and Luxemburg. To the De Leonite, typically a self-educated member of the working class, De Leon seemed to incarnate the true revolutionary dedication to knowledge and proletarian strategy.

De Leon's last major political opportunity loomed with the 1905 founding of the Industrial Workers of the World (IWW). De Leon delivered perhaps his most heralded address, "The Preamble to the IWW," at the time of the convention, adding to Wobbly determination a social science-like perspective. The evolution of society, De Leon insisted, had outmoded the political state, and prepared the working class to abolish it in favor of a noncoercive, merely economic mechanism. This view had special attraction for socialists who observed the apparent electoral indifference or cynicism of the American working class at large, and who believed the Socialist Party was foolish to seek the impossible. Within industrial life itself—as many socialists and more conservative trade unionists had long since concluded—must therefore lie the answer to class injustice. De Leon supplied the theoretical formula with engaging logic of industrial inevitability, much as Gilman had depicted the emancipation of women through economic self-support.

At first, a certain reconciliation with Left-socialists such as Eugene Debs and the Western rank and file (largely spared the earlier rounds of faction fights) appeared in the offing. De Leon seemingly urged the unification of the Socialist and Socialist Labor parties, but obviously allowed for unity upon SLP principles.

Meanwhile, the fledgling IWW, beset by defections and splits (some of them encouraged by De Leon), absorbed this logic even while throwing off the SLP and its leader. The organization had formed just a few years too early for the strike wave of the unskilled and mostly foreign-born workers, 1909–1912, which gave flesh to the Wobblies' institutional and ideological bones. By that time, De Leon had been purged, and his small following had formed the "Detroit IWW" upon SLP principles—but not with any significant encouragement from De Leon himself.

Ironically, as De Leon faced maximum isolation, erstwhile disciples and others deeply influenced by him went on to become outstanding articulators of the industrial socialism idea. Justus Ebert and Ben H. Williams, acting within the IWW as pamphleteers and newspaper editors, interpreted the coming of the proletariat into its own. Frank Bohn and Austin Lewis, within the Socialist Party, urged a pro-IWW course, and Lewis in particular went further to reconcile IWW ideas with the main course of Marxist logic. Louis C. Fraina, who had joined the SLP at a tender age and served as the Daily People's correspondent during the Lawrence, Massachusetts, textile strike, made himself the proto-communist intellectual par excellence, interpreting the Russian soviets as workers' councils, as the IWW had hoped to see them. Even at the fringes of mainstream labor, longtime SLP loyalist Joseph Schlossberg served as radical second to Sidney Hillman in the Amalgamated Clothing Workers, urging forms of workers' control as a transition to true socialism.

The Daily People suspended publication in 1914, and De Leon died not long after. Some thirty-thousand people appeared at his funeral, a remarkable tribute to the leader of a sectarian organization which attracted relatively few members and retained fewer still. The party remained, after his death, utterly dedicated to his principles and memory, reprinting his essays in every Weekly People for generations and circulating his pamphlets widely.

DELLINGER, DAVID (b. 1915). Editor, activist, and one of the Chicago Seven, David Dellinger has provided continuity in publishing and activism between the pacifist Left of the 1940s and the radical movements spawned in the 1960s. Born to a family with roots in colonial New England, Dellinger graduated from Yale (1936), studied at New College, Oxford (1936–1937), Yale Divinity School (1938), and Union Theological Seminary (1939–1940). This background led him to be active in draft resistance during World War II.

In 1945 Dellinger was the moving force in the founding of Direct Action, a journal of radical pacifism. Three years later, as leader of a faction of the Committee for Nonviolent Revolution, he fostered a merger with Peacemakers, a group enjoying the support of A. J. Muste, Dwight Macdonald, and Milton Mayer. The resulting pacifist current, much influenced by Gandhi, viewed pacifism as an active movement for change, not simply a reactive defense against injustice. Pacifists would not only refuse any cooperation with the armed forces, but they would also attempt to close down missile bases nonviolently, refuse to pay the portion of any tax that went to the military, and hold vigils at factories producing chemical weapons such as poison gas. Concepts such as participatory democracy and civil disobedience were to be at the heart of all activity. To promote such views, Dellinger helped found and became the first editor of Liberation, a journal that influenced many individuals who were to be prominent in the early phases of the New Left. A regular Liberation contributor was anarchist Paul Goodman.

With the advent of the Vietnam War, Dellinger became a well-known public figure. He was a featured speaker at the first teach-in at Berkeley (1965) and was co-chair of the Spring Mobilization to End the War in Vietnam (1966). He also visited Hanoi in 1966 and set up a relationship that would bring numerous anti-war Americans to Vietnam and would lead to the release of some American prisoners of war. Dellinger became especially noted as a reliable debunker of State Department disinformation regarding the war. Following the street riots connected with the Democratic National Convention in 1968, Dellinger and six others were arrested for conspiracy to foment riot in what became the landmark legal battle of the era. The successful defense of the Chicago Seven, or Conspiracy Seven, took on international dimensions and became the subject of at least two films.

In the decade of the 1970s Dellinger was involved in the ill-fated attempt to establish Seven Days as a radical slick weekly on the model of Time and Newsweek. Since that time he has concentrated his efforts on various aspects of the nuclear energy problem, from preventing nuclear war to closing down nuclear power plants.

"DETROIT" INDUSTRIAL WORKERS OF THE WORLD/WORKERS INTERNATIONAL INDUSTRIAL UNION.

At the fourth convention of the Industrial Workers of the World (IWW) in Chicago in 1908, many Socialist Labor Party (SLP) adherents were refused seats. This action reflected the tension between "direct action" and "political" elements within the IWW that had been growing since their coalition ousted Charles O. Sherman and his faction from the IWW administration in 1906. Direct actionists like Vincent St. John and William Trautmann targeted SLP leader Daniel De Leon in particular, and many (but not all) of the pro-SLP delegates at the convention left with De Leon. These delegates (without De Leon) reconvened some three months later in Paterson, New Jersey, declared the Chicago convention illegal, and decided (according to SLP official Olive Johnson, over De Leon's objections) to continue their version of the IWW, "industrial unionism on the civilized plane." They established headquarters in New York in early 1909. Several locals that had been affiliated with the IWW withdrew from the Chicago organization, and most declared affiliation with this "New York" IWW. Virtually nothing came of it initially. Organizing and administration were at a standstill until the resignation of the union's officers and the transfer of the union office to Detroit under the care of longtime SLP and Socialist Trades and Labor Alliance activist Hermann Richter in late 1909.

Richter energized the "Detroit" IWW (DIWW) locally at first, with new locals appearing around the city in a variety of industries. Next, the union began to expand nationally, aided by the founding of the union's newspaper, Industrial Union News, in 1912. While the union's first industrial action took place among ladies' tailors in Detroit in 1909, the union's most important early local consisted of silk workers in Paterson, New Jersey, one of the original "defectors" in the town that hosted the DIWW's first convention. Both IWWs had locals in Paterson, but the DIWW local emerged from the factional fray (and a legal dispute over IWW property) as the stronger. Among its membership were skilled organizers like Rudolph Katz, Boris Reinstein, H. J. Rubinstein, and Joseph Yannarelli. Approximately twelve-thousand silk workers fought the introduction of speed-up tactics in 1912 by joining the DIWW and striking some forty-seven operators. DIWW workers took their strike to other New Jersey towns and into Pennsylvania mills, but this overextended its resources. The union appealed to the SLP, but organizers lent to the DIWW by the party tended to work toward organizing workers into the party rather than on union issues. The workers reached agreement with their bosses in an accord that did not include recognition, and it did not hold. When the silk factory owners reneged and workers walked out again in early 1913, they left the exhausted DIWW and turned to the Chicago IWW for help.

After the Paterson strike, an uneasy tension grew between DIWW and SLP officials over their programs. Union members saw their organization as the key to stirring revolutionary consciousness and resisted party influence, while many SLP members wanted the union to be an appendage of the party. Richter continually called upon party members to pay dues to and assist in organizing the DIWW. SLP national secretary Paul Augustine usually skirted the issue in polite fashion, and while he led the party relations between the organizations' leaders remained friendly. With the accession of Arnold Peterson to the position in 1914, however, the relationship between party and union became increasingly hostile. Peterson was convinced that the union was disruptive and a drain in terms of both labor and funds. It was not a baseless accusation: Richter continued to chide SLP members for their lack of support while requesting loans for union operations that were seldom repaid, and DIWW members managed to trigger some factionalization within the SLP, particularly in Seattle and Los Angeles. As time passed, the DIWW became a repository for dissident and expelled SLP members, as well as a place where Socialist Party and SLP adherents could join together in concerted action.

Despite the chilly interorganizational relations, the union was able to perform some significant organizing work in the aftermath of Paterson. Organizing continued nationwide, particularly in the tobacco, furniture making, metal and machinery, and textile industries. It also expanded worldwide with locals appearing in Britain, South Africa, and Australia. As a means of distancing the DIWW from its rival and namesake, members voted to change the organization's name to the Workers International Industrial Union (WIIU) in 1915. World War I caused a decline in membership, but the name change proved useful when the U.S. government cracked down on the IWW for its anti-war position—WIIU property was seized and returned. In the most significant industrial action after Paterson, Rudolph Katz founded two independent unions of furniture workers in Jamestown, New York, which he brought into the WIIU in 1917. Coordinated action on several fronts led to a prolonged strike there, and union membership reached its second peak in 1919, but tensions between the union and the party eventually brought WIIU organizing activity to a standstill. Pro-SLP members ousted Richter in December 1919, installing Peterson's ally Isaac Shenkan as general secretary-treasurer. By this time, however, the WIIU rank and file were fighting hard against the extreme centralizing of the SLP. Shenkan quickly came to identify with this position; relations continued to deteriorate, and he was ousted in 1922 for another presumed Peterson ally, E. A. La France. When he also came to identify with the union more than the party, the SLP leader moved to destroy the union. Party officials ordered SLP members to concentrate entirely on SLP activity in 1923, and the union dwindled to around one hundred members. Peterson then "ordered" its liquidation in 1924. Assets and records passed to party control, but a small core of members kept the dream alive until at least 1927, when they found their way into the Industrial Union Party and other groupings.

DEWEY, JOHN (1859–1952). One of the most influential philosophers, educators, and social reformers in the United States, John Dewey was a member or founder of innumerable political organizations and a lifelong defender of unpopular causes. He intervened in every major social issue—from the Great Depression and the world wars to the Spanish Civil War and the Moscow Trials—with a progressive viewpoint that consistently rooted social conflicts in the workings of the capitalist economy.

Initially, Dewey flirted with socialist ideas such as guild socialism and nationalization of key industries. But with the rise of totalitarianism in Germany and Russia, Dewey, like so many other intellectuals, softened his earlier radicalism and concluded that the most urgent task was to defend existing democratic rights, however imperfect. Yet he never went so far, unlike his student Sidney Hook, as to enlist in the Right. As a testament to his enduring progressivism, at the age of seventy-eight Dewey traveled to Mexico in 1937 to head the commission investigating the charges against Leon Trotsky in the Moscow Trials, publishing Not Guilty the same year.

A central figure of the philosophical school known as pragmatism, Dewey argued that philosophy should abandon its sterile metaphysical pursuits and apply itself in a practical manner toward the amelioration of social life. While Dewey made major contributions in virtually every area of philosophy, he is best known for his philosophy of education, which stated that the evils of capitalism could be remedied through the proper inbuing of creativity, democratic values, and scientific intelligence.

There are strong similarities between Dewey's philosophy and that of Karl Marx (whom Dewey misinterpreted as a mechanistic materialist). These include a common heritage in Hegel, a strong historical sense, a repudiation of individualism as anathema to democracy, a rejection of all dualistic categories, and a belief in evolution and naturalism (self-realization through interaction with nature). Such parallels have led many writers to seek a rapprochement between the two thinkers. Philosopher Sidney Hook has gone so far as to argue that Deweyism is the genuine fulfillment of Marxism. But the similarities end abruptly on a key point: Marx insisting on the revolutionary overthrow of capitalism, and Dewey embracing pragmatic reform and rejecting Marxism as "unscientific utopianism."

Trotsky, who engaged in a famous debate with Dewey on the question of means and ends in the revolutionary process (Dewey insisting that a democratic result required a democratic process), saw an extreme danger in Dewey's philosophy insofar as it seduced radicals into accepting a reformist program. At Trotsky's urging, George Novack wrote a powerful Marxist critique of Dewey's philosophy. Novack, later to be a leading intellectual in the Socialist Workers Party, emphasized the virtues of Dewey the man and the considerable value of his philosophy over previous bourgeois philosophies, but sharply condemned pragmatism as an insidious apology for capitalism and class collaboration. It remains a contradiction of pragmatism that the experimentalism it championed was not rigorously applied to the socialist experiment itself.

DIETZGEN, JOSEPH (1828–1888). Born near Cologne in 1828, Joseph Dietzgen was a tanner by trade and was almost entirely self-educated—hence his nickname, "the Proletarian Philosopher." He participated in the Revolution of 1848 and was forced to flee to America. In 1884 he became editor of Der Sozialist, the official weekly of the Socialist Labor Party. Moving to Chicago two years later, he became editor of the Chicagoer Vorbote, the paper of the Haymarket anarchists—a development that caused much friction with the Socialist Labor Party and strengthened Dietzgen's anarchist sympathies. As he stated, "While anarchists may have many mad and brainless individualists in their ranks, the socialists have an abundance of cowards."

Dietzgen, one of the first original philosophers among American Marxists, developed "materialist dialectics" independently of Marx and Engels through his readings of Hegel, Kant, and Spinoza. His first book, The Nature of Human Brain Work, explaining the dialectical nature of the thinking process, appeared in 1869. His collected letters and essays were published posthumously by Charles H. Kerr. Dietzgen's views were popular with the editors of the Left-socialist International Socialist Review, which published a number of articles about him.

Dietzgen emphasized the provisional nature of theory and thus opposed dogmatic and positivist Marxism. A radical monist, he dismissed the "reflection theory" of cognition (ideas as a mirror of the "material world") as dualistic ideology. Certain aspects of his thought have affinities with pragmatism and phenomenology. His libertarian dialectic challenged the influence mechanistic materialism had on socialism, but with the rise of the Communist Party and dialectical materialism, Dietzgen was pushed into obscurity. Henrietta Roland-Holst and Anton Pannekoek of the Dutch-German Left were Dietzgenists, as were many members of the Industrial Workers of the World, the Socialist Party of Canada, the World Socialists, and the Proletarian Party.

DIRECT ACTION is a concept that was widely circulated within the American working class by the Industrial Workers of the World (IWW) during its heyday as a mass organization (1905–1924). The essence of the doctrine was that workers should strive for immediate redress of grievances at the point of production rather than pinning their hopes on third parties such as courts, government, mass media, or even union officials. Slowdowns and strikes of every kind were the most common form of direct action. Whether violent acts were permissible remained unclear, and some IWW speakers complicated the issue by using direct action and sabotage as interchangeable terms.

The most typical IWW direct actions were massive nonviolent parades and civil disobedience; IWW literature stressed that workers had to learn how to use "mental" dynamite such as striking with their fists in their pockets. Nonetheless, some IWW songs and literature implied that there were circumstances where violence could not be ruled out. The reality was that the IWW was purposely ambiguous about its definition of direct action and sabotage in much the way civil rights leaders of the 1960s were ambiguous about the meaning of the phrase "by any means necessary." IWW activists got additional psychological mileage out of this verbal ambiguity by using a menacing black cat and the slogan We Never Forget on agitational literature.

Direct action again became a frequently urged tactic during the formative years of the Congress of Industrial Organizations—this time without the complementary evocation of the word sabotage. Nowadays, direct action is most likely to be advocated by militant caucuses and other groups seeking to revive the trade union movement. In those situations, rank-and-file members may be urged to take direct action against their own leadership as well as management and the state.

DISABILITY RIGHTS MOVEMENT. The disabled—no longer called handicapped because they are not in a race—do not wish to be considered victims of their disabilities and certainly not of the wheelchairs which some of them use; nor do they want to be called sufferers, because they are demanding not pity but basic human rights. The disabled are a difficult group to define. Little people, no longer called midgets, do not consider themselves disabled although they have similar accessibility and acceptance problems, and many of the deaf consider themselves merely part of a culture that communicates by signing, not necessarily a disability. The disabled are the largest American minority: George Bush and others used the figure forty-three million during the debate over the 1990 Americans with Disabilities Act (ADA). Everyone is a potential member of the group, as joking references to the non-disabled as NYDs (not yet disabled) make clear. Disabilities affect each person uniquely, so the boundaries of the group are vague. The term disability community usually includes those who provide support services for disabled friends, family members, or employers.

Although the poor and victims of racism are disabled in disproportionate numbers and the expensive American medical establishment in fact precipitates poverty, disability knows no socioeconomic boundaries and its implications for the class struggle are easily missed. For instance, Dorothea Dix's effort during the 1840s to better conditions for the mentally ill and the disabled was the only reform movement not to be associated with the abolition of slavery and thus to receive support in slaveholding areas. American wars disabled many, but the sympathy and benefits received by veterans were not extended to those whose disabilities could be considered in any way hereditary or endemic among the poor. These groups became targets of eugenicists and social Darwinists and, in Europe, of the Nazis.

One-eyed Big Bill Haywood of the Industrial Workers of the World was one of many who were disabled in industrial accidents and Helen Keller campaigned for the Socialists, but hunchbacked anti-war activist Randolph Bourne was unique among early American radicals, as Antonio Gramsci was in Europe, in analyzing the relationship of physical disability to other social issues. Mainstream political leaders have frequently been disabled but have seldom identified with disability rights. Franklin D. Roosevelt promoted the Social Security Act of 1935, which provided the first permanent federal assistance for the disabled, and many places were discreetly ramped for him; but FDR and the media conspired to keep the true extent of his disability from the public, and none of his memorials depict him in the wheelchair he normally used.

Civil rights and related ferments of the 1960s provided the impetus that has made the disabled a part of many Left coalitions. Ed Roberts, who could never be far from his iron lung, learned protest techniques from the free speech movement at Berkeley and learned to reject the argument that "anatomy is destiny" from feminists. He founded Centers for Independent Living and then headed the California Department of Rehabilitation, an agency that had once declared his hope for a job "infeasible." His eventual successor at Centers for Independent Living, Judy Heumann, had founded New York's Disabled in Action in 1970 after protesting the Vietnam War and forcing the New York school board to certify her as a teacher even though she used a wheelchair. After she led a twenty-five-day sit-in at the San Francisco office of the Department of Health, Education and Welfare in 1977, Secretary Joseph Califano signed regulations to enforce Section 504 of the Rehabilitation Act of 1973, which forbade job discrimination against the disabled in language copied from the Civil Rights Act of 1964. Children's advocate Marian Wright Edelman used her civil rights experience to lobby effectively for the 1975 Individuals with Disabilities Education Act, which provides mainstream education for 750,000 formerly excluded young people.

At the intersection of Colfax and Broadway in Denver on 5 July 1978, nineteen persons in wheelchairs from the Atlantis Community blocked two city buses for twenty-four hours. Atlantis was a group of former nursing home residents who had liberated themselves and were now helping each other to live independently. It had been founded in 1975 by Wade Blank, who had marched in Selma and counseled anti-war Kent State students as a Presbyterian minister in Akron. He had helped start a youth wing in a Denver-area nursing home but was fired for helping his charges set up independent living situations. Blank suggested the bus blockade when the inaccessibility of public transportation frustrated the efforts of the disabled to help each other in widely separated location. The incident is now commemorated by a plaque on the site and is the disability rights equivalent of Rosa Parks's refusal to give up her bus seat. Parks, ironically, gave in to pressure from Detroit mayor Coleman Young and reneged on her promise to join a demonstration of the disabled against the American Public Transportation Association in 1986.

Nonviolent direct action against inaccessible transport soon spread to other cities, frequently coordinated by the Denver group. In 1983 Blank organized American Disabled for Accessible Public Transportation (ADAPT), an advocacy group that soon had well-trained locals in many areas. The fight for the ADA linked ADAPT with conservative Republicans like Justin Dart, Jr., and Evan Kemp, who persuaded George Bush to sign the bill. The desire of the disabled to be deinstitutionalized, take charge of their own lives, and contribute to the economy appeals to many conservatives, although others are influenced by institutions with a vested interest in the status quo. The implications of restructuring employment to fit human needs rather than forcing people to adapt to conditions set by bosses are obvious to the Right as well as the Left. After the ADA victory, ADAPT became American Disabled for Attendant Programs Today, which seeks to redirect Medicaid money from nursing homes to independent living.

DISSENT. In early 1954 the first volume of Dissent, a new independent socialist journal edited by Irving Howe and Lewis Coser, appeared on a few select newsstands. It was not the most auspicious season for launching a new radical quarterly, and the editors were suitably modest in their initial statement of purpose. Dissent's editors were only too aware that "in America today there is no significant socialist movement and that, in all likelihood, no such movement will appear in the immediate future." Dissent began with a dual purpose in mind: to reexamine the socialist tradition and to challenge the prevailing conservative tide in American political and intellectual life. Most of the journal's founders had come out of the Trotskyist movement (with representatives of both American and European Trotskyism among them); while they remained anti-Stalinist and (for the most part) socialist in conviction, they believed that all the leading variants of Marxist orthodoxy had proven inadequate guides to understanding the tragedies confronted by the Left in the twentieth century.

For all its gloomy prognoses about the future of socialism, from its earliest issues Dissent offered a combative and forward-looking political vision. In Harold Rosenberg's 1955 article "Couch Liberalism and the Guilty Past," Dissent took aim at the liberal capitulation to McCarthyism; in Norman Mailer's "The White Negro," published in 1957, Dissent anticipated the appearance of a new radical movement that would challenge the cultural as well as political status quo. The journal enthusiastically welcomed the appearance of the civil rights movement and the revival of campus activism in the early 1960s. As the journal's circulation and influence rose, Dissent's editors began to speak optimistically about the prospects for the "democratic Left": "Perhaps," Irving Howe wrote in 1963, "we should venture a little into hypothetical 'program-making'—what we would say if there were a significant socialist movement in the U.S." But Howe and Dissent grew critical of the New Left, as young radicals increasingly looked to Cuba, Vietnam, and China for models of revolutionary heroism and development. The journal's commitment to anti-Stalinism remained fierce and inflexible. Although the journal opposed the Vietnam War, it was reluctant to see the Left sever useful connections with liberals in the Johnson administration. As a result, it was largely ignored when not denounced by the New Left, and it increasingly commented on contemporary events in a distant and embittered tone. Howe later decided that he had "overreacted" in some of his disputes with the New Left: "I told myself that I was one of the few people who took the New Left seriously enough to keep arguing with it. Cold comfort."

Unlike most New Left publications, Dissent survived the 1960s and continued to serve as the most important American journal espousing democratic socialism. Closely associated with Democratic Socialists of America in the 1980s, it attracted new contributors and editors, as it attacked Reaganism with the same fervor that it had earlier devoted to its challenge of McCarthyism. Shortly before Irving Howe's death in 1992, Dissent added a third editor, Mitchell Cohen. He and Michael Walzer continued Dissent's traditions largely unchanged, drifting centerward on race and gender issues in the late 1990s, but seeking to maintain both a social democratic intellectual tradition and unflinching support of Israel.

DISTRICT 65, UNITED AUTOMOBILE WORKERS.

The origins of District 65 of the United Automobile Workers can be traced to the Wholesale Drygoods Workers Union (WDGU), organized in September 1933 at H. Eckstein, a dry goods warehouse on New York's Lower East Side. The union was founded by male Jewish workers led by Arthur Osman, a salesperson at the firm. At the same time, textile warehouse workers were organizing in New York's garment center. Led by a young radical, David Livingston, their militant activities won them a Congress of Industrial Organizations (CIO) charter from Sidney Hillman as Local 65 of the Textile Workers Organizing Committee. In August WDGU merged with the smaller CIO Textile House Workers to become the Wholesale and Warehouse Employees Union, Local 65, CIO, and membership began to increase dramatically. In September 1937 Local 65 came under the jurisdiction of the newly chartered CIO national union, United Retail and Wholesale Employees of America (URWEA).

The beginning of World War II ended the first phase in the union's growth. Along with other CIO unions, 65 adopted the "no strike" pledge and vigorously supported the war effort. The war period was characterized by a dramatic shift in union tactics. Instead of confrontation the union turned to the War Labor Board to resolve conflicts. Over ten-thousand members served in the armed forces or joined war-related industries, depleting the ranks of the union pioneers. Women became a majority and took increased leadership roles.

From the outset the new union had combined an ideological emphasis on democratic, mass participation and left-wing politics. Local 65 maintained very close ties to the Communist Party. The union generally followed Party policies until 1950. What distinguished Local 65 from many other left-wing unions was the consistent effort to generate support from the rank and file for these policies.

Between 1937 and 1948, Local 65, the largest local in URWEA, was at the center of a group of left-wing locals in New York City that were locked in a bitter conflict with their International. Local 65's influence far exceeded its size and its importance in the city economy. Particularly close cooperation developed between Local 65 and the Department Store Workers Union.

Differences between the left-wing New York locals and the national leadership, including a dispute over compliance with the Taft-Hartley Act, led to a split in the Retail, Wholesale, and Department Store Employees of America in September 1948. Eight of the largest New York locals, representing thirty-thousand workers (including the department stores), seceded to form the Distributive Trade Council with Arthur Osman as president.

In February 1950 the Distributive Workers Union (DWU), a new international union outside the CIO, was formed by the dissident locals. Osman headed the International and David Livingston became president of Local 65. In 1950 DWU leadership signed the non-Communist affidavits required by the Taft-Hartley law to minimize the danger of raiding by CIO locals protected by the National Labor Relations Board.

In 1950 the DWU merged with the remnants of the United Office and Professional Workers of America (UOPWA) and Food, Tobacco, and Agricultural Workers Union (FTA), both expelled from the CIO for Communist domination, to form the Distributive, Processing, and Office Workers of America (DPOWA). This grouping may have been an effort to build a left-wing alternative to the CIO. Local 65, now District 65, DPOWA, became the dominant force within the new entity. Conflict quickly developed between the merged unions. The UOPWA and FTA membership had been decimated, and they provided little in actual resources or members. Additionally, there was a clash of organizational cultures between the rank-and-file character of Local 65 and the "top down" structure of the UOPWA.

In early 1952 District 65 openly broke with the Communist Party over the issue of reunification with the CIO. A short internal struggle for control of the union ended with the defeat of Communist candidates in the unionwide election in June 1952. The contest was never in doubt. Most union staff and active members, many of whom were Communists, chose to remain with the union rather than continue to ally themselves with the increasingly faction-ridden and vulnerable Party.

At the same time, the union was being investigated for its left-wing activities by a federal grand jury (April 1952) and congressional committees (July 1953). With the approval of the membership, the national leaders refused to answer questions regarding their political beliefs or associations.

With the effective demise of the Left, District 65 sought affiliation with the CIO. The DPOWA rejoined the Retail, Wholesale and Department Store Union (RWDSU) in 1954, becoming District 65, RWDSU, CIO, with David Livingston as president.

Following the merger District 65 turned inward. The union's priorities became the efficient servicing of the membership, consolidation of new industries (direct mail), and new organization. With a strong and viable base in New York, the union expanded to New Jersey and then nationally. The union integrated its leadership ranks, advancing black leaders to important organizational positions to represent the shift in the racial composition of the membership.

District 65 remained active in progressive politics, particularly civil rights. The union provided money and early support for Rev. Martin Luther King, Jr. Cleveland Robinson, secretary-treasurer of District 65, was a national coordinator for the March on Washington in 1963. Opposition to the war in Vietnam led District 65 to become one of the founding unions in Labor for Peace. In that capacity David Livingston traveled to Hanoi in 1969. The union's consistent opposition to the conservative policies of the American Federation of Labor and Congress of Industrial Organizations heralded the entry of "sixties issues" into the labor movement even while it supported the Democratic Party.

In 1969 District 65 again disaffiliated from the RWDSU over differences on civil rights, foreign policy, and commitment to new organizing. It formed the Distributive Workers of America (DWA) with ten other seceding locals in seven states. Notably the Department Store Workers, with ten-thousand members, refused to leave the International and ended their formal ties with District 65. The new DWA joined with the United Automobile Workers (UAW) and the Teamsters to form the short-lived Alliance for Labor Action. The DWA remained unaffiliated until 1981, when the DWA formally affiliated with the UAW to form District 65, UAW. In the 1990s, owing to financial problems and a desire for greater organizational clarity, the various units in District 65 were attached to other union locals and District 65 ceased to exist as an organizational entity.

DOBBS, FARRELL (1907–1983). Best known as a talented trade union organizer—particularly in the International Brotherhood of Teamsters (IBT)—and as a leader of the Socialist Workers Party (SWP), which sought to apply the ideas of Lenin and Trotsky to U.S. conditions, Farrell Dobbs was born in Queen City, Missouri. The son of lower-level manager in the coal industry, he began his political career as a registered Republican and supporter of Herbert Hoover. His thinking changed during the Depression, however, and his first contact with left-wing ideas occurred in 1933, when he became involved in Teamsters Local 574 while working as a coal heaver at the Pittsburgh Coal Company in Minneapolis, Minnesota. Key activists in the local were the well-known Dunne brothers (Vincent R., Miles, and Grant) and Carl Skoglund, all of whom were seasoned veterans of the Industrial Workers of the World, socialist and communist movements, and were Trotskyists. Admiring the leadership these activists displayed in a successful coal strike in early 1934, Dobbs decided to join the Minneapolis branch of the Communist League of America, which was the forerunner of the SWP.

The Dunne brothers and Skoglund went on to initiate the Minneapolis Teamsters strike of 1934; the struggle turned into a militant general strike that ultimately made Minneapolis a union town. Dobbs was centrally involved in this struggle as chief picket dispatcher, helping to pioneer techniques such as the "flying wedge" that were instrumental in the workers' victory. In 1935 Dobbs and his comrades fought off attempts by IBT president Dan Tobin to drive the Trotskyists out of Local 574. Reconstituted as Local 544, the Teamsters local elected Dobbs as its recording secretary.

Dobbs played an important role in Teamster organizing drives of 1936 and 1937, which drew into the IBT 125,000 new members covered by a pioneering master contract over an eleven-state area. The impact and success of the Trotskyist organizers moved Tobin to hire Dobbs as an IBT staffer in 1939, though he resigned the following year to devote his energies to working as the SWP's trade union director. During this period he journeyed to Mexico to discuss issues facing the labor and socialist movements with Leon Trotsky. Convicted under the first Smith Act trial, in 1941, he served thirteen months in Sandstone Prison in 1944–1945 for defending revolutionary socialist ideas.

Dobbs was an increasingly prominent leader of the SWP. An editor of the weekly Militant from 1943 to 1948, he became the party's first candidate for the U.S. presidency in 1948 (and again in 1952, 1956, and 1960). He and Tom Kerry—a veteran from the SWP's maritime faction—became the organization's central figures during the 1950s, after party leader James P. Cannon went into semi-retirement. Dobbs served as the SWP's national chairman from 1949 to 1953 and as its national secretary until 1972. Between 1972 and 1977 the organization published his valuable four-volume history of the Teamster struggles, although after the mid-1970s he became relatively inactive in party work. Dobbs spent his last ten years in California and died 31 October 1983.

DOMBROWSKI, JAMES ANDERSON (1897–1983). For thirty-seven years, between 1929 and 1966, James Anderson Dombrowski sought to build United Front coalitions in the South, first among the region's few progressive religious leaders, then during industrial union drives, and finally, during the civil rights movement. A Christian Socialist, he was reviled by the South's elected politicians as "Public Enemy Number One." He was equally anathema to much of the political Left, scorned by Communist Party members as a liberal while feared by many liberals as a Communist.

Dombrowski was born in Tampa, Florida, the only son of first-generation English and Polish immigrants. His mother died when he was five, and his father, who owned a jewelry store, died ten years later. The Methodist Church dominated young Dombrowski's early years, first in Tampa, and later, after World War I, when he enrolled at Emory University. Through Dr. Harry F. Ward at Union Theological Seminary in New York, and the social turbulence of the 1920s, Dombrowski became an organizer. He was arrested in Elizabethton, Tennessee, in 1929 during strikes at three rayon mills. He joined the Highlander Folk School in 1933, teaching miners and mill and farm workers leadership and organizing skills until 1942, when he became director of the Southern Conference for Human Welfare (SCHW).

Determined that SCHW would challenge the exploitation of labor, blacks, and women, either through organizing, political education, or electoral politics, Dombrowski was soon under fire. In 1948 he was hauled before a Nashville, Tennessee, grand jury investigating subversion. The same year he was arrested for violating the Birmingham, Alabama, Jim Crow law while speaking at the all-black Southern Negro Youth Congress. A year later, he was ousted from the SCHW in a bitter membership fight, mostly over his United Front views.

Without pause, he founded the interracial Southern Conference Educational Fund (SCEF) to confront racism. As with SCHW, SCEF's influence extended beyond its membership or resources. In 1954 Dombrowski refused to give the U.S. Senate Internal Security Subcommittee SCEF's membership list. In 1963, having arranged a conference on civil rights attended by black and white lawyers in New Orleans, he was arrested for subversion by Louisiana officials, who seized all SCEF's records, handing them over to U.S. senator James Eastland. On grounds that his first amendment guarantees had been violated, Dombrowski took his argument to the U.S. Supreme Court, which found in his favor in 1965 in Dombrowski v. Pfister, concluding that the arrest had "a chilling effect" on freedom of speech. A year later, Dombrowski, hobbled by arthritis, left SCEF, devoting his remaining years to less direct civil rights activities, mostly in New Orleans, and to oils and watercolors that evidenced his strongly held social views.

DOMINGO, WILFRED A. (1889–1968). A Jamaican nationalist and journalist, Wilfred A. Domingo was associated with a series of West Indian-led movements as well as with the Socialist Party in Harlem, and participated in the publication of the Negro World, Emancipator, Messenger, and Crusader. He was instrumental in shaping the young Marcus Garvey's ideas on race consciousness and later fostered Garvey's political career in New York by introducing him to leading activists. He became the first editor of the Negro World, but his class-conscious editorials soon drew Garvey's ire. Abandoning Garvey's Universal Negro Improvement Association in 1919, Domingo continued as a member of the Socialist Party's speakers' bureau and taught at the party's Rand School in New York. He castigated the party's failure to make organization among blacks a priority, and cautioned in a 1919 essay seized in a Lusk Committee (an anti-Red investigative body) raid that this avoidance would result in blacks continuing to serve as strikebreakers without class identification with white workers, and, potentially, as a capitalist-led mercenary army in the event of social revolution. He was active in Cyril Briggs's African Blood Brotherhood in the early 1920s. In the thirties he returned to his earlier focus on Jamaican nationalism, and in 1936 formed the Jamaica Progressive League (JPL) with other New York-based West Indian immigrants. The self-described "militant liberal" JPL platform supported self-government, universal suffrage, unionization, and the organization of consumer cooperatives, arguing that in Jamaica the primary conflict was not between capitalists and an industrialized, urban proletariat, but between imperialist powers and a large peasantry combined with an undeveloped petite bourgeoisie. A JPL branch was founded in Jamaica in December 1938 and soon merged with Norman Manley's People's National Party. Domingo participated in these changes in Jamaica as vice-chair of the Trades Union Advisory Council and as contributor to the Labour Weekly. He returned to New York in 1947 and in the 1950s opposed the leadership of the People's National Party.

DOS PASSOS, JOHN (1896–1970). A leading writer of the Great Depression, John Dos Passos forged a career that spanned from the post–World War I years to the Vietnam War era. Admired for his experimental techniques, he published more than a dozen novels dramatizing major episodes in twentieth-century America. He also traversed the political spectrum from far Left to far Right.

Born the illegitimate son of the mistress of a married Portuguese immigrant who had become a successful corporation lawyer, Dos Passos spent his early years traveling semi-clandestinely about the United States and abroad with his mother. It was to these unusual circumstances of his birth and childhood that he would later attribute his lifelong sense of rootlessness.

After graduating from Harvard in 1916, he served as a volunteer in ambulance units in war-torn Europe and then was inducted into the U.S. Army. His first novels, One Man's Initiation—1917 (1920) and the far superior Three Soldiers (1921), established the predominant anti-war and semi-anarchist themes of his radical period. Manhattan Transfer (1925) dramatized the isolation and rapid movement of city life.

His masterwork was U.S.A., a 1,450-page trilogy consisting of The 42nd Parallel (1930), 1919 (1932), and The Big Money (1936). Conceived as a new kind of book that interweaved the historical and personal, U.S.A. introduced new formalistic devices such as a "Newsreel" and "Camera Eye," which were mixed with poem-biographies and traditional realistic narrative.

In the 1930s the politics of U.S.A. seemed to confirm Dos Passos's growing connections with the far Left. In 1926 he had assisted in founding the New Masses, soon a Communist Party-affiliated magazine. In 1927 he was arrested while picketing on behalf of the incarcerated anarchists Sacco and Vanzetti, and his New Masses articles on the subject were published as Facing the Chair. In 1928 he took an extended trip to the Soviet Union, and his reports were sufficiently favorable to be published in the Party press.

In 1931 he traveled to Harlan County, Kentucky, with a Communist-initiated delegation to investigate the condition of striking miners, where he was indicted for "criminal syndicalism." In 1932 he publicly endorsed the Communist Party's presidential candidate. As late as 1937, The Big Money was voted the best novel of the year by the Communist-led American Writers Congress.

Nevertheless, the trilogy embodied ambiguities that are clearer in retrospect. While the first volumes affirm a Marxist class analysis—emphasized by the sympathetic biographical portraits of John Reed and Randolph Bourne—the final volumes shifted toward a view of corruption, power, and greed as the eternal enemies of freedom. He was influenced as much by Thorstein Veblen as Karl Marx.

In the year of The Big Money's publication, Dos Passos enthusiastically voted for Franklin Delano Roosevelt. In 1939 he published Adventures of a Young Man, depicting the de facto execution of an American volunteer in the Spanish Civil War by Communists who suspect him of political deviation. After the 1930s, Dos Passos moved steadily to the Right, becoming an associate of National Review and the Young Americans for Freedom, as well as an admirer of Barry Goldwater, Richard Nixon, and Ronald Reagan.

Adventures of a Young Man was the first volume of a trilogy that included Number One (1943) and The Grand Design (1949). Despite steady productivity, Dos Passos's literary reputation passed into a decline in the 1940s. Interest in his work was briefly rekindled in 1961 by Midcentury, an antilabor novel recalling some of his earlier techniques and vitality.

DRAPER, HAL (1914–1990). A revolutionary democratic socialist who helped stimulate both the student Left of the Great Depression and the New Left of the 1960s, Hal Draper was a crisp writer who argued for “socialism from below,” a world created without the condescension of saviors from on high. Unlike others of his generation—including his brother, historian Theodore Draper—Draper was never attracted to the Communist Party or Cold War liberalism.

Born and schooled in Brooklyn, Draper joined the Young People's Socialist League, the Socialist Party youth group, in 1934, soon becoming its national organizer. In the mid-thirties, he helped lead the Student Strike against War, where he met his future wife, Anne Krack, a Trotskyist. When James P. Cannon and Max Shachtman brought the Trotskyists into the Socialist Party in 1936, Draper was won to their perspective, and he helped them establish the Socialist Workers Party in 1938.

When the Trotskyist movement split in 1940, Draper, persuaded that the Soviet bureaucracy had become a new class, neither bourgeois nor proletarian, left the Socialist Workers Party with Shachtman to establish the Workers Party. During the war and afterward, the Drapers worked in shipyards in the Los Angeles area and led wildcat strikes to force reluctant union officials, management, and the government to address demands deferred during wartime.

When Draper returned to New York, he edited several publications of the Workers Party and its successor, the Independent Socialist League: New International from 1947 to 1949 and Labor Action from 1949 to 1958. Labor Action was a tabloid he produced almost single-handedly, writing much of its copy himself. When the Independent Socialist League—which had opposed both Cold War camps, Stalinist and capitalist—dissolved into the Socialist Party in 1958, Draper opposed Shachtman's political abdication of the Third Camp and increased willingness to work inside the Democratic Party. In 1964, along with other Socialist Party dissidents, he created the Independent Socialist Clubs, which became the International Socialists in 1969.

In 1960 Draper became a librarian at the University of California at Berkeley, where he was among the few adult supporters of the free speech movement in its early days. His pamphlet The Mind of Clark Kerr (1964) had a great impact upon student radicals. Draper urged the New Left not to neglect the labor movement, and from 1961 to 1973 he served on the editorial board of New Politics, where his oft-reprinted essay on socialism from below, “The Two Souls of Socialism” (1966), was first published. Anne Draper (1917–1973) organized support for California farmworkers' struggles and built trade union opposition to the Vietnam War until her death from cancer, most likely caused by exposure to asbestos while working in the shipyards in the 1940s.

With the waning of the Left in the 1970s, Hal Draper turned to independent scholarship. A self-taught reader of German, he translated all of Heinrich Heine's poetry into English (Suhrkamp/Insel, 1982). His many studies of Marx—the four-volume Karl Marx's Theory of Revolution (Monthly Review Press, 1972–1991), the three-volume Marx-Engels Cyclopedia (Schocken, 1986), and The Dictatorship of the Proletariat from Marx to Lenin (1987)—were lucid and witty. Draper held that Marx believed the emancipation of the working class would come about only through the revolutionary activity of workers themselves, not reliance upon some self-constituted elite, whether conspiratorial cabals, utopian dreamers, or reformist politicians.

DRUG, HOSPITAL, AND HEALTH CARE EMPLOYEES UNION LOCAL 1199 OF THE RETAIL, WHOLESALE, AND DEPARTMENT STORE UNION. See Local 1199, Retail, Wholesale and Department Store Union.

DUAL UNIONISM. Participation in the labor movement presented revolutionaries with a paradox. Unions were the characteristic form of organization for wage earners under capitalism, bringing workers together on the basis of shared interests and grievances and in the process contributing to a sense of working-class solidarity. To separate oneself from the unions was to cut oneself off from the heart of the working class and to abandon perhaps the most important potential base for the creation of a revolutionary movement. On the other hand, labor unions were by their nature reformist organizations. Designed specifically to win limited concessions from employers, they undercut the revolutionary potential of the working class. When such organizations were dominated by conservative business unionists, as was often the case in the American Federation of Labor (AFL), it was extremely difficult for revolutionaries to function within them. This contradiction—the vital role of the unions in working-class life and the difficulty that revolutionaries had working within them—provides the key to understanding the history of dual unionism in the United States.

During the 1880s anarchists established separate union federations in Chicago, New York, and other cities. The social basis for such federations can be explained partly in ethnic terms—they tended to be based largely on Germans, Czechs, and other nationalities with strong radical subcultures. But there was also a revolutionary principle involved—the anarchists hoped to harness the power of the unions to a movement that would destroy the capitalist state and the basis for private property.

While the impulse to establish separate revolutionary union federations is easily understood, there is little question but that the decision frequently led to splits within the revolutionary movement as well as further alienation from the mainstream unions. In the case of the Socialist Labor Party's establishment of the Socialist Trades and Labor Alliance in 1895, for example, the move failed to win not only most trade unionists but even some of the party's own members, who preferred to fight it out with Samuel Gompers and his allies within the AFL. The issue of dual unionism precipitated a debate within the Socialist Labor Party that helps to explain the foundation of the Socialist Party in 1901.

By far the most famous of the dual union efforts was the Industrial Workers of the World (IWW), an anarcho-syndicalist organization that won considerable strength among diverse groups of unorganized workers between its birth in 1905 and its virtual destruction during the 1920s. IWW activists provided brilliant leadership in a series of mass strikes by immigrant workers in textile, steel, and other industries between 1909 and 1913, but their local organizations were either destroyed in ferocious employer counterattacks or simply proved incapable of maintaining their membership.

As an alternative to dual unionism, William Z. Foster and a group of syndicalist militants developed a strategy that came to be known as "boring from within." Foster argued that the mainstream unions could indeed be radicalized, but only through long-term agitation by a "militant minority" within the regular trade union organizations. Foster and his group developed their critique of dual unionism first within the IWW and then through a series of organizations they formed between 1911 and 1920. The boring-from-within strategy, endorsed by Lenin, had a major impact on early Communist trade union policy.

From its inception in 1919 until the end of 1928, the Communist Party firmly rejected the concept of dual unionism, though its members were constantly at odds with the conservative leadership of the AFL. At the end of 1928, however, in response to a change in the Comintern line and mass expulsions of left-wing activists from several unions, the Party established the Trade Union Unity League, a separate federation of revolutionary industrial unions. The league was liquidated in 1935, and many of its activists went on to play important roles in the development of the Congress of Industrial Organizations, which set out to organize mass-production workers throughout American basic industry and competed with AFL organizers in several sectors of the economy.

These radical dual unions were never successful in the ultimate sense that they won the mass of workers over to a revolutionary trade union program. Their failures, however, should not obscure the important role they played in organizing groups of workers otherwise ignored by the mainstream movement, in developing new strategies and forms of organization that helped to reshape the labor movement in the long term, and in persistently arguing for a radical vision of the labor movement as an agent of social and political transformation.

DU BOIS, W. E. B. (1868–1963). Undoubtedly the most influential black intellectual of the twentieth century and one of America's finest historians, William Edward Burghardt Du Bois maintained an ambiguous relationship with Marxism and the Left throughout much of his career. An advocate of elite dominion in black politics (the so-called Talented Tenth theory), he initially mistrusted mass movements and Left appeals. Yet he eventually emerged a peerless voice in Western Marxism, the "father" of Pan-Africanism, an adversary of Cold War cultural assumptions, and a vocal advocate for peace. He died a dedicated Communist.

Born in Great Barrington, Massachusetts, the descendant of a well-established Berkshire black family and a Bahamian plantation owner, he grew up with an impoverished and crippled mother utterly dedicated to her only offspring. He had few bouts with racism as a child and graduated from high school a promising scholar. After two years at Fisk University (Du Bois's first introduction to the world of southern black culture and religion), he went on to graduate cum laude from Harvard, where he worked closely with William James, and advanced his study of German philosophy at Friedrich Wilhelm University in Berlin in 1892. Although he studied more of Hegel than Marx and Engels, Du Bois occasionally attended rallies of the German Social Democratic Party, displaying an early interest in socialism. He then returned to receive his Ph.D. from Harvard. His prodigious dissertation, "The Suppression of the African Slave Trade to the United States of America, 1638–1870," whose detached empiricism barely veils its ringing moral condemnation of slavery, was published as the first in the Harvard Historical Series volumes. In 1896, after a teaching stint at Wilberforce University, he was commissioned by the University of Pennsylvania to undertake a study of black Philadelphia, resulting in the classic sociological treatise The Philadelphia Negro: A Social Study (1899).

This book, in which he suggested that the black elite had an obligation to uplift the race, marked an important stage in his political evolution, essentially planting the seeds for his Talented Tenth thesis. Though still wedded to the idea that education and scientific inquiry were liberating, during his tenure at Atlanta University, beginning in 1897, Du Bois began to reassess the complexity of black consciousness in light of widespread racial violence and segregation. Although indifferent to religion, he grasped the significance of black faith as a response to American racism. And in an 1897 essay entitled "Strivings of the Negro People," he articulated the concept of double consciousness, the need to reconcile the African American's quest for assimilation with his/her African identity. First published in Atlantic Monthly, it became the basis for a series of essays published as The Souls of Black Folk (1903), which not only developed Du Bois's early ideas on cultural pluralism but presented unique perspectives on black religion, culture, politics, and history, positing the color line as the great question of the dawning century.

Du Bois's prominence as much as his political orientation automatically made him a rival of reigning black elites, such as those represented by Booker T. Washington and T. Thomas Fortune, who had placed their stake in accommodation. Searching for like-minded allies in his fight against lynching, segregation, and the "Tuskegee Machine," Du Bois teamed up with Boston Guardian editor William Monroe Trotter, whose militancy contributed to Du Bois's prolonged shift away from enlightened leadership to self-activity and open rebellion. Together they established the short-lived Niagara movement in 1905, comprised of black educated men opposed to Booker T. Washington. Hardly a movement of radicals, it did attract a few black socialists, such as the Reverend Reverdy C. Ransom. More important, Du Bois was moving toward socialism independently. He began reading the works of Henry George, Jack London, and John Spargo, and by 1907 had described socialism as the "one great hope of the Negro in America."

The collapse of the Niagara movement coincided with growing white liberal and radical concern over American racism (sparked by racial violence in Springfield, Illinois, in 1908), thus opening doors for Du Bois to build new alliances with white progressives. He joined Socialists William English Walling, Mary White Ovington, and several other progressives to form the National Association for the Advancement of Colored People (NAACP) in 1910. Appointed director of publicity and research, Du Bois agreed to edit its journal, the Crisis (whose name Walling had suggested). Although in no sense avowedly radical, the Crisis was regarded as inflammatory by white southerners and by the Bureau of Investigation, predecessor to the Federal Bureau of Investigation. Under Du Bois's strong editorial guidance it spoke primarily to the Talented Tenth, but attracted many white socialists and liberals. Meanwhile, Du Bois began to contribute to an array of radical periodicals, joined the editorial board of the New Review, and devoted an entire issue of the Crisis to woman suffrage.

When Du Bois joined the Socialist Party in 1911, his ideas did not change significantly. He viewed the party as another vehicle for racial and economic emancipation and remained close to his moderate Socialist coworkers in the NAACP, namely Walling, Ovington, and Charles Edward Russell. He left the party after a year, however, prompted partly by racism within the organization and primarily by his decision to endorse Woodrow Wilson's 1912 presidential bid, though he continued his contributions to the socialist press and remained an independent socialist.

The First World War fixed Du Bois's pacifism, deepened his anti-imperialism, and intensified his Pan-African sentiments. His 1915 essay "The African Roots of War" recognized the critical role European imperial designs played in the conflict. Although he initially opposed the war and viewed it as an opportunity for increased agitation for civil and political rights, in 1918 he joined his familiar (and now ex-socialist) allies around the New Republic in championing America's entry. He was so sure that black participation would make a claim for democracy that he actually requested federal support for the coming 1919 Pan-African Congress. But his call to "close ranks," for which he was sharply criticized by contending black radicals, did not lead to the intended results. As he learned, even the most modest Pan-African proposals for a moderated colonialism aroused racist suspicions, and postwar "race riots" revealed the true fruit of international conflict. At the war's end, Du Bois urged blacks to defend themselves against racial attacks and became a more assiduous proponent of Pan-Africanism—the Second Pan-African Congress in 1921 displaying a greater militance than the previous meeting.

By the early 1920s, Du Bois's public prominence was clearly on the decline. He sustained attacks from several circles, ranging from rising black-nationalist leader Marcus Garvey to Harlem Renaissance writer Claude McKay. Militant black Socialists A. Philip Randolph and Chandler Owen dismissed Du Bois as virtually another Booker T. Washington, and the revolutionary African Blood Brotherhood assailed him for ignoring black workers in favor of the Talented Tenth. An advocate of pragmatic, Fabian socialism, Du Bois was initially skeptical of the Russian Revolution, which made him a target of criticism from the emerging Communist movement. Although a visit to the Soviet Union in 1927 inspired Du Bois to proclaim it "the most hopeful vehicle for the world," he still regarded Communism as inappropriate for African Americans. He won even fewer allies by preaching social tolerance in the intolerant twenties, and his assault on racism in the American Federation of Labor prompted counterattacks from white labor leaders.

The Great Depression threw the Crisis into economic peril, and Du Bois's preliminary proposals for black survival irked most NAACP leaders, both of which contributed to his resignation as the journal's editor in 1934. In a series of articles in 1934–1935, he had advocated a form of urban black self-determination, based on the creation of economic cooperatives, in which communities could wrest control of and collectivize local economies. It was a kind of Talented Tenth–tainted socialism, revealing Du Bois's belief that black petit-bourgeois leadership could implement socialist strategies in urban America. While considered too radical for NAACP tastes, Du Bois's vitriolic attacks upon the International Labor Defense's role in the Scottsboro case made him an adversary of the Communists. Seemingly isolated from the world of politics, he returned to Atlanta University's Sociology Department.

Du Bois quickly immersed himself in the works of Marx and Engels (and even taught a course in 1933 on "Karl Marx and the Negro"), thus laying the foundation for what could be described as the most important Marxist work on U.S. history, Black Reconstruction (1935). Adopting a truly independent approach to Marxism, Black Reconstruction antedates the works of Eric Williams, Oliver Cox, and Immanuel Wallerstein by placing American slavery and emancipation at the center of the emergence of world capitalism and imperialism. If the Southern revolution had been successful, it would have shaken the power of Northern capital, democratized America, and obliterated prevailing racist notions— notions that justified colonial expansion. It was no coincidence, therefore, that direct colonialism replaced American slavery as the principal generator of primitive accumulation. The failure of American labor to support black reconstruction, Du Bois argued, had been a calamity for all of humankind, for it could have altered the balance of social and economic democracy across the planet if it had succeeded.

Aside from its general thesis, Black Reconstruction contributed startling insights into the nature of revolutionary consciousness. First, Du Bois recognized that the black elite not only betrayed the movement but advocated only political solutions for fundamentally economic problems. It was ex-slaves, in fact, who forced the land issue to the fore. As C. L. R. James would repeat three years later, Du Bois demonstrated that slaves and agrarian workers displayed even greater revolutionary force than urban industrial workers or their elite leaders. Second, Du Bois's narrative suggested that the development of revolutionary consciousness did not precede the revolution but was the result of it. Moreover, this consciousness was not, in Marx's sense, a "mirror of production," but rather a partial reflection of religious and cultural traditions derived from an African past—hence, it was a consciousness outside the logic of bourgeois thought.

Black Reconstruction was not well received in Communist circles but it did cause a stir, prompting Party activist James S. Allen (Sol Auerbach) to produce the hastily written Reconstruction: The Battle for Democracy. Nevertheless, by the late 1930s Du Bois found himself more and more in agreement with Communist positions. He defended the Nazi-Soviet Pact, called for American intervention when Germany invaded Russia in 1941, and read more deeply about communism as a world movement. After retiring from Atlanta University in 1944, and returning to the NAACP, he focused his attention on colonialism and imperialism as the basic causes of war. He also participated in the historic Fifth Pan-African Congress in Manchester, England (1945), which had attracted Africa's most prominent nationalist leaders. Stung by the Western powers' unwillingness to relinquish their colonial (and neocolonial) claims, Du Bois turned sharply left for the last time. Dismissed from the NAACP in 1948 for his views, he became honorary vice-chair, under Paul Robeson, of the avowedly anti-imperialist Council on African Affairs and actively raised funds for the council's African Aid Committees. As an early advocate of the Progressive Party, a delegate to the Paris World Congress for Peace (1949), and chairman of the antinuclear, anti-Cold War Peace Information Center (1950), he became a prime victim of McCarthyism and endured attacks from a panoply of black leaders who had been drawn into the Cold War campaign. He refused to cower in the face of political repression and emerged a staunch opponent of McCarthyism, contributing numerous critical essays to such Left publications as Jewish Life, Freedom, and the National Guardian. His stand exacted a heavy price: among other things, he and his second wife, Shirley Graham, had their passports revoked by the State Department in 1953 for refusing to submit anticommunist affidavits.

In 1950 the eighty-two-year-old scholar-activist made his first bid for public office. A candidate for Senate on the American Labor Party ticket, he received more than 200,000 votes from New Yorkers, concentrated mainly in Harlem. Although he grew steadily closer to the Communist Party and less tolerant of black anti-Marxist intellectuals, Du Bois remained independent very late in his life. In 1958, for example, he joined a number of Trotskyists, ex-Communists, and independent radicals to propose a united left-wing coalition for the New York State elections. Nonetheless, he became increasingly dedicated to the promises of socialism as a worldwide system, and to existing communism as a stage toward its evolution.

In 1961, three years after his passport had been reinstated, Du Bois accepted Kwame Nkrumah's offer of citizenship in Ghana, to produce a project conceived decades earlier but long abandoned, the Encyclopedia Africana. He died in 1963, the encyclopedia unfinished, but Freedomways magazine (with his wife, Shirley Graham Du Bois, at the helm) was founded to carry on his work. He had joined the Communist Party just prior to his departure for Africa, and that act became his final political testament.

DUNAYEVSKAYA, RAYA (1910–1987). Noted philosopher and political activist, Dunayevskaya (née Rae Spiegel) is best remembered as one of the major figures in the 1940s–1980s effort to revive the Hegelian legacy and to create a “Marxist humanism.” For her, more than for any other activist-thinker, dialectics is revolutionary thought.

Born in Russia, Dunayevskaya emigrated to the United States in 1922 and rapidly became involved in radical activities, including Communist efforts to reach black workers. Expelled from the Communist Party’s youth section in 1928, she turned to Trotskyism, for a time in the 1930s serving as Trotsky’s secretary in Mexico. When she returned to the United States, she developed her theory of the Soviet Union as a state capitalist social formation. Active in Trotskyist circles, she helped found the “Johnson-Forest Tendency” (taking a party name of “Freddy Forest”) with C. L. R. James. Their group passed through the Socialist Workers and Workers parties, 1940–1951, producing bulletins to develop their own perspective. As an independent entity, they published the newspaper Correspondence from Detroit to express workers’ own views. Following James’s deportation, Dunayevskaya and others formed their own entity, the News and Letters Committees. For thirty-two years, she led the committees in their publication of many pamphlets and several books, and the monthly paper News and Letters.

As a political philosopher, Dunayevskaya proposed returning to the early Marx and his Hegelian roots, centering on the Marxist critique of alienation and its overcoming. Her best-known work, Marxism and Freedom (1958), was for her admirers (who included many New Leftists in the United States and abroad just learning about Marxism) an incisive introduction to Marx’s thought and to the continuity of the Hegelian-revolutionary tradition. Among her other works, Philosophy and Revolution (1973) theorized the era of Third World revolution, beginning in Cuba and extending to Vietnam and elsewhere. She again sought to show the linkage between actual revolutionary struggles and revolutionary philosophy as guidance for contemporary theory and praxis. Her final major work, Rosa Luxemburg, Women’s Liberation and Marx’s Philosophy of Revolution, emphasizes the new social forces of revolt, and the relevance of Marx and Luxemburg for the women’s liberation movement.

While small in numbers and modest in general impact following her death, her News and Letters group maintained a worldwide network of individuals drawn to Dunayevskaya’s ideas. She pioneered women’s leadership of radical activity prior to the New Left, and attempted to realize the unity of theory and practice, which she took to be the core of the revolutionary Marxism.

DUNCAN, ISADORA (1877–1927). A dancer and writer, Isadora Duncan was born and raised in the San Francisco Bay area. Unhappy at school, she was educated largely by her freethinking mother, whose instruction focused on classical music and the great poets; notably, all four Duncan children pursued careers in theater. By her early teens, Duncan had discovered the fundamentals of what would later be called modern dance, based not on the restrictive traditions of ballet but on free, natural, expressive movements.

Universally regarded as revolutionary, Duncan’s new dance was derided by conservative critics but hailed as a liberating force by the rising generation of avant-garde poets and painters as well as by political radicals. As has so often been the case of American innovators in the arts, she was famous throughout Europe before attaining even modest recognition in her native land.

Her American admirers and supporters covered the entire spectrum of the Left, and included Max Eastman, Floyd Dell, and John Sloan of the Masses group, the poets of the Yiddish di Yunge, anarchist Alexander Berkman, single-taxer Bolton Hall, socialist-feminist Antoinette Konikow, and John Collier, lifelong agitator on behalf of American Indians.

Sketches of Isadora Duncan by Abraham Walkowitz, c. 1912.

Although in later years she liked to boast that she had been a revolutionist since the age of five, her social radicalism deepened appreciably in the course of a performance tour of Russia in the wake of the 1905 Revolution. From the 1910s on she was world-renowned not only as a dancer but as a living symbol of revolt, revolution, and women's emancipation. Duncan-style dance was taught at the Socialist Party's Rand School in New York and at the anarchists' Modern School at Stelton, New Jersey.

An outspoken defender of the Bolshevik Revolution of 1917, in spring 1921 she accepted the invitation of Soviet diplomat Leonid Krasin to establish her school of dance in Moscow. Warmly welcomed by Commissar of Fine Arts Anatoly Lunacharsky, Duncan always insisted that her several years' Soviet sojourn, marred though it was by frustrations and disappointments, was the most exciting and rewarding period of her life. In the Soviet Union she choreographed dances for the workers' hymn "The Internationale," as well as for people's songs such as Ireland's "Wearin' o' the Green" and France's "Carmagnole," and two funeral marches for Lenin.

Duncan lived most of her later life in Europe and the Soviet Union, but returned to the United States many times for extended tours, often giving benefits for Russian famine-relief and other Left causes. Her last tour, in fall/winter 1922–1923, with her companion, Soviet poet Sergei Esenin, was a disaster. A grueling interrogation at Ellis Island because of her pro-Bolshevik views set the stage for a campaign of vilification against her, not only by the American Legion, the Ku Klux Klan, and evangelist Billy Sunday, but also by editors of America's largest dailies, who denounced her on their front pages as a dangerous "agent of Moscow." In many cities her performances were canceled. Finally, deprived of her U.S. citizenship, Duncan fled what she called the "narrow-minded, hypocritical, loathsome United States," vowing never to return.

Persecution by reactionaries did not diminish her revolutionary ardor, however; she remained steadfastly on the far Left. In the last years of her life, her Paris apartment served as unofficial headquarters of the Sacco-Vanzetti Defense Committee.

Isadora Duncan's epoch-making achievements as a dancer have unfortunately tended to obscure her considerable qualities as a thinker and writer. Her posthumously published My Life, probably the most widely read autobiography in English after Benjamin Franklin's, reflects the originality and boldness characteristic of all her essays and speeches. One of the most inspired writers on dance, she was also a penetrating critic of modern education, the situation of women in patriarchal society, and other aspects of repressive culture.

EDUCATION. Two fundamental and in many respects contradictory perspective underlie virtually all of Left educational theory since the 1930s: liberatory pedagogy, which emphasizes the possibility of social change through critical teaching and learning; and social reproduction, which analyzes the ways in which schools as institutions reproduce existing class, gender, and race structures. Underlying both of these perspectives is the question of the extent to which schools and universities as institutions within sexist and racist capitalist society are controlled by the demands of capital and the dominant ideology and the extent to which they provide the spaces for critical and political work.

In the early twentieth century the Progressive education movement and in particular the educational thought of John Dewey influenced liberal experiments in curriculum and pedagogy; more clearly Left experiments such as the anarchist Modern Schools and worker education programs in urban unions developed more politicized alternative pedagogies. But the first clearly articulated analysis and program for schools from the Left is found in the 1930s, in the work of George Counts and the social reconstructionist movement and in their journal, Social Frontier. Counts called capitalism "cruel and inhumane" and called for teachers in the public schools to "build a new social order." But while the social reconstructionists called for the political transformation of the schools, they did not provide a theoretical analysis of the role of the schools in the existing social order.

After the Second World War and in the emerging Cold War, the creation of a permanent war economy increasingly tied the universities to the demands of the defense industries and military research, while reformers like James Conant called for the reform of the public schools to better meet the needs of an industrialized, capitalist state. At the same time, schools and universities became the focus of right-wing attacks. Conservative groups began to monitor textbooks, and liberal and Left professors and teachers were condemned as Communists and in some cases lost their jobs. Throughout this period, Left intellectuals used their energies to defend themselves from attack and to fight for rights of free expression. The major exception to this defensive stance were desegregation struggles, which, in challenging racism, were calling for a new social order, but in racial rather than class terms. Except for the powerful educational writings of W. E. B. Du Bois (collected as The Education of Black People: Ten Critiques, 1906–1960), there was no direct Left analysis of race, class, and schooling in this period.

The call for a politicized pedagogy and the development of a Left critique of the existing educational system emerged from the New Left social protest movements of the 1960s—the civil rights movement, the anti-war movement, and the women's movement. Freedom schools in the South, teach-ins around the Vietnam War, and women's consciousness-raising groups provided examples of teaching and learning outside formal educational institutions and led to calls for more relevant and politicized teaching within the colleges and universities and to anarchist calls for the abolishment of formal state schools. The activists of the late 1960s and early 1970s who founded libertarian free schools, radical alternative programs in colleges, and journals such as Radical Teacher argued that a critical and liberatory schooling could be created to replace the old. Theoretically, the basis for a Left pedagogy was found in the work of Paulo Freire, whose Pedagogy of the Oppressed was translated into English in 1968. In his emphasis on the power of a politicized literacy to contribute to revolutionary movements, Freire provided a theoretical and practical model for Left teachers and intellectuals in the United States. His work has influenced Left Catholic movements and a number of teachers in literacy programs and community colleges.

New Left critics also turned to an analysis of the role of schools in reproducing class and, to a lesser extent, race oppression. As the fundamental nature of U.S. society as a capitalist and imperialist power was explored, the ties of the universities to the state and the role of the public schools began to be examined and critiqued. A number of first-person accounts exposed the racism of public schools. Left historians of education challenged the dominant consensus in educational history that the schools were central institutions in providing social mobility and preserving democracy; instead, they asserted that schools as institutions must be viewed in relation to developments within capitalism and to the growth of the state. Michael Katz is perhaps the best known of a number of Left historians who examined such topics as the development of urban school systems as a struggle among competing groups, the growth of scientific management and control, and the ties between the schools and capitalist elites. A number of Left theorists addressed the ways in which curriculum and social relationships inside schools reproduce class structure. One of the most influential analyses of schools in relation to political economy was Samuel Bowles and Herbert Gintis's Schooling in Capitalist America, published in 1975. Bowles and Gintis argued that there is a functional correspondence between what is learned in working-class schools (work discipline, acceptance of monotonous work outside of individual control, bureaucratic authority) and what is experienced in the workplace. Thus the schools as state institutions reproduce the class structure of capitalism. While Bowles and Gintis's study has had a powerful influence on subsequent Left analyses, it has also been criticized for an implicit functionalism and failure to address the struggles over schools documented by Left educational historians or to recognize the various forms of radical pedagogy developed by the Left.

In the 1980s, critiques by the black, gay, and women's movements as well as other disempowered groups challenged traditional Left analyses of schooling. While these critiques have not always been tied to a class analysis, the criticisms of white feminists and both men and women of color have called into question the adequacy of a Left analysis of education in solely class terms and have pointed to the need for a Left analysis to address all forms of oppression. Despite the contributions of both the civil rights movement and the women's movement in creating liberatory and democratic forms of pedagogy, often these contributions have been ignored in white male calls for a socialist pedagogy or in analyses of education that discuss class exclusively without considering the fact that most teachers are women, or that the structure of schooling in the United States has been consistently racist. Henry Giroux and Michael Apple have been the best known of a number of Left theoreticians attempting a synthesis that would take into account the social-reproduction theories of writers like Bowles and Gintis, the liberatory pedagogy of Freire, and gender and racial struggles around teaching and schools that take place in terms of actual practice.

During the Reagan administration, conservative and right-wing forces began a broad attack on public education while initiating a new wave of "education reform" through a variety of national reports and commissions. This attack took varied forms, including ideological opposition to the teaching of evolution, to sex education, and to multicultural reforms designed to revise standard curriculums in light of revisionist scholarship and the increasing multiracial composition of the public school population (which, by the 1990s, was approaching forty percent non-white). Conservatives also increasingly withdrew political and budgetary support for public schools and proposed a number of privatization and market strategies designed to undermine public education, including vouchers, tuition subsidies for religious schools, and turning management of public schools over to private, for-profit companies. These political and fiscal attacks accelerated the ongoing crisis of public schools, which was especially acute in urban areas and communities of color. Residential segregation and funding inequities among suburban and urban areas helped perpetuate a "dual school system" decades after the 1954 Supreme Court declared "separate and unequal" schooling unconstitutional.

Progressive and Left forces responded to these developments in several ways. The Milwaukee-based journal Rethinking Schools, first published in 1985 by activist public school teachers, became a national voice for progressive reform, combining critical ideas about classroom practice with progressive trends in multicultural and feminist curriculum reform and an antiracist, pro-equity perspective on education issues. The National Coalition of Education Activists and other groups promoted coalition building across class and race lines among teachers, parents, and education union activists. Faced with declining political support for public education, the two main teacher unions, the American Federation of Teachers and the National Education Association, took tentative steps toward merger. Widespread concern about school failure also created space for a variety of radical experiments in public schooling on a broader scale than at any time since the 1960s. These experiments included decentralized school management by councils of parents and teachers; the creation of new, nontraditional schools and school programs; and experiments in Afrocentric and community-based schooling. Limited resources, the weight of traditional bureaucratic school management, and increasing inequality in society at large restricted the reach of these reforms, however, and by the end of the 1990s, universal access to free public education for all was increasingly uncertain.

EMBREE, A. S. (1877–1957). A leading radical western organizer, A. S. Embree spanned the generations and movements from the Industrial Workers of the World (IWW) to the Congress of Industrial Organizations. He also led the last of the major IWW strikes, far past the zenith of that organization's influence.

Born in Newfoundland, Embree graduated from college in 1897 and joined the Western Federation of Industrial Workers of the World poster commemorating the Columbine Massacre of 1927.

Miners in British Columbia in 1899. He came into the emergent IWW in 1905. A key leader in the 1917 copper strike, he was among twelve hundred unionists deported from Bisbee, Arizona, and later played an important role as IWW defense coordinator for the Espionage Act defendants. Convicted in Idaho on state criminal-syndicalism charges in 1921, Embree spent four years in prison. On his release, he began organizing southern Colorado miners, who for three days responded to the IWW appeal for strikes to support Sacco and Vanzetti. This militancy and cohesion prompted Embree and others to urge a statewide coal strike, which was successful in shutting down all three Colorado fields simultaneously.

Bitterly attacked by mine and public officials, miners responded with mass parades, auto caravans of singing miners, the formation of "Junior Wobblies" branches, and other creative actions. Repression escalated into the "Columbine Massacre," with state police machine-gunning strikers, killing six and wounding dozens, yet miners stood firm and won major concessions. Few Wobblies had been recruited during the strike, and some IWW national leaders privately charged Embree with a plan to "take over" the locals for Communist labor organizations. In fact, Embree remained with the IWW until 1937, when he joined the Western Federation of Miners' successor, the Mill, Mine, and Smelter Workers. He continued as a Mill, Mine organizer into the 1940s, and his daughter, Una, married one of the union's most prominent (and Left-identified) figures, Maurice Travis.

EMMA LAZARUS FEDERATION OF JEWISH WOMEN'S CLUBS. Named for the Jewish poet whose lines are inscribed on the pedestal of the Statue of Liberty, the Emma Lazarus Federation (ELF) was founded in 1951, rising from the ashes of the Women's Division of the Jewish People's Fraternal Order of the International Workers Order when McCarthyism liquidated that organization. Under the dynamic leadership of June Gordon (1901–1967) and, from 1967, of Rose Raynes (1903–1994), the federation developed a program of cultural and sociopolitical activism.

ELF commissioned and sponsored the publication of Eve Merriam's biography (1956) of Emma Lazarus (1849–1887) and Yuri Suhl's biography (1959) of Ernestine L. Rose (1810–1892), and kept in print into its fifth edition (1982) Morris U. Schappes's Selections from the Prose and Poetry of Emma Lazarus (1944). In 1955 the ELF also published Aaron Kramer's translation of Yiddish poems by Morris Rosenfeld (1862–1923).

In 1957 ELF established the Emma Lazarus Day Nursery for working mothers in Jaffa (now Tel Aviv) and became a founder of the Museum of Immigration in the Statue of Liberty. ELF's several thousand members nationwide in the 1950s and 1960s campaigned on behalf of the foreign born, civil rights, women's rights, child welfare, and consumer protection. ELF stressed opposition to the nuclear arms race and favored a political solution to the Palestine-Israel conflict that would guarantee Israel's security and Palestinian national rights. By 1989, ELF, having failed to attract younger women to its ranks, had closed its national office, with clubs continuing in New York, Los Angeles, Miami, and Chicago. By the late 1990s, the only ELF still functioning was in Los Angeles.

EQUI, MARIE D. (1872–1952). A physician for working-class women and children, a lesbian, and a dynamic and flamboyant political activist, Marie D. Equi was known as a "firebrand in the causes of suffrage, labor, and peace in Portland in the 'teens, '20s, and '30s." Daughter of working-class immigrants in New Bedford, Massachusetts (her father was an Italian stonemason active in the Knights of Labor, her mother an ardent Irish nationalist), Equi worked in the textile mills during her youth. In 1890 she moved to Oregon and in 1903 graduated from the University of Oregon's medical school. By 1905 Equi was active in both the woman's suffrage movement and the Progressive Party. In 1911 she helped found Oregon's Eight-Hour Day League. During this period she began her lifelong work of distributing contraceptive information and performing illegal abortions. She also lived openly as a lesbian.

Equi's radicalism was sparked in 1913 by a militant strike of immigrant women cannery workers, led by the Industrial Workers of the World (IWW). Thereafter she worked mainly with the IWW regarding lumber workers, the unemployed, and the homeless. She also provided care to victims of the 1916 Everett Massacre and, as Oregon's representative, scattered Joe Hill's ashes to the wind in an international ceremony to commemorate the first anniversary of his execution. Shifting her focus from suffrage work, Equi championed direct action to hasten women's full emancipation. In 1916 she revised Margaret Sanger's pamphlet on birth control, Family Limitation, to make it more accurate medically, and the two were arrested at a Portland birth control demonstration that summer.

With the onset of World War I Equi joined the American Union against Militarism to fight against preparedness, conscription, and imperialism and played an important role in local anti-war rallies. In 1918 she was arrested for making an anti-war speech. Convicted under the Espionage Act, she served time in San Quentin from 1920 to 1921. After her release, Equi grew less active politically. From 1926 to 1936 Elizabeth Gurley Flynn lived with her. In 1934 Equi performed her last documented public political act, giving a large donation to men wounded in a West Coast longshoremen's strike. She also demanded that she be listed at the top of Portland police's "Red List," under the rubric of "Queen of the Bolsheviks." She died a virtually forgotten woman.

EUROPEAN STUDIES. In the past fifty years or so, there have been a few dozen American left-wing historians of European history, as well as a number of scholars, not necessarily left-wing, who have studied the European Left. Some of this scholarship stems from the Popular Front period of the 1930s, from pioneers who found a forum in Science and Society and later suffered severely during the McCarthyite purges of the early Cold War. Most of the leftist scholars have been academics; a few have been journalists, notably those associated with Monthly Review. This scholarship burgeoned on American campuses during the 1960s and 1970s, paralleling the rise of the New Left.

The bulk of this research concerns France, which offers rich revolutionary and left-wing traditions and already well established indigenous left-wing scholarship. American left-wing scholars tend to concentrate on the revolutionary tradition, the working class, and the syndicalist, socialist, and communist movements there. Samuel Bernstein, one of the founding editors of Science and Society, led the way with a number of studies, stretching from the Revolution of 1789 to the socialist movement at the beginning of the twentieth century. American leftists have written less about the Great Revolution (1789–1799) than have non-leftist American historians, however, probably because French Marxists themselves have so dominated this field. Jeffrey Kaplow, who became a left-wing militant in France, is a notable exception.

was Harvey Goldberg (1922–1987), who wrote a classic biography of Jean Jaurès, the founder of the French Socialist Party. A brilliant and extremely popular lecturer at the University of Wisconsin, Goldberg drew several thousand students and other interested people to his courses on French, European, and world social history. Eschewing great theories in favor of meticulous archival research, he also trained, in his atelier de l'histoire sociale, over fifty doctoral students in a variety of topics on French working class and left-wing history. Among his protégés have been Marc Lagana, who, after studying the French colonial lobby, finished Goldberg's own work on Charles Rapaport, a Russian émigré and early member of the French Communist Party; Joan Wallach Scott, now at the Institute for Advanced Studies, who did a first-rate study of French glassmakers before going on to gender studies; Nicolas Papayanis, who has published on syndicalism in the World War I period; Darryl Holter, on the coal miners of northern France; Charles "Chips" Sowerwine, on feminism and socialism; Tyler Stovall, on the suburban "Red Belt" around Paris; Dale Tomich, on slavery in the French Caribbean; and Edward Rice-Maximin, on the French Left and colonialism.

French working class and social history also attracts a number of non-Wisconsin scholars, not all of whom are left-wing. Princeton's Natalie Zemon Davis, whose husband had been imprisoned during the McCarthyite period, writes on early modern social and cultural French history and produced the celebrated Return of Martin Guerre. Charles and Louise Tilly, at the University of Michigan and later at the New School for Social Research, did a number of sociohistorical studies on the revolutionary tradition and working-class actions in France. Louise Tilly, often in collaboration with Joan Scott, has also embraced studies of women, work, and the family, as has Zemon Davis. Meanwhile, William Sewell prefers the French working class of the nineteenth century, as do a number of non-leftist historians. Other Americans, such as Robert Wohl and Irwin Wall, study the socialist and communist movements, while Herman Lebovics examines questions of cultural identity and social conservatism.

Germany has increasingly attracted the attention of American left-wing scholars who study mainly the twentieth-century crises in German socialism and communism, National Socialism and the Third Reich, Germans and Jews, women's history, and East Germany. Jost Hermand, a literary scholar from Wisconsin, founded the New German Critique, an interdisciplinary journal strongly influenced by the Frankfurt School and primarily devoted to mass culture. David Abraham, a graduate of the University of Chicago, shook up the American historical profession with his 1981 study of the connection between big business and Nazism that challenged the conclusions of certain Ivy League historians. Although exonerated of charges of plagiarism, Abraham was driven from the field. But other left-wing historians continue to work the Nazi period, notably Geoff Eley at the University of Michigan and Jane Caplan of Bryn Mawr, who collaborated with the late British Marxist Timothy Mason on studies of Nazism, Fascism, and the working class.

American left-wing interest in Russian and Soviet history goes back to the Popular Front period, particularly to two prolific men, Frederick Schuman of Williams College, a political scientist, and Ernest Simmons of Cornell, a literature specialist, both of whom wanted to promote a more sympathetic understanding of the Soviet Union and its people. Several other contributors to Science and Society followed in their paths. Today Ronald Suny of the University of Michigan concentrates mostly on regional histories, while Wendy Goldman writes on Soviet women and families, and Lynne Viola works on the peasants.

American left-wing scholars have paid much less attention to other parts of Europe. England, in particular, is one of the least-studied areas, except for a recent interest in women's history, possibly because British Marxists themselves have so thoroughly combed that field. There remain a few outstanding left-wing generalists, most notably Arno Mayer of Princeton, who has written major studies of the World War I period and the Russian Revolution, including the celebrated Wilson versus Lenin, and post-war counterrevolutionary movements. Gabriel Kolko, primarily an Americanist, wrote on European politics during World War II and the early Cold War, and Immanuel Wallerstein has focused on Europe in his studies of world capitalist systems.

EVERETT MASSACRE. The Industrial Workers of the World (IWW) spent considerable energy on free-speech fights in the early 1910s. After 1915, official organizational policy shifted from "the soapbox to the job," but one of the most important free-speech struggles did not erupt until the spring of 1916. The site was Everett, Washington, a city of some thirty-five thousand inhabitants on Puget Sound. Its port was a strategic center for shipping out lumber, and its hiring halls recruited workers for operations in the interior. On 1 May some four hundred shingle cutters went on strike. When Sheriff McRae began to arrest pickets, the local sent out a national call for assistance. Although the local belonged to the American Federation of Labor, which did not respond to its appeal, the IWW in Seattle sent James Rowan to organize a solidarity campaign. As soon as Rowan stood up to speak in public, he was arrested and a free-speech fight was on.

Local support was considerable, but several efforts to speak in public met with failure. In an effort to build up the free-speech forces, a contingent of forty-one IWWs arrived by ferryboat on 30 October. They had not even left the dock area when they were surrounded by a sheriff's posse. Shortly thereafter, they were taken to a park on the edge of town and severely beaten. A week later another 250 Wobblies arrived by ferry to challenge the sheriff's lawlessness with a public meeting. As the boat attempted to dock, a drunken sheriff and deputies began to shoot at the passengers. Some of the IWWs shot back, and before the ferry could pull away, there were at least five dead, six missing, and twenty-seven wounded passengers. On shore, a deputy lay mortally wounded, a lumber company official was already dead, and twenty-four other individuals were wounded. The Everett free-speech fight had become the Everett Massacre.

The immediate aftermath was that seventy-four IWWs rather than the individuals who had shot at them were put on trial for murder. This was the typical IWW experience in which the victim of violence was treated as the instigator. The attempt at repression soon backfired when the IWWs achieved acquittals or dismissal of charges in well-publicized legal proceedings. The IWW victory fueled the determination of timber workers to seek long-sought basic reforms under IWW leadership. In the succeeding years, numerous gains were won through strikes and other direct action. As one IWW member put it, the "timberbeast" became "a lumber worker."

EVERGOOD, PHILIP (1901–1973). Beginning in the early thirties and continuing until his death, Philip Evergood painted socially and politically engaged images. His most partisan paintings date from the thirties. During that decade he joined numerous artistic organizations affiliated with the Communist Party, and in many cases he became an active leader in them. In the early thirties he exhibited works at the John Reed Club in New York and attended the club's forums. He helped organize the Artists Committee of Action and the Artists Union and eventually became the president of the Artists Union. He was a member of the executive board of the American Artists Congress during the Popular Front and joined the Artists League of America during the Second World War.

Throughout the thirties and early forties, Evergood wrote and spoke prolifically on artists' economic rights and their social and political responsibilities. He also ardently defended social realist art against those who accused it of being propagandistic. His own paintings from the thirties often take up themes of fascism and labor, and he donated a number of these paintings to exhibits organized to raise money for Spanish refugees and Russian relief. Although after World War II Evergood still addressed social and political issues in his paintings, these works are more symbolic and less topical than his works from the thirties.

FACTIONS. Within a radical organization a faction is a group that seeks leadership of the organization, or, if it is already in control, to maintain that control. These groups are usually united around a leader or a specific policy direction on vital issues. Organized factions are permitted in some organizations, prohibited in others. Factions may struggle with one another for years, with various individuals switching sides. When faction fighting becomes acrimonious, the losing group often resigns or is expelled. The ousted faction may then form a new organization or create a publication to advance its views. Ousted factions frequently splinter into ever-smaller groups that soon disappear from the political scene even though individuals may remain politically active and join other groups. Significant faction fights have occurred at various times within the Communist and the Socialist parties in the United States. The Trotskyist movement is particularly prone to faction fighting, a phenomenon that has led to a proliferation of parties and organizations so small that they are dwarfed by the Socialist Workers Party, whose own membership usually ranges between five hundred and a thousand. Faction needs to be distinguished from fraction, which refers to a group of union members who belong to a political party and work within the union as a disciplined unit carrying out the program of the party.

FARMER-LABOR PARTY. Created at a chaotic convention held in Chicago in July 1920, the Farmer-Labor Party (FLP) represented the amalgamation of the Labor Party of Illinois, sister labor parties in Connecticut, Indiana, New York, Ohio, and Utah, and radical elements in the Committee of Forty-Eight, a progressive organization containing the remnants of the "Bull Moose" Progressive Party of Theodore Roosevelt. Positioned close to the Socialist Party on many issues, the FLP seemed to many socialists or former socialists the way forward in American politics. In 1924 Robert M. La Follette's Progressive ticket would nearly complete the absorption of the badly fading socialist movement into nonsocialist third-party politics. Meanwhile, the farmer-labor movement proved to be the U.S. Communists' first venture, however unsuccessful, into mass electoral maneuvers.

The powerful Chicago Federation of Labor, with the nonsocialist but radical John Fitzpatrick (1871–1946) in its lead, and the associated Illinois State Federation of Labor, directed by its president, John H. Walker (1872–1955), supplied the FLP its strongest support. In November 1919 the Illinois laborites hosted a convention in Chicago where eight hundred delegates representing thirty-four states and the District of Columbia created the National Labor Party. Reflecting Fitzpatrick's influence, the new party selected Chicago as its headquarters and made plans to hold a convention in that city in July 1920 to unite with agrarian and progressive groups, draft a platform, and select a presidential ticket. The convention issued a "Declaration of Principles" that called for disarmament, expanded civil rights and civil liberties, the eight-hour day and the forty-hour week, and the nationalization of "all the basic industries."

Similarly, the Committee of Forty-Eight was organized in Saint Louis about a month after the Chicago labor party convention. At that time, the three hundred delegates in attendance agreed on a platform advocating public ownership of transportation, public utilities, and natural resources; a tax policy designed to force idle land into use; and full and equal civil, political, and legal rights for all, regardless of sex or color. Moreover, the Forty-Eighters also called for the creation of a new, broadly based national party and made plans to meet in Chicago in July 1920 as well.

Though the expressed goal of the two groups, meeting separately but advocating amalgamation, was cooperation and joint action, the relationship between them was tense from the start, and there was mutual suspicion. Some leaders of the Committee of Forty-Eight feared that the new party would be dominated by labor elements who advocated excessive nationalization of the economy. Ultimately, a number of Forty-Eighters bolted their own convention and affiliated with the National Labor Party. The delegates reconstituted themselves as the FLP, although only a few agrarian organizations, including the Non-Partisan League, endorsed the new party. Moreover, the party was not affiliated with the recently organized Farmer-Labor Party of Minnesota and other similar groups. Initially, most of the delegates favored La Follette for president. Ultimately, the Wisconsin senator refused the nomination, on the grounds that the platform was too radical, and on the second ballot delegates turned to Parley P. Christensen (1869–1954), a little-known Utah lawyer who had chaired the Forty-Eight convention, to serve as the presidential candidate. Though unknown nationally, Christensen had a long career in Utah politics. Beginning as a Republican, he gradually broke with the party leadership over the issue of political reform, and affiliated with the Progressive Party in 1912. After service in the Utah state legislature, where he championed a number of progressive measures, Christensen helped form the Utah Labor Party in 1919. He had been active as an attorney defending members of the Industrial Workers of the World detained at Camp Douglas, Utah, during the war, and as the legal counsel for the streetcar workers' local in Salt Lake City. Christensen's ties to the labor movement brought him to the attention of the Justice Department, which had him under surveillance prior to his nomination and throughout the campaign.

Though hampered by a lack of funds, few organizers, and the competition of Eugene V. Debs's presidential campaign from prison, Christensen ran a strong campaign calling for large-scale nationalization of the U.S. economy, amnesty for political prisoners, especially Eugene Debs, expanded civil rights for blacks, extension of civil liberties, and recognition of the Soviet Union. His running mate, Max S. Hayes (1866–1945), further emphasized the socialist presence in the campaign: longtime leader of Cleveland and American Federation of Labor socialists, Hayes had broken with the party over the war issue but remained close to most of its positions. Gathering more than a quarter-million votes in eighteen states, the FLP appeared on its way to becoming a major force on the American Left. Moreover, the spread of the Non-Partisan League movement in the Dakotas reinforced the argument for a farmer-labor coalition.

After the 1920 campaign, the FLP captured the attention of American Communists and presented them with an interesting challenge. American Communists lived in a "sort of clandestine contemplation," largely foreign-born in composition and isolated from the labor movement. In the mid 1920s, following the Leninist line to affiliate with broader labor-based groupings, Communist Party leaders saw the FLP as representing such an opportunity. By 1923, FLP strength rested primarily among radical elements in the Northwest, not in Chicago, and while Fitzpatrick was the party spokesman, he failed to realize how radicalized the party membership among agrarian and labor elements in the West and Northwest had become, and that he had little influence in highly autonomous FLP groups across the country. These Farmer-Laborites were sympathetic to Communist viewpoints, and especially favored developments in the Soviet Union.

Communists, increasingly eager for influence in farm regions, had two major centers of activity. In the state of Washington, the farmer-labor movement drew upon long-standing Left traditions, in the Dakotas upon highly placed figures in the Non-Partisan League, in Minnesota upon the Finnish-American "stump farmers" blacklisted out of the mines, and in sections of Montana upon a genuinely charismatic Communist leader of farmers, three-hundred-pound Charles "Red Flag" Taylor (1884–1967). A veteran of Montana's Non-Partisan League, Taylor built his weekly Producers News from Sheridan County into one of the best Left papers in the United States, captured the local Republican Party through the Non-Partisan League, and with his fellow leaders joined the Communist Party but hid his membership for several years, serving as a Republican state senator in 1922. Taylor wielded great influence as an editor, agitator, and organizer.

In March 1923 John Fitzpatrick issued a call for a convention to meet in Chicago in July to build "a broad alliance of workers and farmers." Fitzpatrick himself, a longtime friend of William Z. Foster in the Chicago Federation of Labor, did not necessarily object to the Communist presence in the coalition, and that presence offered American Communists their most respectable opening hitherto. The Socialist Party's own reservations that the assembled forces were too weak to launch a new major party caused them to hold back and ultimately persuaded Fitzpatrick that a precipitous move would be unwise. By this time, however, most delegates—including, but not restricted to, Communists—had decided on a new electoral policy. “Mother” Jones, among other notables, addressed the gathering. Fitzpatrick’s group split—the Federated Farmer-Labor Party was formed—and not long after the meeting, many organizations pulled back. The Communist-oriented Federated Farmer Labor Party virtually dissolved in the face of the La Follette candidacy.

The FLP, still in Fitzpatrick’s control, supported La Follette’s Progressive Party candidacy, as did the Socialist Party. And in some states, including Utah, the FLP and the Socialist Party worked together, running joint tickets for state and local office. After the disappointing outcome of the La Follette candidacy and La Follette’s death in 1925, the FLP shifted its headquarters to Ogden, Utah, and gradually died out in the late 1920s. Charlie Taylor, along with a handful of others, continued to run, sometimes successfully, on its party line until the end of the decade.

FARRELL, JAMES T. (1904–1979). A world-famous novelist and literary critic, James T. Farrell was born in Chicago of second-generation Irish-American working-class parents but was raised by middle-class relatives. He embraced socialist ideas while episodically attending the University of Chicago between 1925 and 1929. After a year of expatriation in Paris, he moved to New York City in April 1932, where he became a sympathizer of the Communist Party.

Farrell contributed to the Party’s New Masses as early as 1930, although his writing only appeared there with frequency in 1934. He also published in the Daily Worker, addressed the 1935 American Writers Congress, and regularly contributed “Theatre Chronicle” to Partisan Review, literary organ of the New York City chapter of the John Reed Clubs. In these same years he produced his best-known work, the “Studs Lonigan Trilogy,” consisting of Young Lonigan: A Boyhood in the Chicago Streets (1932), The Young Manhood of Studs Lonigan (1934), and Judgment Day (1935).

Farrell considered himself part of the movement of revolutionary writers allied with the Party, but was also fiercely independent about his writing style and judgments about literary practice. Throughout his career, in which he published more than fifty books, he held the conviction that his novels and short stories could improve social conditions by examining the growth and stultification of the human personality.

In the 1930s and 1940s, Farrell steeped himself in the texts of classical Marxism and Leninism, studying the policy and practice of the international Communist movement with care. By 1936 he reached political views considerably influenced by the exiled Bolshevik leader Leon Trotsky, as well as the American Trotskyists, who had recently become a faction in the Socialist Party. That year Farrell issued A Note on Literary Criticism, a major text in the development of Marxist aesthetics in the United States. Here he systematically repudiated Communist Party cultural policies, elaborating a perspective compatible with Leon Trotsky’s Literature and Revolution (1922).

After the autumn of 1936, Farrell more openly became a supporter of the Trotskyists who founded the Socialist Workers Party (SWP) in late 1937. Until mid-1944, he worked with the SWP on several projects. These included the American Committee for the Defense of Leon Trotsky, organized to allow Trotsky (who had accepted political asylum in Mexico) a hearing during the Moscow Trials, and the Civil Rights Defense Committee, which defended Trotskyist and Teamster victims of the Smith Act.

Following a political dispute in which he accused the SWP of sectarianism, he collaborated with Max Shachtman’s Workers Party, which had originally split from the SWP in 1940. Selected essays in Marxist cultural criticism were anthologized in The League of Frightened Philistines (1945) and Literature and Morality (1947), many of the latter first appearing in the pages of the Workers Party's New International.

In the spring of 1948, Farrell changed his views drastically, becoming an anticommunist social democrat. In the 1950s he served as chairman of the American Committee for Cultural Freedom, and in the 1960s he supported Hubert Humphrey. During the final year of his life he belonged to Social Democrats U.S.A., an organization on the far right wing of the spectrum of social democracy.

FASANELLA, RALPH (1914–1997). A 1972 feature article in New York magazine first brought Fasanella, a painter, to the attention of the American art public. A seven-page spread heralded him as a remarkable urban primitive painter, a kind of left-wing Grandma Moses. Fasanella's instant success was deceptive, for he had been painting every day for nearly thirty years. His public had been friends and associates who knew him as a member of the Abraham Lincoln Brigade, an organizer for the United Electrical, Radio and Machine Workers of America (UE), and a campaigner for the American Labor Party (ALP).

Fasanella's parents had immigrated to the United States from Bari, Italy. His mother was a left-wing activist and his father an ice man with leftist sympathies. Fasanella's parents eventually separated, partly because the father was resentful of his wife's greater intellectual and political involvements. Fasanella spent some time in a boy's home run by Catholic priests but returned to his mother's household, where he continued to be greatly influenced by her views.

While always attracted to Left causes, Fasanella never took extreme positions. Appropriate to that temperament, his political hero was radical New Yorker Vito Marcantonio. Fasanella campaigned for Marcantonio, himself ran for office on the ALP ticket, named his son Marcantonio Fasanella, and put Marcantonio's image into more than one canvas. In the ALP and in his organizing for the UE, Fasanella made extensive use of his Italian working-class ties. During the mid-1940s he decided to dedicate himself to painting. He supported himself with industrial jobs until blacklisted in the McCarthy era and then worked at menial occupations. At the time of his "discovery," he was working for his brother at a Bronx gas station.

The huge and colorful canvases he worked on were crammed with vivid images, details, vignettes, and even printed messages. Many of his themes were decidedly left wing—homages to the Rosenbergs, evocations of May Day, renderings of UE halls, attacks on McCarthyism. He also did cityscapes and sports scenes in which working-class and ethnic motifs dominated. There were depictions of social tragedies like the Triangle Fire and a whole series celebrating the historic Lawrence strike of 1912. His workers were brave but far from invincible. Often, he showed them as crucified by ignorance and exploitation. This reflected his Catholic background to some degree, but he first thought of using the Christ image in an artistic manner when he read Pietro Di Donato's Christ in Concrete. Like the characters in that novel, for a time the young Fasanella had become an ice man, replacing his father in the prescribed social order.

More so than that of any other post-World War II painter, Fasanella was almost exclusively dedicated to social and political concerns. It was widely reproduced and featured at fund-raising events for progressive causes. His interests bridged most of the generational and sectarian divisions in the Left, and reproductions of his best-known works frequently adorn the office walls of labor educators and trade union officials.

FAST, HOWARD (b. 1914). A prolific author of historical novels, biographies, popular histories, children's stories, film scripts, plays, detective fiction, science fiction, and "Zen Stories," Howard Fast also wrote "entertainments" under the pseudonym E. V. Cunningham. In the 1940s, and again in the 1970s and 1980s, he achieved best-seller status with novels explicitly promoting left-wing ideas.

Born the son of a factory worker in New York City, Fast dropped out of high school and published his first novel before he was twenty. Within a few years, he had issued more than half a dozen historical novels about the American Revolutionary War period, including Conceived in Liberty (1939), The Unvanquished (1942), and Citizen Tom Paine (1943). The Last Frontier (1941) was an impressive effort to view the effects of the colonization of the continent from the viewpoint of native peoples.

Fast was sympathetic to the antifascist movement and the Popular Front from the onset of his career. In 1943 he joined the Communist Party. In the years of his membership, his most successful books were Freedom Road (1944), a novel of the Reconstruction era; The American (1946), a fictionalized biography of Illinois governor John Peter Altgeld, who pardoned three of the Haymarket anarchists; and Spartacus (1951), a drama of the 71 B.C. slave revolt.

In addition, Fast wrote less successful and more explicitly radical novels such as Clarktown (1947), concerning a Massachusetts strike; Silas Timberman (1954), depicting an academic victim of McCarthyism; and The Story of Lola Gregg (1956), describing the pursuit and capture of a Communist labor activist by the Federal Bureau of Investigation. Among his Communist nonfiction writings, Literature and Reality (1950) is a vulgar treatise on Marxist criticism; Peekskill, U.S.A.: A Personal Experience (1951) describes the 1949 attack of anticommunist rioters on a Paul Robeson concert; and The Passion of Sacco and Vanzetti (1953) eulogizes the martyred Italian anarchists.

In 1950 the House Committee on Un-American Activities ordered Fast to provide the names of all those who had contributed to the support of a hospital for Spanish Republicans in Toulouse, France, with which he had been associated during the Spanish Civil War. When he refused, he was thrown in jail for three months. Blacklisted upon his release, he initiated his own publishing company, the Blue Heron Press. In 1952 he ran for Congress on the American Labor Party ticket, and in 1954 he was awarded the Stalin Peace Prize.

Immediately following his sensational break with and public excommunication of the Communist Party in The Naked God: The Writer and the Communist Party (1957), he moved to Hollywood to begin a new career as a scenarist. Nevertheless, by 1977 his popularity as a novelist was greater than ever when he wrote The Immigrants. The book was turned into a two-part television film and became the first of a pentalogy that was animated by Left-liberal themes and traced an American family from the turn of the century through the Vietnam War era.

FATHER HAGERTY'S WHEEL. Thomas J. Hagerty had a brief but spectacular impact on the movement for industrial unions that took shape at the turn of the century. At the time of his ordination as a Catholic priest in 1892, Hagerty was already a proponent of Marxist ideas. His consistent agitation among Colorado miners during the succeeding decade led to his formal suspension from the clergy in 1903. Hagerty continued his political activism and is usually credited with being the major author of the preamble to the constitution of Industrial Workers of the World. His greatest fame, however, came from a chart he created to illustrate the nature of the new industrial society he envisioned. His wheel chart first appeared in Voice of Labor (May 1905) a month before the founding of the Industrial Workers of the World.

Although Hagerty soon disappeared from the labor scene, his wheel was continuously reproduced for many years. It was extremely popular among all those inclined to syndicalism, but it was also used extensively by the Socialist Labor Party. His wheel placed every wage-earning occupation then in existence under one of eight departments that formed the wheel's rim: Manufacture, Public Service, Distribution, Food Stuffs, Agriculture, Mining, Transportation, and Building. The hub of the wheel was labeled "General Administration," and specific job categories were located between the hub and the rim under the appropriate department. In an age when illiteracy was common among working people, the chart proved an invaluable aid to organizers and propagandists.

FEDERAL BUREAU OF INVESTIGATION. It is difficult to comprehend the history of the twentieth-century American Left without considering that of the Federal Bureau of Investigation (FBI). The FBI has not only tried to establish the boundaries of permissible dissent, but has also intervened to change the course of American history. At times it has acted independently of congressional and Department of Justice oversight; at others it has functioned as an arm of the executive branch and within an implicit public mandate.

Founded in 1908, the Bureau of Investigation, as the FBI was called until 1935, first directly affected the American Left during the Palmer Raids. In nationally coordinated raids in November 1919 and January 1920, the Bureau seized at least four thousand supposed subversives, of whom about one thousand were eventually deported. From 1920 to 1924 the Bureau continued its "antisubversive" activities: it expanded its files on dissidents, helped break the 1922 railroad strike, cooperated with private detective agencies, and led the federal government's drive to destroy Marcus Garvey and the United Negro Improvement Association.

The Bureau of Investigation's systematic violation of the Bill of Rights, combined with internal corruption at the top and in the ranks, produced significant reforms in 1924. Attorney General Harlan Stone established strict limitations on the Bureau's activities and promoted Assistant Director J. Edgar Hoover to the directorship—the post he held until his death in 1972.

Hoover, was born in Washington, D.C., in 1885, was the FBI. Operating from convictions and values established during his childhood and alien-registration work in the Department of Justice during World War I, Hoover almost literally turned Bureau employees into himself. Hoover's supervision of the Palmer Raids, moreover, solidified a mind-set concerning dissent that prevailed until his death.

Two key points stand out about the FBI during the period from 1924 to 1936. First, the Bureau secretly continued its spying, while reducing its scope. (Other agencies, including urban police "red squads," military intelligence, private spy agencies, and right-wing organizations, compensated for the cutbacks.) Second, a variety of circumstances—increased national attention to crime, an adroit public-relations campaign, and a qualitatively improved professionalism—combined to create a superb public image for Hoover and his G-men. Hoover's FBI would live off this ideological and cultural capital for the next forty years.

A new stage in the FBI's antisubversive activities began in August 1936, when President Franklin D. Roosevelt requested a "survey" of Communist and fascist organizations. Hoover soon expanded this mandate and, by the fall of 1938, had reestablished the General Intelligence Section (dormant since the 1924 reforms) to begin reviewing Left periodicals and creating a filing index for information on individuals and organizations. The Bureau's number of special agents had grown from 391 in 1933 to 898 in 1940; by 1944, it would have 4,886 such agents.

From 1940 to 1946, the Bureau opened thousands of files on individuals and organizations into which it poured information gathered from a variety of sources. From February 1941 through the following year, the FBI opened 60,000 individual files in the "subversive" classification and in the following year, nearly 120,000 files. Among the Bureau's sources were general-circulation newspapers, Left publications, and internal organizational material. "Confidential informants" from the ranks of management, the labor movement, and Left organizations provided still more intelligence. Finally, the FBI gathered much information through barely legal and outright illegal methods. These included tapping telephones and rooms, breaking into domiciles and offices, and examining mail and trash.

In late February 1946, the FBI launched a full-scale offensive against American Communism. Ostensibly developed to prepare the American public for the "flood of propaganda from Leftist and so-called Liberal sources" in the "event of extensive arrests" of Communists during a "serious emergency," the Bureau began preparing "educational materials" to "undermine Communist influence" in unions and "religious circles." The goals were threefold: to separate Communists from those who would work with them; to politically isolate Left liberalism; to make Communism the nation's only significant political issue.

The FBI promoted its version of "American" industrial unionism in three specific ways. First, ex-FBI agents became prominent in corporate security and personnel departments; they brought information and informers with them and hired former colleagues to do the same. Still others, such as the New York City ex-agents who founded Counterattack and eventually published Red Channels, were instrumental in anticommunist organizations.

Second, the FBI leaked information to individuals. As early as 1940, the Bureau could "place" articles and editorials in newspapers across the country; this activity expanded later in the decade. These journalistic arrangements not only helped establish the ideological boundaries of acceptable union activity, but also disseminated information that anticommunists could put to good use. Leaks to the Milwaukee Jour- nal in 1946, for example, helped Allis-Chalmers management defeat militant unionism at its West Allis plant.

Leaders of the Congress of Industrial Organizations (CIO), both nationally and locally, received FBI help. In 1943 James Carey requested information on CIO personnel; by early 1950, as Carey and other anticommunists stepped up their attacks on the United Electrical Workers (UE), Bureau data was flowing to Carey and his allies. And at the local level, for example, disgruntled members of a Westinghouse local in Erie, Pennsylvania, used such information in a series of unsuccessful efforts to overthrow the UE leadership.

The FBI also leaked information to Catholic laypersons and priests who were active within the heavily Catholic CIO. Father John Cronin, S.S., who acted as intermediary for the FBI and Richard Nixon during the Alger Hiss case and who later was a speechwriter for Nixon, began receiving and providing information in 1941. Cronin moved into the Social Action Department of the National Catholic Welfare Conference in 1946; there he wrote a series of enormously influential Chamber of Commerce pamphlets, including Communists within the Labor Movement (1947). Some Association of Catholic Trade Unionists members, including Monsignor Charles Owen Rice, provided information to the FBI (and in turn received it).

In Congress, FBI leaks were used in hearings by the House Education and Labor Committee, the Senate Internal Security Subcommittee, and the House Committee on Un-American Activities (HUAC). These committee hearings were central to the attack on the CIO Left; they were often held during or immediately before strikes and/or representation elections—for example, the 1948 Univis Lens strike in Dayton and the 1952 International Harvester strike. While CIO leaders often condemned these witch-hunt committees, they took advantage of the political fallout during raids on Left-led unions and locals. In 1952 HUAC, with substantial FBI help, focused its Detroit hearings on the huge United Automobile Workers (UAW) local at Ford's River Rouge plant. Walter Reuther, the UAW president under steady criticism from the River Rouge local, used the HUAC hearings as the occasion to place an administratorship over the local.

Third, some evidence exists to show more direct FBI intervention in trade union politics. In 1952

Hawaii special agents tried to split the Longshoremen's Union by offering to have a Smith Act indictment dropped in exchange for a union official's leading a secession movement. Although the agents thought they had solidified their union support, the plan backfired when union officials legally taped the oral offer of a bribe.

The FBI did not destroy the CIO Left on its own. Many other developments and factors—Soviet foreign policy, an ever-higher standard of living based on the "Pax Americana," internal divisions within unions and the American working class, and anti-modernist reactions to changes in gender relations and social mores—contributed to that defeat. The Bureau's tactic of getting out the "facts" was, however, extraordinarily effective, in part because of the Marxist-Leninist strategy of the Communist Party—the leading force on the American Left. Unionists who were members of the Communist Party in general hid that fact. This tactic allowed Party members to gain an enormous amount of influence that would not have been theirs if the issue of communism had been out in the open. On the other hand, when the "facts" came out—and the FBI often did have sound information—the rank and file and secondary leaders often felt a deep sense of betrayal. In contrast, where Party members functioned more or less openly—for example, in the Farm Equipment Workers—unionists often remained steadfastly loyal despite unrelenting attacks.

The FBI intensified its harassment of the American Left in 1956 when it established COINTELPRO: Counterintelligence Program. First put into effect against the Communist Party and the Socialist Workers Party, then "White Hate Groups," "Black Nationalist Hate Groups," and the "New Left," COINTELPRO aimed to destroy, by any means necessary, the groups targeted. It was out of this mind-set and organizational effort that Hoover, who as a youth witnessed the formal segregation of Washington, D.C., directed the efforts to get rid of Martin Luther King, Jr., and replace him with more "responsible" black leadership.

Hoover's perspective on the world, frozen at about 1920, grew increasingly out of sync with American society in the late 1950s and 1960s. His FBI was forced to investigate organized crime and the violation of civil rights; that FBI, molded in Hoover's image and ideology, never quite understood that the movements of the 1960s could not easily be fit into a "Communist nist Infiltration" model. The COINTELPRO programs often succeeded not because the operating assumptions had some congruence with reality, as had the earlier drive against the CIO Left, but because the FBI had virtually unlimited resources, the ability to function illegally, and sense enough to exploit already existing divisions.

On 8 March 1971, a group calling itself the Citizen's Commission to Investigate the FBI broke into a Bureau office in Media, Pennsylvania. There they pilfered files that revealed the existence of COINTELPRO—New Left and published them in WIN magazine. This incident, according to one of Hoover's aides, was the "turning point in the FBI image." Criticism of the Bureau increased, and in late 1971 a two-day conference at Princeton met to discuss the FBI (Investigating the FBI, 1973). In 1973 and 1974, a lawsuit, filed under the Freedom of Information Act, forced the release of COINTELPRO documents; in 1975 the Bureau released records documenting its program against the Socialist Workers Party. Finally, the House and Senate Select Committees on Intelligence held fairly thorough hearings on a whole range of FBI activities from the 1930s on.

The Freedom of Information Act has permitted researchers an unparalleled opportunity to investigate the history of the FBI. Although the files released under that law are incomplete and often heavily censored, they show that the histories of the twentieth-century American Left and the FBI are inseparable. They demonstrate, furthermore, that the FBI, led by a genuinely American totalitarian, has often functioned as a policer of thoughts and a subverter of the Bill of Rights.

FEDERAL THEATER PROJECT. From its inception, the Federal Theater Project (FTP) was a "political theater," a theater that encouraged political awareness and supported political action that could alter the status quo in America. It sought to expose selfishness, special interest, privilege, and injustice. But it also prided itself on exploring and experimenting with the dramatic medium as well as the human material available to it. As Hallie Flanagan, the national director, made clear, the Federal Theater would be a theater that dramatized the search of the average American "for knowledge about his country and his world, to dramatize his struggle to turn the great natural, economic, and social forces of our time toward a better life for more people."

However, fewer than ten percent of FTP plays dealt with issues such as housing, power, agriculture, public health, or labor. The Theater Project actually produced more plays by Shakespeare than by any other playwright, with the cycles of plays by Eugene O'Neill and George Bernard Shaw close behind. So while plays investigating social and economic topics represented only a fraction of the FTP's work, those were the plays used with great success by the Dies and Woodrum committees of Congress to label the entire Theater Project Communist.

In specific areas where the Federal Theater exerted leadership and made substantial artistic strides—the Living Newspaper, the Negro theater, and the Dance Project—the outcries were the loudest. However, among the factual and carefully documented Living Newspaper scripts, only Injunction Granted might be considered politically questionable, and Hallie Flanagan closed that play herself. While no Living Newspaper was used as a platform for Socialist, Marxist, or Communist Party propaganda, this did not mean that individual authors, actors, and others connected with the project did not have Left sympathies, people such as Mary Virginia Farmer, Florence and Burton James, and John Randolph. However, since the FTP was forbidden by law to inquire about an individual's political or religious affiliations, there was really no way of keeping a head count of Democrats, Republicans, Socialists, or Communists.

Among the Negro units of the Federal Theater Project only Theodore Wards's Big White Fog, produced in Chicago in April 1937, seriously questioned the viability of capitalism for black people in America. But even that discussion was presented in the context of other political alternatives, Garveyism and African nationalism. Nevertheless, a nervous FTP, even after a successful box-office response, moved Big White Fog to a South Side high school, clearly a case of de facto censorship.

How Long Brethern, supported by a Negro choral ensemble and including dances based on Lawrence Gellert's Songs of Protest, made a strong racial statement, but the Federal Theater Dance Project in New York included, besides Helen Tamiris, choreographers Gluck Sandor, Felicia Sorel, Don Oscar Becque, and Charles Weidman, and Doris Humphrey as adviser.

Among the new American plays produced by the FTP during its four years, only Chalk Dust, about the ills of the public school system, and Class of '29, about the anguish of four unemployed college graduates during the Depression, played widely outside New York City. Of the plays produced in New York City, only America, America (one performance), Awake and Sing! (in Yiddish), Battle Hymn, and Processional could even be said to express a view from the Left.

Even so, throughout the four years of the project, Hallie Flanagan spent enormous amounts of time and energy writing and speaking against charges that the Federal Theater was a Communist organ. She even had to petition Congress to be allowed to testify on behalf of the project before the Dies Committee. But she lost. After 30 June 1939, no funds were available from Congress for the FTP. Flanagan commented, "Curtains came down on plays. Curtains came down on a coast-to-coast theater plant; on the people; and on the records of the activities of those people."

FEDERATED PRESS. The most enduring and comprehensive Left-oriented press service created in the United States, the Federated Press (FP; 1919-1956) offered detailed alternative news reporting and critical interpretation. Socialist papers had established co-operative publication arrangements, with outside pages added to local editions, several times from 1890 to the 1910s. None of these proved lasting, and the usual practice of reprinting news from other socialist papers meant delays or dispatches from only a few correspondents. During the 1919 nominating convention of the Farmer-Labor Party in Chicago, newspaper editors from the Committee of Forty-Eight, the Non-Partisan League, Socialist Party, and militant union movements—representing a total of thirty-two newspapers—founded the Federated Press. Robert M. Buck, editor of the New Majority, was named editor. FP's activist and educational mission, to raise labor consciousness and assail capitalist propaganda, would not have been possible without editorial insistence that FP's news be as solid, professional, and as cleanly written as that of any wire service in the world.

In 1920 FP began its subscription mail service. It operated three main bureaus, in Chicago, New York, and Washington, D.C. Other bureaus were variously opened in Detroit, Los Angeles, and elsewhere as labor struggles developed. FP supplemented a limited full-time staff with dozens of part-time writers, including Robert Dunn and Len De Caux. Most of these correspondents worked for little or no compensation. Cartoons and photo mats were also provided to subscribers who could afford them in addition to news stories. Regular columns on foreign affairs, economic trends, labor news summaries, and humor became mainstays of the service. So too did feature stories.

Carl Haessler (1883–1969), former Rhodes scholar and university professor, imprisoned war resister and Milwaukee Leader staffer, moved into the central leadership position during the organization's early financial collapse in 1921–1922. Haessler shunned formal party allegiance, yet recognized the broad need for working-class unity and cooperation.

Through the 1920s, representatives of American Federal of Labor (AFL) union papers joined representatives from independent, socialist, communist, and syndicalist organs on FP's executive board. William Z. Foster sat on the board, as did Vern Smith of the Industrial Workers of the World. Earl Browder remained on the board until 1929. Fred Hewitt, editor of the International Association of Machinists' Machinist's Monthly Journal, served until his retirement in 1941. Labor editors on the board saw the FP as a means of expanding the scope and strength of their own newspapers. They also saw FP as a means of drawing attention and support for struggles their own organizations were undergoing.

Yet the presence of well-known radicals on FP's board drew the attention of more conservative labor leaders and, with the continued rise of red-baiting, open attacks from the right wing of American society. At the behest of Matthew Woll, the AFL conducted an investigation of FP's politics, funding, and labor reporting in 1922–1923. Haessler fully cooperated with the investigation, but the AFL created its own Weekly Service to compete with FP. FP nevertheless continued to draw support from trade union editors who saw the need for a regular labor news service.

FP thrived as the union movement thrived. From its initial subscription list of thirty-two labor papers in 1919, it grew to 120 in 1921. The economic crises of that year spelled hard times for organized labor, and the corresponding drop in union membership throughout the 1920s was matched by declining subscriptions. From a low of fifty-nine subscriptions in 1927 FP rebounded to just over one hundred in the first year of the New Deal's protection of collective-bargaining rights for workers. Subscriptions continued to grow, and reached an all-time high of 250 in 1946.

FP correspondents served as articulate firsthand reporters, following the rise of union struggles well before they were reported by the mainstream press. Many went on to serve as editors of the Congress of Industrial Organizations (CIO) union papers. Thus Haessler was also able to encourage continuity and help coordinate the news received and used by the CIO News, Guild Reporter, the United Mine Workers Journal, and the United Automobile Worker. These papers, as much as anything else, were vital keys to information and organizing in the movement.

Two noted writers for FP, Harvey and Jessie O'Connor, illustrate the remarkable quality of the collective effort. Jessie, the granddaughter of reformer-journalist Henry Demarest Lloyd, began working for Haessler in 1928 and continued off and on for more than a decade, covering strikes and labor conditions, most notably the famous Gastonia, North Carolina, conflict. Harvey O'Connor, youthful participant in the Seattle General Strike and for a time a staffer for the Seattle Union Record, became FP's Eastern Bureau Chief and remained a correspondent until its demise. In later years especially, the O'Connors helped make the financial continuation of FP possible. Thanks in part to the experience he gained there, Harvey became one of the outstanding muckrakers of the 1930s–1950s, with a series of popular books about family fortunes.

Yet oligopolization of the commercial press in the 1940s and 1950s concentrated the force of opposition against FP. Section 304 of the Taft-Hartley Act (1947) forbade unions from making direct contributions for political purposes, drawing the wrath of those opposed to FP's explicit political reporting. So too did the stabilization and bureaucratization of the labor movement, whose leaders increasingly sought better ways of controlling their unions and the information about them. Organized labor's in-house papers developed internal resources (and politics) capable of excluding the need for FP's news service. Similarly, the advent of radio and television supplanted community reliance on newspapers for local news; workers, like other Americans, became less dependent on and less willing to read local papers, even though popular press, radio, and television reporting was increasingly hostile to labor.

The Cold War's red scare tactics above all spelled the end of FP. The CIO's expulsion of Communists, and Communist-influenced unions, made FP's role as labor's Left voice insecure. Willingly, CIO leaders sought a secure and respectable place in American society. This contradicted FP's philosophy of labor as a movement. Between 1940 and 1950 the number of independent labor papers decreased by half as labor leaders came to grapple with dissent. Under attack by labor leaders, Congress, and McCarthyism, FP officially disbanded on 29 October 1956.

FELLOW TRAVELERS. Persons who sympathize with a political party (usually a Marxist group) and tend to follow its political line but are not formal members are known as fellow travelers. Although they may contribute to party causes, they pay no dues, have no party card, and are not bound by party discipline. Individuals may remain in this status rather than becoming members for many reasons, the more common being that they simply are unwilling to undertake the rigors of party life or have a disagreement on some aspect of the party's structure or agenda. In some cases the party may prefer persons to remain outside its formal ranks. In the case of famous persons, this is done in order that a celebrity may be seen as uncompromised by organizational affiliation or simply to protect that person from ideological attack. During the 1950s the term fellow travelers was used in a pejorative way by anticommunists. Fellow travelers were attacked for lacking the courage of their conviction or alternatively for hiding their true convictions from the public through a technicality.

FILIPINOS. Before Spain ceded her Southeast Asian colony to the United States in December 1898, the revolutionary government headed by Emilio Aguinaldo sent Felipe Agoncillo, a nationalist intellectual, to the United States to rally progressive forces to support the Filipino national liberation struggle. Unless one considers Agoncillo the pioneer, the first radical Filipinos in U.S. territory were the pre-union militants in the sugar plantations of Hawaii. One of them was Pedro Calosa, who in the early 1920s helped his brother organize Beginning of Progress, an association that planned a general strike of workers. After a prison term, he was deported back to the Philippines in 1927, where he led the 1931 anti-imperialist and antifeudal peasant insurrection in Tayug, Pangasinan.

Recruited mainly by the Hawaiian Sugar Planters Association, the early Filipinos were sojourners with peasant or proletarian roots. Their main leader was Pablo Manlapit, who spearheaded the organization of the Filipino Federation of Labor in 1911 and the Filipino Unemployed Association in 1913. In 1919, members of these groups formed a Higher Wages Association to demand better pay and working conditions, including eight weeks of paid maternity leave for women. On 19 January 1920, twenty-six hundred Filipinos struck ahead of their Japanese counterparts; they were later joined by Spaniards and Puerto Ricans, totaling eight thousand. To counter charges of anti-Americanism, three thousand Japanese and Filipino strikers marched in Honolulu carrying American flags, pictures of Lincoln, and signs such as "We Are Not Reds, God Forbid, but Are Brown Workers Who Produce White Sugar" and "We Want to Live like Americans."

With the decrease of Japanese labor in Hawaii and California, the Filipinos became the chief Asian group that engaged in labor agitation. When Manlapit was arrested in September 1924, Filipinos staged actions in Hanapepe plantation, Kauai, where police shot and killed sixteen, wounding many others. Manlapit was tried, convicted, and later freed in 1927 on condition that he never return to Hawaii. In 1932 he returned to Hawaii from California and revived the Filipino Federation of Labor with the help of Manuel Fagel and Epifanio Taok. Manlapit was subsequently arrested and deported to the Philippines. With the help of two organizers from the American Communist Party, Fagel mounted the last "ethnic" strike at Punene in 1937. He was beaten up by police despite protests by the Congress of Industrial Organizations (CIO). (Prior to the CIO, only the Industrial Workers of the World had pledged solidarity with Filipinos.)

The Japanese American activist Karl Yoneda has named Danny Roxas as one of the eight Communist Party members who, in 1930, tried to organize ten thousand Mexican, Japanese, and Filipino fieldworkers in the Imperial Valley of California. All of the leaders were arrested, convicted, and imprisoned under the Criminal Syndicalism Law.

In 1933, four thousand Filipino lettuce pickers in Salinas and Stockton, California, formed the Filipino Labor Union (FLU) when the American Federation of Labor (AFL) refused their plea for help. In 1934 the Filipinos merged with the Vegetable Packers Association and struck in Monterey County; later, the association rejected the FLU when it was branded a Communist front group by farm owners. Severe repression—from arrests to the burning of workers' camps—forced the Filipinos to end their strike.

In his quasi-documentary ethnobiography America Is in the Heart (1946), Carlos Bulosan recounted the CIO-led activities of Filipinos during the Depression. Among the pioneer migrant compatriots of Bulosan was Chris Mensalvas, who was instrumental in forming the United Cannery, Agricultural, Packing and Allied Workers of America. Bulosan contributed to New Masses and edited a Left newspaper, The New Tide; and later, the yearbook of the International Longshoremen's and Warehousemen's Union (ILWU) Local 37 in Seattle, Washington. Filipinos also figured prominently in the 1946 ILWU strike in Hawaii.

In 1940, the AFL chartered the Federated Agricultural Laborers Association, an association of Filipino farm workers, after it led a series of strikes. In the Alaskan salmon-canning industry, Filipinos were active in 1933 and 1936. Ernie Mangaong was elected to head the Seattle-based Cannery Workers and Farm Laborers Union. In 1938 the union got rid of the corrupt system of labor contractors. In the 1960s, Larry Itliong and Philip Vera Cruz, who headed the Filipino Agricultural Workers Organizing Committee, launched the historic 1965 grape pickers' strike in Delano, California, that led to the founding of the United Farm Workers of America.

At the height of the McCarthy era, seven Filipino leftists with ILWU Local 7 (among them, veteran leaders Ernie Mangaong and Chris Mensalvas and Simeon Bagasol, an ILWU member in Hawaii) faced deportation on charges of Communist Party membership. Only with the massive support of liberals and communities of people of color were their cases finally won in 1955.

Left militancy occurred in the ranks of the emergent intelligentsia as well. In the twenties, Vicente Lava, a distinguished intellectual who later became general secretary of the Communist Party of the Philippines, studied at the University of California and Columbia University. Several Filipinos who later became Marxists inside or outside the Party also studied in the United States in the twenties and thirties. James Allen, a Party activist, was sent to the Philippines by the Communist Party in 1936–1938 to render "fraternal assistance"; his memoir does not mention any of the Filipino labor militancy summarized here, but he refers to two Filipino Communists whom he had known earlier: Pedro Penino, a veteran of the Lincoln Brigade, and Jorge Frianeza, who was killed as a combatant in the Communist-led Huk uprising of 1949–1954.

It was not until the late sixties that a sizable segment of the Filipino intelligentsia became involved in various Left formations active in civil rights and anti-Vietnam War struggles. Several organizations protesting Ferdinand Marcos's martial law regime (1972–1986) were formed, including the National Committee for the Restoration of Civil Liberties in the Philippines (which became the Anti-Martial Law Coalition). From its lobbying activities and solidarity networks, the Union of Democratic Filipinos (Katipunan ng mga Demokratikong Philipino; KDP) and an affiliate, the International Association of Filipino Patriots, were set up to rally support for the national democratic revolution in the Philippines. Left-wing Filipinos also participated in organizing a mainly American support group, the Friends of the Filipino People (FFP). Unlike the KDP, the FFP was able to engage in coalition work with a broad spectrum of the American Left: from the Communist Party to Maoist formations, Trotskyist groups, and social democrats. Owing to internal problems—debates between "Maoists" and "Soviet revisionists" as well as sectarian and dogmatist tendencies—the KDP disbanded in the late eighties.

Contemporary Filipino radicals may be affiliated with groups such as the Socialist Workers Party, Democratic Socialists of America, Committees of Correspondence, Solidarity, and others; but they tend to be more concerned with arousing support for the national-democratic struggle in the Philippines than in propagating Marxist or broadly socialist ideas among their fellow immigrants or expatriates in the United States. Socialist aspirations and diverse radical/popular democratic impulses remain dormant in the mass of the Filipino community.

FINNISH AMERICANS. During the 1890s Finnish immigrants in Massachusetts and New York founded two workingmen's associations, the Saima Aid Society and the Imatra Society, designed to serve workers' educational and fraternal needs. These two organizations became models for later socialist organizations. In 1899 Antero F. Tanner established a socialist club in Rockport, Massachusetts. He and a follower, Martin Hendrickson, published a socialist newspaper for a few editions in 1900. Both "Apostles of Socialism," as Finns later called them, began nationwide organizing tours in 1901. Matti Kurikka, a utopian socialist, also crisscrossed the country after the failure of his utopian community, Sointula, in British Columbia. All three of these Finnish radicals spoke to workingmen's associations, temperance groups, church bodies, and to anyone else who would listen.

Spurred by the agitational efforts of Tanner, Hendrickson, and Kurikka, and aided by leftist exiles from

From Lapatossu, a humor magazine, 1915.

Finland who began to arrive regularly in Finnish communities in the United States in the wake of czarist pressure in Finland, Finnish Socialists formed a national organization in Hibbing, Minnesota, in 1906. Called Suomalainen Sosialistijärjestö (Finnish Socialist Federation), the organization grew by 1913 to 260 chapters with thirteen thousand members throughout the nation. The federation was supported by three newspapers, Työmies (Workingman, 1903) Raivaaja (Pioneer, 1905) and Toveri (Comrade, 1907). In 1907 federation members gained control of Työväen Opisto (Work People's College) in Duluth, Minnesota, from a Finnish religious organization and used the school partly to train socialist functionaries.

Finnish socialists were active in the 1907 Mesabi Range iron miners' strike in Minnesota and the 1913-1914 copper miners' strike in northern Michigan. On the heels of the copper strike, a split occurred in the federation. The more radical left-wing socialists backed the Industrial Workers of the World (IWW). In 1914 four thousand members withdrew from the federation, took control of Work People's College, and began publishing Industrialisti (Industrialist, 1915-1975), which by 1920 had more than twenty thousand readers. Government pressure on the Left during and after World War I caused the arrest of five Finnish IWW members, who were tried and convicted in the infamous mass trial of IWW leaders in Chicago. After World War I industrial unionism began a decline.

The Bolshevik Revolution in Russia gave the left wing of the federation a new cause. Supporters of Lenin gained control and withdrew from the Socialist Party. The federation amalgamated with the American Workers Party. Several years later the federation was reorganized separately as the Finnish Workers Federation. During the 1920s federation members worked assiduously to promote consumers' cooperativism as a weapon in the class struggle and to strengthen Central Cooperative Wholesale, located in Superior, Wisconsin. In 1930, however, because of their close association with the American Communist Party, Finnish federation members were driven from Central Cooperative Wholesale at its annual meeting.

Nevertheless, some of the strongest and most distinctive features of the Finnish American Left remained intact. "Hall culture," providing a vibrant left-wing community center for mining, farming, and lumber districts, put on musical, theatrical, and assorted other activities with wide popular participation. Thousands of Finnish American children of the 1920s and 1930s inherited a left-wing understanding of their culture and its unique importance, a political legacy for their futures. Thousands of others, destined to be long-lived, maintained their commitments through cultural activities as much as politics or unionism.

In the early 1930s, in response to Russian requests for aid to develop the timber resources of Soviet Karelia just across the border from Finland, about six thousand to ten thousand Finnish American men, women, and children migrated to Karelia from the United States and Canada. Later in the 1930s, during the Spanish Civil War, approximately four hundred Finnish American volunteers fought in the International Brigades on the side of Republican Spain. In 1941 the Finnish Workers Federation merged with the International Workers Order, a move that tended to diminish separate ethnic identity for Finnish American members. While Työmies-Eteenpäin (Workingman Forward) is still published in Superior, Wisconsin, it is read by a diminishing number of supporters.

The left-wing proletarian internationalism of federation members irritated right-wing socialists, who made their objections known through their newspaper, Raivaaja. The right wing established a new federation within the Socialist Party but withdrew in 1937 and became the Finnish-American League for Democracy, a strictly independent socialist group. Raivaaja is still published in Fitchburg, Massachusetts; its readership, too, is declining.

After its internal struggle with the left-wing labor movement, the consumers' cooperative movement grew impressively. By 1940 it had well over a hundred member societies in the Midwest and published two Finnish- and English-language newspapers. In 1962 it merged with a large midwestern agricultural cooperative and, for all practical purposes, lost its ethnic identity.

FLORES MAGÓN, RICARDO (1874–1922). The political career and ideological evolution of Ricardo Flores Magón began in the context of the regime of Porfirio Díaz, dictator of Mexico from 1876 to 1911. Like a number of young Mexican intellectuals, he perceived the problems of Mexico associated with the dictator as deriving from the corruption of classical liberalism by this regime, which favored English and American corporations and which crushed any expressions of dissent. In 1903 Flores Magón was expelled from Mexico and in early 1904 he and his brother Enrique crossed the border into Texas and the country he and his compatriots regarded as the model of liberalism. Organizing for the Mexican Revolution from their exile in San Antonio, the Magón brothers, Juan Sarabia, Antonio Villareal, Librado Rivera, Manuel Sarabia, and Rosalio Bustamante reestablished the newspaper Regeneración in 1904 and the following year founded the Partido Liberal Mexicano (PLM) in Saint Louis. At this time these "Liberales" espoused a vague socialism upholding the sovereignty of the people above all else, though asserting the harmony of classes.

Experiencing the work life of a Mexican immigrant and the repressive nature of the American government and law, the PLM junta and Ricardo Flores Magón, its leader, moved away from their earlier political views and explicitly embraced anarchism in 1908. In this same year they unsuccessfully attempted to spark a revolution in Mexico with a series of border raids around the El Paso area. For this they were convicted of violating neutrality laws and jailed for eighteen months. They had been helped along in their journey to radicalism and in their court trials by the likes of Emma Goldman and other anarchists, the Industrial Workers of the World (IWW), and the Western Federation of Miners, all of which contributed to their legal defense.

In 1910 the organization and newspaper moved to Los Angeles, where it continued to propagandize against "clergy, law, and capital." The clarity of their anarchist principles and their advocacy of direct action to secure the means of production for those who worked and to ignite the Mexican Revolution put the PLM outside the mainstream of anti-Díaz activity, which remained concerned primarily with electoral and land reform. In January 1911 approximately five hundred Liberales, including nearly a hundred Wobbly-affiliated Anglos, attacked Baja California. Briefly successful, the effort soon fell prey to factionalism and desertion. This Baja episode well exemplified the PLM's pattern of inspiring and engineering an effort and then lacking the discipline and organization to carry it through. Their efforts also sparked the vehement opposition of Southwestern newspapers, Mexican consuls, and American law. In June 1911 their efforts in Baja earned them twenty-three months in jail. Thousands of pro-Magónistas rioted in Los Angeles upon hearing the verdict.

The PLM leaders' theory was as visionary and compelling as their actions. They claimed that their anarchist utopia—in which no bourgeois law ruled people, nor churches fooled them, nor capital oppressed them—was rooted in the traditional Indian communal organization of land tenure. If only the interloper of capitalism could be swept away, human goodness could flourish and produce "a new society of justice and love." This was not mere romanticism to many Mexicans on both sides of the border who had seen the new industrial system erode their independence as artisans, miners, and farmers. While their railings against religion did not resonate with much of the Mexican populace, the PLM's attack on the monopolization of land, of which the church was a part, did. Propaganda and direct action, not political maneuvering or strategy, would destroy the rule of capital. Then the people, uncorrupted by clergy, law, or capital, would rule themselves with self-governing and autonomous local institutions where cooperation would reign.

Toward this end of cleansing revolution, PLM activists assisted in the organization of Mexican workers into unions, either all-Mexican or in league with the IWW. The IWW's famous Fresno Local 66 included many Mexican agricultural workers thanks to the organizational efforts of the Liberales in 1909 and 1910.

For much of this time the Magón brothers and the rest of the junta were in and out of jail. Thus Regeneración, the primary propaganda instrument, languished. In 1918 Ricardo Flores Magón called upon the workers of the world to reject nationalism and use the world cataclysm to revolt against the bourgeoisie and establish "la fraternidad universal." Ricardo was convicted under the Espionage Act for hindering the war effort and received twenty years in the Leavenworth Penitentiary, where he died, or was murdered, in November 1922. All the while honoring his martyred name, the generals who eventually controlled the Mexican Revolution cast out the Liberales from Mexico. Magónistas then made Los Angeles their permanent home, where they continued to denounce "clergy, law, and capital."

FLYNN, ELIZABETH GURLEY (1890–1964). Christened "the Rebel Girl" by Wobbly bard Joe Hill, Flynn was a "jawsmith" for the Industrial Workers of the World (1906–1928) and a great orator, which in the era of street life and mass strikes was like being a media star today. In the major East Coast strikes—Lawrence, Massachusetts, and Paterson and Passaic, New Jersey—she agitated and led the immigrant workers. To her, labor defense was vital to organizing and in this capacity she participated in the free-speech fights in Missoula, Montana (1908), and Spokane, Washington (1909–1910), and brought to the English-speaking public the case of Sacco and Vanzetti, with which she was intimately involved for seven years (1919–1926). She organized the Workers Defense League to fight for the victims of the Palmer Raids and was one of the founders of the American Civil Liberties Union, which ousted her in 1940 because she was a member of the Communist Party.

Flynn's life was illustrious and stormy. Her parents were radical Irish immigrants, and although born in Concord, New Hampshire, she grew up in the poverty of the South Bronx. After a brief marriage she left her husband and returned to her family, and remained with them most of her life. Her mother and her sister Kathie, a schoolteacher, raised her son, Fred (1911–1940), who died tragically as the result of an operation. From 1928 to 1938 Flynn rested and recovered from physical and mental exhaustion owing to fatiguing labor battles and a tragic love affair with the anarchist organizer and womanizer Carlo Tresca.

After this breakdown she joined the Communist Party (although she occasionally claimed to have joined in 1928) and rose quickly, joining the Party's National Board in 1941. In the Communist Party she was mainly a figurehead and rarely dissented from the major Party line, avoiding conflict and feeling outclassed intellectually by the sophisticated, college-educated city folk. Having no base of support, Flynn always felt uncomfortable in the Party, having come in at the top instead of having risen from the ranks. She was one of their most popular speakers and columnists, faithfully writing two to four times a week for twenty-six years for the Daily Worker. Her constituency were the rough-and-tumble miners and immigrant workers, and she preferred militant organizing to bureaucratic and reform work.

Flynn was indicted with the top Party leadership under the Smith act and endured, with great flair and eloquence, a nine-month trial, where she provided her own defense. She was sentenced to a three-year term in the Alderson Federal Penitentiary and served from January 1955 through May 1957. When she returned to active political life, the Party was in disarray. She had missed the vital 1956 period of reassessment and reevaluation, which served her well, since it meant she wasn't connected with either the hard-line, Moscow-oriented William Z. Foster faction or the more reform John Gates group. She sided with the middle-of-the-road, compromise Eugene Dennis position and in 1961 became the first woman selected as national chairman. She ran for state assembly, headed the Woman's Commission, and traveled abroad.

Flynn grew discouraged with the Party's tired old leadership, policy, and morals, but only criticized Party policy privately. She still saw herself as part of an international movement, but she longed to retire and write the second half of her memoirs. While awaiting jail in 1955 she had written the autobiography of her "first life" (1906-1926), The Rebel Girl (1955), and after, a prison memoir, The Alderson Story (1963).

She died in the Soviet Union and was given an elaborate state funeral. However, she always felt part of the American people and had requested that her ashes remain near the Haymarket martyrs in Chicago. She was no feminist, but she was an exceptional woman in the male-dominated Industrial Workers of the World and Communist Party. In her later life she regretted that she hadn't fought more against male chauvinism. She inspired many women, however, with her colorful speeches and example.

FOLK MUSIC, 1930s-1960s. Americans have been creating and sharing music since the arrival of the earliest settlers. Encompassing musical styles derived from American Indian, English, European, Asian, and African traditions, topical American folk music often takes its musical form from earlier pieces and its content from the events of the day. In the early 1930s, as the Depression worsened, there was much to chronicle in topical music, and American farmers, workers, and unemployed citizens often put new words to old and familiar hymns, marches, and popular tunes. They were renewing the tradition of black soldiers in the Civil War who created the "Marching Song of the First of Arkansas" from "John Brown's Body"; miners who sang "Miners' Lifeguard" in the 1880s to the tune of "The Vacant Chair," written after the assassination of Abraham Lincoln; and members of the Industrial Workers of the World who sang "I'm Too Old to Be a Scab" to the tune of the Civil War ballad "Just before the Battle, Mother."

In the early part of the decade, the organized Left had expressed little interest in folk music as a vehicle for advancing class struggle. The Communist ideological line of that time downplayed the importance of regional or national cultural expressions, and some of the highly trained modernist composers of the Composers Collective disdained folk music in favor of the more complex styles they had recently studied in Europe. But this music was less than effective in organizing working-class audiences. In 1933 Mike Gold recognized the problem when he asked in the Daily Worker, "Why don't American workers sing? The Wobblies knew how, but we still have to develop a Communist Joe Hill."

The shift to the ideas of the Popular Front in 1935 had a profound impact on left-wing American music. Composers in the Collective began to include folk music in their Workers Song Books and to popularize the folk musics of African Americans, farmers, miners, and urban workers in their concert pieces. Left-wing performers such as Paul Robeson, Cisco Houston, Aunt Molly Jackson, and many others gave voice to the protests and celebrations of these constituencies in music that once again relied on older hymns, familiar tunes, and the talkin' blues to communicate the political messages of the latter part of the decade.

Among the important performer-creators of the 1930s were Huddie Ledbetter (Leadbelly) and Woody Guthrie. Each had a broad repertoire of songs and each placed his songs in political and social context with recorded monologues about the conditions that inspired the music. A blues player and singer from Louisiana as well as a performer on the twelve-string guitar, Leadbelly recorded his music for the Library of Congress in 1933 and again in 1935–1940 under the direction of John Lomax. Woody Guthrie hailed from Oklahoma, knew the dust bowl region firsthand as a hobo in the 1930s, and wrote more than one thousand songs. Guthrie, who had painted "This Machine Kills Fascists" on the body of his guitar, made recordings with Alan Lomax for the Library of Congress in 1940.

During World War II, Southern topical music, often called hillbilly or country music, began to reach a broader audience as service personnel from the region helped to expand the popularity of such performers as Roy Acuff and Ernest Tubb. Later performers and composers of protest music would return to the tradition of the narrative ballad and other forms common in country music.

Between 1941 and 1942, the Almanac Singers, founded by Pete Seeger, Lee Hays, Millard Lampell, and Woody Guthrie, and deriving their name from the Farmer's Almanac, sang for organizing campaigns of the Congress of Industrial Organizations and at other political functions. The group consisted of about twelve singers and players who lived together in a loft commune near New York's Union Square. They performed topical songs about life in the Depression as well as union songs. From time to time the group included Burl Ives, Cisco Houston, Bess Lomax, and composer Earl Robinson. From 1941 to 1946 Elie Siegmeister led the American Ballad Singers in performances of traditional American music throughout the country. This group foreshadowed the trend toward performing folk music in arrangements for more than one voice, often with instrumental accompaniment.

People's Songs emerged after World War II as a loosely knit group of folk musicians whose purpose was to present occasional performances and develop a library of protest songs that could be used by trade unions and other groups. The group elected officers and published a monthly bulletin whose first issue declared that "the people are on the march and must have songs to sing. Now, in 1946, the truth must assert itself in many singing voices. . . ." Members of the Almanac Singers participated in People's Songs, as did younger singers and folk dancers such as Irwin Silber. The lyrics to the popular "If I Had a Hammer" were written by Seeger and Hays at a board of directors' meeting of People's Songs.

Perhaps the most significant contributing group in the "folk revival" of the 1950s and 1960s was the Weavers, founded in 1948 by Seeger, Hays, Ronnie Gilbert, and Fred Hellerman. Strong left-wing political convictions and associations led both to the blacklisting and the U.S. government's investigation of this group and to its popularity among progressives during the McCarthy era. The Weavers performed and recorded traditional topical music as well as contemporary songs composed by members. Political pressure forced the Weavers to disband in 1953 because they could not find a hall in which to perform. The Weavers reformed in 1955 and continued performing until 1963, even after Seeger's departure in 1958. A special reunion concert of the Weavers was chronicled in the film Wasn't That a Time (1981).

With the popularization of folk music presented in more formal arrangements came a variety of groups such as the Kingston Trio and the New Christy Minstrels, whose music reached broad audiences largely because of accessibility and the absence of a strong political perspective. The new popularity of folk-music styles helped gain acceptance for folk and topical music that dealt with significant social issues. Singers like Josh White, Big Bill Broonzy, and Odetta brought the blues, religious music, and freedom songs of the civil rights movement to a public that was accustomed to the folk sound. In addition, composers of new topical songs such as Malvina Reynolds, Seeger, and Bob Dylan communicated significant messages in their songs as they and others performed them. A humorous critique of social and political conformity, a denunciation of the evils of war, and the perspective of a new generation reached the public in "Little Boxes," "Where Have All the Flowers Gone?" and "The Times They Are A-Changin'." Traditional folk pieces and new topical songs were published and discussed in Sing Out! magazine, from which many amateur and professional folk performers learned of the newest developments in folk and protest music.

In the mid-1960s, lines between the folk-music and popular-music genres were bridged for a time as folk performers and their songs achieved significant popularity. The music of Seeger and Dylan, for example, was heard by large audiences through recordings by such diverse artists as Judy Collins, Joan Baez, the Byrds, and Peter, Paul and Mary. As the civil rights movement had contributed new verses to familiar songs as well as newly composed songs to the folk-music repertoire, the protest against the war in Vietnam inspired music by Seeger and Baez, Phil Ochs, and Tom Paxton. The popularity of anti-war songs such as Arlo Guthrie's "Alice's Restaurant Massacree," first performed at the Newport Folk Festival in 1967, and "Fixin' to Die Rag," sung by Country Joe and the Fish, particularly in the version sung at Woodstock in 1969, gave these pieces near-folk status with a public that associated anti-war sentiments with music. The 1960s also saw the fusion of folk styles with rock music in the work of the Byrds, Simon and Garfunkel, and Crosby, Stills, Nash, and (sometimes) Young.

If the decades since the 1960s have not inspired a sustained public interest in topical songs with clear political messages performed in a folk style, there is no lack of contemporary folk music. The women's movement has given inspiration to many composers and performers. The antinuclear movement has a topical music of its own, as do various labor, community, and environmental groups. As long as there are social issues to serve as the subject of new music, folk singers will keep alive the traditions of the past as they adapt old styles to meet new political challenges.

FOLK MUSIC, 1970s–1990s. In 1970 folk music seemed well established in the larger popular music scene and poised to continue its growth. If only in an ideologically watered-down form, the music that the Old Left had done so much to popularize had finally found its niche among concertgoers, record buyers, and the music industry generally. The guitar-slinging singer-songwriter icons of the sixties folk revival, Bob Dylan, Joan Baez, Judy Collins, and others, still exercised considerable stylistic and economic influence on the genre in the 1970s. In addition, a host of counterculture crossovers mingled folk with elements of rock, country, and blues. These folkies and folk rockers enjoyed considerable popularity in the 1970s (and still do) and included a broad spectrum of artists and bands: Crosby, Stills, Nash and Young, Joni Mitchell, James Taylor, Steve Goodman, Taj Mahal, Ry Cooder, Country Joe and the Fish, John Prine, Creedence Clearwater Revival, Bruce Cockburn, Bonnie Raitt, Arlo Guthrie, and the Byrds, to name a handful. Most of these artists lacked the ideological orientation that had characterized the generation of Pete Seeger and Woody Guthrie, but they did hold to the kind of progressive political view common to the counterculture and they did see themselves as working toward a better world. Moreover, these artists and their fans typically displayed a remarkable amount of musical open-mindedness toward an abundance of styles. If nothing else, the era proved that music knows no boundaries. What's more, counterculture types (mostly white) took their music with them wherever they went. College campuses and urban neighborhoods, small New England hamlets and western mountain towns, all had their coffeehouses and clubs, bluegrass bands and harmonica players, flat pickers and fiddlers, finger pickers and banjo pickers, Stratocasters and Volkswagen buses, and a really democratic community-focused approach to music. Lesser-known artists could always count on a place to stay, a good audience, and money for their labor.

This grass-roots attitude resulted in the creation of two important independent record labels. Rounder Records was founded in Boston in 1970 to release recordings by artists outside the mainstream of the recording industry. Over the next twenty-five years it released and distributed hundreds of blues, world beat, country, roots rock, folk, bluegrass, and rhythm and blues recordings. More politically minded Bruce Kaplan bolted Rounder and started Flying Fish Records in 1974. Over the next twenty years, Flying Fish recorded three hundred records, mostly of folk music, often of a politically progressive cast. The label boasted an impressive roster in its early years, including Doc Watson, John Hartford, the Red Clay Ramblers, Tom Paxton, Norman and Nancy Blake, Vassar Clements, and Sweet Honey in the Rock. (Rounder would buy out Flying Fish in 1996, after Kaplan died prematurely.)

For all the apparent success, however, by the end of the 1970s the situation changed for the worse and folk music underwent considerable decline. Economic, political, and demographic causes contributed. Like the rest of the economy, the music and record industry had overexpanded, and when the contraction came the cost was severe. Record companies disappeared, mergers took place, promotional dollars dried up, artists lost their contracts, clubs went out of business, the coffeehouse circuit died, and the dollars available for music shrank. At about the same time, a more conservative political and cultural climate overtook the country, a climate in which the liberal-Left sentiments expressed in the music and culture of folk music lost favor. Folk music's temperament seemed out of place in the harsh world that became mainstream America in the 1980s. Simultaneously, the audience for folk music grew smaller each year: baby-boomer followers of folk music aged and spent less time and money on music, while younger people showed less interest in the many musics labeled folk.

As these forces worked against a vital folk music scene, people did their best to ensure its survival. They achieved some success. While the major record companies no longer offered contracts, Flying Fish and Rounder sometimes did. That at least kept the hopes of many musicians and fans alive into the 1980s. Other independent labels also did their best to pick up the slack. Indeed, such companies continued to be founded in large numbers in the 1990s, providing many artists with a chance to record. Artists increasingly turned to issuing their own recordings as well.

The 1990s scene also included more and more folk music festivals. Artists and bands traveled from festival to festival during the summer season and earned most of their annual income from them. Also, because music clubs had been less receptive to folk music, artists now spent more time performing in schools, "house concerts," and community arts/cultural centers. Sing Out! magazine, a remnant of the Old Left, continued to promote folk music in its political form, and had been joined by other publications. Among them, Dirty Linen stood out for its eclectic mix of traditional folk music, blues, roots rock, singer-songwriters, world music, and women's music. The latter had carved out an impressive niche in the market since 1970. Much of the credit belonged to Holly Near and other pioneer feminist songsters of the seventies who had cleared the way for the legions of women who followed. Women or no, younger artists rarely gained access to the kind of promotion and marketing that the stars of the sixties had had, although the folk music scene continued to spawn gifted songsters like Michelle Shocked and Greg Brown. A few—including Shocked, Tracy Chapman, Billy Bragg, Suzanne Vega, Nancy Griffith, and Iris DeMent—managed to sign with major labels, but the biggest draws remained the artists who had been successful during folk music's heyday in the sixties and seventies.

The genre had suffered for another reason as well. The folk community had always been prone to a certain amount of puritanism, the most famous manifestation of which had been the audience's reaction when Dylan "plugged in" at the 1965 Newport Folk Festival; and many artists and fans took an equally hostile stance toward newer music styles of the seventies and beyond. This seemed particularly apparent in regard to punk and new wave. Punk represented a legitimate rebellion against the excesses of the music industry, including the West Coast folk rock sound that had come to define a good deal of mainstream rock in the mid- to late 1970s. It represented a legitimate expression of postmodern social alienation as well. But the folk music community turned a deaf ear to the younger generation's rebel chants. The guardians of folk dismissed bands like the Clash as so much rubbish even as many folk music fans and artists turned their ears toward New Age music, a style devoid of political content. Such behavior cut off the folk scene from potential allies, including most of the working class that had been the reference point for Guthrie, Seeger, and the Old Left. For that matter, folk music's ties to labor diminished, and labor protest music had little audience among the folk crowd, despite the efforts of Utah Philips, Si Kahn, Joe Glazer, and Larry Long.

As the century closed folk music still served as the standard-bearer of music's politically progressive tradition. Its continuing appeal was recognized by popular rock stars of the eighties such as Bruce Springsteen and John Mellencamp, who skillfully utilized elements of folk's musical and lyrical traditions and reached out to a larger audience in the process. In the nineties, artists reared in the "alternative" music scene also discovered folk music to be to their liking. Working in the style dubbed Americana by the industry, Uncle Tupelo and their offspring, Wilco and Son Volt, learned to mingle the angst-ridden persona and sounds of alternative rock with elements of folk, country, and blues.

FONER, PHILIP SHELDON (1910–1994). A prominent Marxist intellectual and one of the most prolific of American historians, Philip S. Foner spent his career—as writer, teacher, editor, and publisher—connecting scholarship with the activity of movements for social change. Born in New York City, Foner was educated at the City College of New York and Columbia University, where he received the Ph.D. in 1941. He began his teaching career at CCNY in 1933 but in 1941 became one of the victims of the legislative Rapp-Coudert purge of Communists and other radicals teaching at New York's public colleges. Employed for a period in labor education, he was later a partner in the Citadel Press publishing firm. From 1967 to 1979 he was professor of history at Lincoln University in Pennsylvania and as emeritus professor continued to lecture and teach at numerous universities, both in the United States and abroad.

From his first book, Business and Slavery: The New York Merchants and the Irrepressible Conflict (1941), Foner broke new ground. In 1947 the first volume of his History of the Labor Movement in the United States appeared, and this multivolume work stands as a formidable challenge to the reformist John R. Commons's interpretation of labor history. Foner viewed labor's struggles for better living and working conditions as manifestations of class conflict that ultimately would lead workers to political independence and rejection of capitalism. Although his main emphasis was upon the institutional growth of trade unions and the militancy workers expressed in innumerable strikes, he also enriched our knowledge of working class culture.

In The Life and Writings of Frederick Douglass (1949–1952) he provided the basis for major scholarly attention to the life and career of this great leader of nineteenth-century African Americans and champion of the antislavery struggle. Other important works written by Foner include Women and the American Labor Movement (1979, 1980), Organized Labor and the Black Worker, 1619–1973 (1974), History of Black Americans (1975, 1983), and A History of Cuba and Its Relations with the United States (1962, 1963). He edited and co-edited numerous documentary collections as well.

FOOD, TOBACCO, AGRICULTURAL, AND ALLIED WORKERS.

The origins of the Food, Tobacco, Agricultural, and Allied Workers (FTA) can be traced to efforts by various radical and trade union groups to organize agricultural workers during the Great Depression. The United Farmers League and the Trade Union Unity League's Cannery and Agricultural Workers Industrial Union represented the Communist Party's early efforts in this area. The Party's adoption of a Popular Front strategy gave rise to the National Committee for Unity of Rural and Agricultural Workers, later the National Committee of Agricultural Workers (NCAW), which provided the structure and leadership for the United Cannery, Agricultural, Packing and Allied Workers of America (UCAPAWA). Donald Henderson, a former economics instructor who had been fired by Columbia University for activities on behalf of the unemployed and New Jersey migrant workers, headed the NCAW. Henderson attempted to put together a coalition of NCAW-affiliated unions and independent locals of the American Federal of Labor (AFL) and seek a charter from the AFL. When that failed the NCAW called a national convention and voted to affiliate with the Congress of Industrial Organizations (CIO).

The formation of the UCAPAWA brought together a diverse group of local unions. Beet workers from the Rocky Mountains joined forces with Filipino fishermen, Mexican and Japanese field workers, and former lettuce pickers from the Industrial Workers of the World on the West Coast. Members of the Southern Tenants Farmers Union came together with mushroom workers from New York. The CIO's John L. Lewis funded a major organizing drive, and thousands of workers joined UCAPAWA. Agricultural workers were excluded from the provisions of the Wagner Act, as well as from most other federal protective legislation. They were among the nation's most exploited citizens, in many cases living and working in a state of virtual peonage. Their work was seasonal and many workers lacked a home base, moving from farm to farm as the season progressed. UCAPAWA's leadership subsequently concluded that organizing field workers required the organization of more stable workers one step removed from the harvest, in the fisheries, canneries, and processing sheds.

World War II greatly aided UCAPAWA's efforts as labor shortages and the activist role of the War Labor Board increased workers' bargaining power. Among the key victories of this period were the organization of workers at R. J. Reynolds Tobacco Company in Winston-Salem, North Carolina, Campbell Soup in Chicago and Camden, New Jersey, and workers in the cigar factories of the American Tobacco Company. To reflect the changing composition of the membership, the union changed its name to FTA at its convention in 1944.

One reason for FTA's success was the union's policy of nondiscrimination in industries dominated by women and minority workers. Locals were organized on an interracial basis, and regional and national meetings were integrated. The union actively promoted women and minorities to leadership positions at the local and national level. In 1947 the international vice-presidents were a black tobacco worker, a Mexican American woman organizer, and a Cuban cigar worker.

The postwar reaction hit FTA particularly hard. From its inception, FTA was a union of the Left. Donald Henderson had been an active Communist Party member during the early 1930s, and many of the union's leaders shared Henderson's political sympathies, if not his Party membership. As a result, the union's position on national and international issues generally reflected the thinking of people in the Communist movement. Such ideas were not to be tolerated in the ensuing Cold War years. An equally important reason for the postwar attack on FTA (and other Left-led unions) had to do with its growing success in organizing low-wage, women, and minority workers. Democratic unions threatened management authority on the shop floor, and the increased political activism of FTA members, particularly among blacks in the South, challenged the power of local elites.

FTA refused to support the Marshall Plan and the growing anticommunist stance of Harry Truman and in 1948 supported the Progressive Party candidacy of Henry Wallace. Like other CIO unions, FTA did not sign the non-Communist affidavits required by the Taft-Hartley Act. By 1949 FTA faced raids not only from AFL unions but from unions in the CIO. In 1950 the CIO expelled FTA and the union merged with the Distributive Workers Union and the United Office and Professional Workers Union to form the Distributive, Processing, and Office Workers Union.

FOOD PROTESTS. In February 1917 thousands of immigrant Jewish women in New York City erupted in protest against the high cost of living. They successfully enforced a citywide boycott that shut down sales of chicken, fish, and vegetables in Jewish neighborhoods for more than two weeks.

The women's protests posed an immediate challenge for New York's vibrant Socialist Party. How would the party respond to the concerns of militant housewives in their own backyard? The uprising offered the Socialists not only a huge pool of potential female members, but also a chance to link bread-and-butter issues to a long-term socialist vision.

The February 1917 women's uprising was not a unique one. New York's Jewish women had imposed a previous boycott on their city's kosher butchers in 1902. Toronto's Jewish women similarly boycotted their city's butchers in 1908 and again in 1914. And in 1917, protests nearly identical to those in New York broke out in Philadelphia, Boston, and Chicago.

Between 19 and 21 February, the idea of a boycott in response to rapidly escalating prices spread like wildfire across New York's Lower East Side, Williamsburg, and parts of the Bronx. Structurally, boycott activities included neighborhood-level mass meetings to drum up support, groups of pickets roving the streets to accost boycott violators, and observers posted at key sites to ensure constant vigilance over fellow shoppers. Violence was frequent; arrests of protesters mounted to over a hundred a day. By the end of the boycott's first week, these localized street actions spilled over into an irate and insistent march on city hall.

Participants in these protests were almost entirely married immigrant Jewish women, usually in their thirties or forties, with several children. When queried by reporters, they articulated no elaborate structural theories as to the political economy of food. They merely stressed their own families' need for an adequate living, and asked that prices be lowered.

New York's Socialist Party responded swiftly to the challenge presented by these women's protests. They immediately organized a new body, the Mothers' Anti-High Price League, and called for a "mass meeting" in Madison Square on 24 February to protest the high cost of living. The meeting, however, just as quickly revealed the tensions between the boycotters' organizing style and goals, and those of the Socialists. Thousands of tired, upset women, wearied of merely listening to approved Party speakers, spilled over from the official meeting to precipitate a riot at the Waldorf-Astoria Hotel, where, they erroneously believed, government officials were housed. The Socialists, meanwhile, sent a polite delegation to confer with officials in the correct hotel.

The subsequent weeks' activities highlighted the divergent perspectives of the two groups. On the one hand, the women continued their localized, at-times violent street vigilance, merely appropriating the legitimacy of the Mothers' Anti-High Price League to strengthen their position. As prices did indeed begin to fall after two weeks (albeit temporarily), their boycott activities rapidly dissipated.

The Socialist Party's activities, meanwhile, grew increasingly bureaucratized and distanced from street militance. Carefully appointed committees composed of high-ranking labor leaders, Socialists, and Progressives continued with formalized lobbying and with orderly meetings designed to draw protesters into party work. Their model, however, gave little role to the housewives whose activism had sparked the cost-of-living movement. The party carefully selected all speakers in advance. Guards banned potential "disrupters" from "public" meetings. Perhaps most important, doorkeepers barred babies from protest meetings. Yet the women boycotters had conspicuously brought their children along to their own previous actions.

The Socialists' commitment to the cost-of-living issue ultimately proved a quickly moving bandwagon on and off which the local party's leadership quickly leapt. For male Socialists, protest against imminent U.S. entry into World War I took precedence. All preferred, in their discussions of the price issue, to encourage trade unionism or the election of Socialist officials as the proper channels for Socialist agitation. The party's activist women persisted longer than their menfolk but sought, similarly, to divert cost-of-living protests into their own preferred channel, suffrage work.

Ultimately, the Socialists' basic theoretical structure proved inadequately flexible to accommodate and build a mass movement out of the housewives' concerns. Such women could directly engage in neither electoral work (without the vote) nor trade union activism (as workers in an unwaged workplace)—the two basic strategic arms of the party. For the boycotters, the high cost of living was an immediate and pressing concern.

FOSTER, WILLIAM Z. (1881–1961). The rise and decline of a radical labor movement in the twentieth-century United States was encapsulated in the life of William Z. Foster, who stood at the center of each of the key radical movements of this era: socialism, syndicalism, and communism. His early career, through the 1920s, demonstrates the strong roots that such ideas had within some working-class communities and among certain groups of workers, while his later life, especially during the late 1940s and early 1950s, exemplifies the increasing isolation of Marxist radicals through the ascendancy of Stalinism as well as government repression.

Raised in an Irish Catholic home in the slums of Philadelphia, Foster left school after the third grade and drifted around the country, working at jobs ranging from deep-water sailor to locomotive fireman. His intimate knowledge of a wide variety of jobs and his sensitivity to the ways that workers thought about their work and their problems made him a talented organizer.

Foster joined the Socialist Party just after the turn of the century and became a member of the Industrial Workers of the World in 1909, playing a key role in the Spokane free-speech fight of that year. He taught himself to read in German and French, read the classic works of Marxism, and then traveled throughout Europe, studying the ideas and strategies of labor movements there.

In 1911 Foster split from the Industrial Workers of the World over the issue of dual unionism, which he vigorously opposed. Deeply influenced by French syndicalists, he developed the concept of "boring from within" the mainstream labor organizations to win them over to a revolutionary program. He established a series of organizations designed to accomplish this goal. Both the Syndicalist League of North America (1912–1914) and the International Trade Union Educational League (1915–1917) remained small "militant minorities" based largely in midwestern industrial cities, but their strategies and personnel played important roles in later movements and organizations, including the Communist Party. By the First World War, Foster had emerged as a leading theorist of American syndicalism and during the war he earned a national reputation, directing drives to organize unskilled immigrant and black workers in the meat-packing and steel industries. He visited Russia during 1921 in the wake of the Bolshevik Revolution, was won over to the revolutionary cause, and joined the Communist Party later that year. Foster was still highly regarded by many labor activists as a creative and talented organizer with firm roots in the mainstream labor movement long after he had joined the Party.

During the 1920s Foster was instrumental in building the Trade Union Educational League, the most important Left opposition group within the American Federation of Labor. Throughout the early twenties Foster worked with John Fitzpatrick and other figures in the Chicago Federation of Labor to create a national Farmer-Labor Party, but when a shift in Communist strategy in 1923 undercut his relationship with Fitzpatrick and other mainstream labor progressives, Foster found himself more and more isolated. The Trade Union Educational League provided leadership in several of the most important strikes of the decade, however, and kept alive the goal of industrial over craft organization.

Beginning in the late 1920s, as a result of Comintern policy formulations and factional conflicts within the American Party, Foster became the spokesman for a narrow, sectarian line. After bitterly opposing its formation in 1928, he eventually became the leading figure in the Trade Union Unity League, a separate federation of dual, revolutionary unions. Foster campaigned as the Party's presidential candidate in 1924, 1928, and 1932 and directed its trade union work throughout the 1920s and the early years of the Great Depression. A severe heart attack during his 1932 presidential campaign slowed him down considerably, though he turned much of his attention to writing and remained a leading figure in the Communist movement. Although he was a prolific author of books and pamphlets throughout his long career, Foster produced his most ambitious works on the history of communism, labor, and Afro-Americans during the forties and fifties.

Foster was the Party's chairperson between 1932 and 1957, from its dramatic growth and increasing influence in the Depression and war years through its isolation and decline during the McCarthyism of the 1950s. He played a central role in the expulsion of Earl Browder, architect of the Party's Popular Front policies, and led the organization's reversion to a more sectarian line in the postwar era. When Khrushchev revealed the extent of Stalin's crimes in a 1956 speech before the Soviet Communist Party's Twentieth Congress, a reform group sought to reconstruct the American Party along more democratic lines and to make it more independent of Soviet influence. Foster successfully resisted these efforts, however, and the failure of the reform movement fueled a precipitous decline in membership. His own physical collapse in the late 1950s paralleled that of the movement he had done so much to build. William Z. Foster died in Moscow on 1 September 1960, and his ashes were placed near the monument to the Haymarket martyrs in Waldheim Cemetery outside Chicago.

FOURTH INTERNATIONAL. On 3 September 1938 delegates from eleven nations voted to adopt the founding document of the Fourth International

(FI), entitled "The Death Agony of Capitalism and the Tasks of the Fourth International," more popularly known as "The Transitional Program." The chief author of the document was Leon Trotsky. At the Founding Conference, U.S. Marxists played an unprecedentedly important role. The Socialist Workers Party (SWP) was among the larger groups to participate. (Because of legal restrictions in the United States, the SWP has never been a formal member of the FI, but has been in fraternal solidarity with it.)

The FI was established in the wake of what was perceived as a retreat from international revolutionary struggle on the part of the Soviet Union under Stalin (now defined as a degenerated workers' state) and the parties of the Third International that were in broad agreement with the Soviet line. Its strategy is summed up in the opening sentence of the Transitional Program: "The world political situation as a whole is chiefly characterized by a historical crisis of the leadership of the proletariat."

The parties associated with the FI faced an immediate test in the outbreak of the Second World War and the pact between Stalin and Hitler, which was the basis for a series of splits within the Trotskyist movement, including the SWP. After the war, when Trotsky's expectation of political revolution in the Soviet Union failed to be fulfilled, and in the wake of the Sovietization of states in Eastern Europe, the main body of the FI, with its Secretariat located in Paris, adopted the thesis developed by Michel Pablo that deformed workers' states might last for centuries, with the concomitant strategy of deep entry into the parties of the Third International. In 1951 the Secretariat expelled the majority section of the French party, which opposed Pablo's doctrine, and in 1953 the SWP openly joined the opposition, along with an important group in Great Britain, forming a public faction of the FI known as the International Committee for the Fourth International (ICFI).

The FI subsequently abandoned the Pabloist position, and relations between the SWP and the Secretariat improved during the 1960s. The British section was now the dominant group within the ICFI, and two tendencies sympathetic to it were expelled from the SWP in 1963. In the 1990s three groups in the United States were recognized by the FI as sympathizing organizations, but the SWP severed all relations with the FI.

FRAINA, LOUIS C. (Lewis Corey; 1892?–1953). The first major ideologue of American communism, Louis C. Fraina combined in himself the various contradictions of 1910s proletarian enthusiasm, cultural avant-gardism, and political overreach. Lewis Corey, more liberal socialist than Marxist, similarly epitomized the course of the intellectual first drawn to and then repelled by the 1920s–1930s Left.

Louis Fraina was born in Galdo (Salerno), Italy, probably in 1892 (he sometimes gave the year as 1894), son of a radical republican who emigrated to New York in 1897. Young Fraina, newspaper seller and factory worker, grew close to the Socialist Labor Party, in which he rapidly rose to become an ace reporter and a protégé of Daniel De Leon. Breaking with the Socialist Labor Party, he became an editor and in a few years the primary editor of the political and cultural avant-gardist New Review. Excited by the widespread mass strikes, and intellectually active in support of the Russian Revolution, he formulated early communist theories in Revolutionary Socialism (1918) and in his annotated edition of Russian writings, The Proletarian Revolution in Russia (1918). Concurrently, he edited a few issues of Modern Dance magazine, and served as one of three editors of the proto-communist Class Struggle.

Fraina fell afoul of early Communist factionalism. Disillusioned by a tour of Comintern duty in Mexico, he recrossed the border as Lewis Corey, obtaining work as proofreader at the New York Times. He reemerged in the 1920s–1930s as an economist, editorial worker at The Encyclopedia of Social Sciences, and author of The House of Morgan (1930), The Decline of American Capitalism (1934), and The Crisis of the Middle Class (1935). Stung by repeated unsatisfying experiences with the Communist Party, Corey became a spokesman of Left-leaning liberalism in the 1940s–1950s. Owing to past left-wing ties, he received little credit for his leadership of the Union for Democratic Action, a wartime group later reborn as Americans for Democratic Action. His Unfinished Task: Economic Reconstruction for Democracy (1942), is nevertheless notable as the first socialist text to elaborate the “mixed economy,” its ideas borrowed freely but without acknowledgment by Arthur Schlesinger, Jr., Daniel Bell, and others. His final book, Meat and Man (1950), a history of the meat-cutters’ union, revealed a further rightward drift toward hopes for business-labor cooperation and “scientific” replacement of world forests with intensive agriculture. Corey died of a stroke while at work on a biography of utopian Frances Wright and awaiting deportation for revolutionary political activities he had repudiated decades earlier.

FRANCO-AMERICANS. Relatively small in number and widely varied in culture and location, Francophones (including those speaking various dialects) have played a minor, but not insignificant, role in the U.S. Left. French settlers, especially Icarians and the followers of Victor Considerant, took part in early utopian colonization during the 1840s–1850s. Charles Fourier's doctrines reached many more via American intellectuals' popularizations, and the efforts by middle- and working-class Americans to establish phalanxes. But the modern influence of Francophones begins, properly, with the First International. New York, key gathering place for political refugees especially after the repression of the Commune, mixed French anarchists and socialists as wide in their variety as their potential mass following was scarce (relative to other immigrant-radical population bases) in numbers. In New York, housepainter Joseph Dejacque coined the word Libertaire, and New York presses printed for the first time a French exile's composition, “L'Internationale.”

The French sections of the International briefly played a most notable role at the front of the famous New York parade in memory of the Paris Commune. In New York, but also in Boston, New Orleans, Chicago, and elsewhere, they soon allied with the anarchist or libertarian wing against the undemocratic internal regime of the mostly German Marx loyalists. As much as expelled, most French sections sought, with the forces led by Victoria Woodhull, reentry into the International, or the establishment of a democratic, pluralistic American section independent of the Marxists. The presidential campaign of Woodhull in 1872 proved, however, too much for many of the French immigrants, and organized activity passed to the local level. Several of the former International sections, notably New York Section 2 (mostly Commune refugees), Section 29 of Hoboken, and Section 42 of Paterson, adhered to the anarchist international.

Among those who did not return to France, socialist branches survived for several years, cooperating with local efforts of other ethnic groups, and supporting more anarchistic or libertarian tendencies. A small fraction of the First Internationalists resumed activity with the founding of the U.S. "Black International" and the rise of revolutionary socialism in Chicago and elsewhere. Most French socialists would act as individuals within the socialist movement, unconnected with any radical Francophone institutions. A few, such as Socialist Labor Party theorist Lucien Sanial, became leaders. More—like the freethinking father of Eugene Victor Debs (named for Eugène Sue and Victor Hugo)—passed their legacies privately on to new generations.

In the latter decades of the nineteenth century, Francophone activity established itself on two small fronts. In and around New Orleans, a Creole cultural upsurge prompted free-thought literary and debate societies and a scattering of publications with a radical edge. In the mine fields of Pennsylvania, meanwhile, Edouard David published, from 1885, La Torpille (The Torpedo), a Blanquist sheet influenced by Johann Most, assailing mine owners and praising the ideals of socialism. From Pennsylvania it reached correspondents, some of them active in small Francophone radical groups, from New Jersey to Illinois and Iowa to Wyoming. Ardently defending the Haymarket martyrs, this paper ceased amid the wave of repression, only to reappear under a new title and a nearby location, as Le Réveil des Mineurs (Miners' Alarm). In 1893 David published one last paper, La Crise Sociale (The Social Crisis), for a short time in New York.

A Belgian anarchist, Louis Goaziou, followed David in establishing L'Ami des Ouvriers (The Friend of Workers) in Hastings, Pennsylvania, in 1894, succeeded by La Tribune Libre (Free Tribune) in 1896, maintained until 1901 with an eclectic mixture of doctrine. L'Union des Travailleurs (The Workers' Union), established by Goaziou in Charleroi that year, had special appeal to Franco-Belgian glassblowers, who had carried their socialist faith from the motherland to the American labor movement and support of the Socialist Party. Goaziou's final paper, The Union Worker, formed in 1915 in place of L'Union des Travailleurs, suggested that its constituents had already displaced the French language and integrated themselves in the American labor and socialist movements—as did the French-American members of the Industrial Workers of the World who had briefly published Germinal from Paterson, New Jersey. By that time, most of the Francophone anarchist circles consisted of aging comrades eager to see Emma Goldman on tour or to receive news of French anarchism, but strictly marginal in political terms.

Another, quite distinct wing of Francophones, Quebecois immigrants to New England in the latter decades of the nineteenth and early twentieth centuries were widely noted for their social and political conservatism. However, in certain circumstances they worked closely with noted radical leaders in establishing militant industrial unions, most notably in Woonsocket, Rhode Island, where an Independent Textile Union (growing out of riots against mill owners in 1934) briefly succeeded in organizing much of the town's work force and projecting a vision of a cooperative order with union-sponsored housing and medical care.

FRANK, WALDO (1889–1967). An influential novelist, essayist, and social-cultural historian, Waldo Frank was born to a comfortable Jewish middle-class family in Long Branch, New Jersey, and raised in New York City. He received B.A. and M.A. degrees simultaneously from Yale University in 1911.

In the fall of 1916, Frank became an associate editor of the Seven Arts, a short-lived but influential arts/cultural magazine that had taken a pacifist position toward the U.S. entry into World War I. Frank later served as a contributing editor of the New Masses and New Republic.

In 1917 Frank published The Unwelcome Man, the first of a series of innovative fiction titles that culminated with Chalk Face (1924). Though marred by a naive romanticism, these works were perhaps the first American use of stream-of-consciousness technique. Frank developed a synthetic style in which poetry mixed with prose and varieties of typographical styles and layouts. The small school of like-minded writers around him included Jean Toomer, Evelyn Scott, Cyril K. Scott, Sam Ornitz, and Isidor Schneider. Like several of these writers, Frank was deeply concerned with social and political problems, above all the integration of the individual into the modern social order. The major themes of his novel Holiday (1923) involved race relations, for whose understanding Frank had disguised himself as a African American during a tour of the South with Jean Toomer.

After 1924 Frank turned increasingly to nonfiction. His first in a series of historical-social studies, Our America (1919), reflected his characteristic concern with the destructive individualism of U.S. society and the antidotes he found in elements of apparently archaic societies elsewhere. Several of his later books—Virgin Spain, America Hispana, South American Journal, and Cuba, Prophetic Island—dealt with Iberian and Latin American cultures. Throughout, he sought to discover and explain alternative modes of civilization; increasingly, he denounced the effects of U.S. imperialism upon these still incompletely modernized, rationalized, and bourgeoisified systems. Within the United States, these works were generally misunderstood as mere travel literature. He intended to show, as he argued forcefully at the 1935 American Writers Congress, that the building of socialism had never been understood as a cultural and human problem and that even American Left intellectuals had allowed themselves to be “taken over [by] the philosophy of the American capitalist culture that we are sworn to overthrow.”

Intermittently, Frank threw himself into political activism. He played an important role as an organizer for the Non-Partisan League in Kansas (1919), as a lecturer for the Friends of the Soviet Union (after a trip to Russia in 1931), as chair of the Independent Miners Relief Committee in Harlan County (for which he was assaulted by vigilantes) in 1932, and as protest leader against mistreatment of such varied victims as Chinese intellectuals and the “Bonus Marchers.” Like many other writers, he had a tumultuous relationship with the American Communists. A significant figure in the 1932 League of Professional Groups for Foster and Ford, he toured with Earl Browder in Browder’s 1936 campaign, and served as outstanding spokesman at early Congress of American Writers events. Questioning Russian policies as early as 1935, he broke with Communist politics in his report to the International Committee for the Defense of Political Prisoners, protesting Stalin’s purges, and abandoned Popular Front organizations in 1939. Although he was less active politically after World War II, Frank was an early, if critical, supporter of Fidel Castro, serving as 1960 temporary chair of the Fair Play for Cuba Committee.

FREEDOMWAYS. For much of its lengthy publication life (1961–1985) the most distinguished African-American political-culture journal, Freedomways was also something that the Left had lacked since the 1930s, a forum for some of the most prestigious American intellectuals to meet and mingle with Marxists. Freedomways’ lineal predecessor, Freedom (1951–1955), had been a Cold War casualty. The notable Committee for Negroes in the Arts had swung behind the new publication and above all its publisher, Paul Robeson. Contributors John Killens, Lorraine Hansberry, Shirley Graham, Julian Mayfield, Ruby Dee, John Henrik Clarke, and W. E. B. Du Bois, among others, would carry on to Freedomways. The demise of Freedom, however, cruelly deprived Robeson of a final major literary outlet for his talent. Louis Burnham, the paper’s main editor, moved on to the National Guardian.

Freedomways, opening its doors in the more hopeful period of the early civil rights movement, had vastly more opportunity to succeed both financially and editorially. Freedomways’ founding editorial proclaimed “we are African-American,” and promised to "explore, without prejudice or gag, and from the viewpoint of the special interests of American Negroes . . . the new forms of economic, political, and social systems now existing in the world," and "to offer a medium of expression for serious and talented authors." W. E. B. Du Bois contributed the opening essay, "The United States and the Negro." Shirley Graham and Esther Jackson served as founding editors, joined by Schomburg librarian Ernest Kaiser, the Southern Christian Leadership Conference's J. H. O'Dell, and an array of contributing editors that in later years included Ruby Dee, Angela Davis, Alice Walker, and Selwyn R. Cudjoe among others.

Freedomways distinguished itself by linking culture to politics. It published many important special issues on leading figures—including Du Bois, Robeson, Hansberry, and artist Charles White—and on such select topics as the Caribbean people (with such contributors as C. L. R. James, Eric Williams, and Derek Walcott) and the crisis in education. It conducted a pioneering effort at the public recognition of African American women, in particular black women writers, from its earliest issues onward. And it effectively promoted African American art in many forms, at one point establishing its own management bureau to arrange lectures and public performances.

Perhaps most impressive, however, was Freedomways' breadth of prominent commentators from African American life, and the diversity of its political discussion. A short list of noted contributors would include Ossie Davis, Harry Belafonte, Nikki Giovanni, Richard Hatcher, Vincent Harding, Shirley Chisholm, George W. Crockett, Jr., Ron Dellums, Jesse Jackson, James Baldwin, John O. Killens, Sterling Brown, and Wyatt Tee Walker. If, as critics sometimes charged, Freedomways had little expressed empathy for separatism or militant black nationalism (until Malcolm X was assassinated in 1965), remaining generally true to a political perspective formed in the orbit of the 1940s Popular Front, the magazine nevertheless radiated an openness sufficient to draw New Leftists and even an occasional black political veteran such as C. L. R. James, earlier linked with Trotskyist dissent from the Old Left mainstream.

Freedomways' circulation, peaking at sixty-five hundred or so, rarely sustained the magazine unaided. A generational gap and a crisis of funds generally overtook staff regulars, at a time when the proliferation of newer black publications such as the Black World and the Black Scholar offered alternatives for the younger reader in particular. Growing noticeably thinner in its final issues but never losing its sense of the immediate political questions (indeed, Jack O'Dell's reports on the Rainbow Coalition offered an insider's look at the foremost movement of the day), Freedomways passed from the scene, leaving a vacuum in its wake. It had been, in some ways, the finest intellectual product of the Popular Front, speaking with a distinctive voice about matters that concerned African Americans.

FREE LOVE. A concept that originated in the mid-nineteenth century, free love meant an absence of legal ties rather than promiscuity, as frequently misunderstood and more frequently charged in the anti-socialist press. A mark of bohemianism until the 1960s, free love had become by the 1970s–1980s a historical predecessor of the radical critique of sexuality notably carried on by feminist and gay liberation movements.

A number of the utopian movements, religious and nonreligious, had endorsed such sexual practices as celibacy, polygamy, and complex marriage that were at odds with Christian norms. Abolitionism reinforced incipient free loveism through a critique of southern sexual slavery. Free love entered the socialist movement via spiritualism, a veritable hotbed of free love doctrine, when Victoria Woodhull endorsed free love in Woodhull and Claflin's. The open statement of such policies justified—in the eyes of Marx's American allies—the expulsion of the Woodhull group and its supporters from the First International. To the respectable public, Woodhull herself became "Mrs. Satan," mirror of socialism's infidel status, when she not only justified philosophically her own practices but also made known the affair of noted minister Henry Ward Beecher with the wife of prominent reform editor Theodore Tilton, an ally of Beecher. Meanwhile, among German freethinkers and socialists, free love continued to be practiced, especially among intellectuals, but only rarely was it articulated in theory.

Until the end of the century, anarchists of varying backgrounds carried on the free love agitation without notable socialist support. Moses Harman,

"Mrs. Satan" cartoon by Thomas Nast, 1872.

Lois Waisbrooker, and Ezra Heywood, among other late-nineteenth-century individualist anarchists, conducted a vigorous protest of the 1873 Comstock Act, which prohibited broadly interpreted "obscenity" from the mails. They meanwhile published periodicals such as Lucifer, the Light Bearer, pamphlets addressing questions of birth control, and a lively correspondence with the liberal press (such as the more open-minded of woman suffrage journals). Among the Germans, Robert Reitzel and his weekly Arme Teufel perhaps best captured the poetic possibilities of the entire subject, and placed it in the heroic traditions of German literature.

In the early years of the twentieth century, anarchist Emma Goldman became the celebrated spokesperson of the free love cause, the most popular speaker and the darling of the surviving anarchist groups. Anti-socialist journals and lecturers meanwhile charged, despite the frequent denials of the Socialist Party, that socialism meant the end of the family. Casually at first, and then with some momentum, a movement of cosmopolitan intellectuals within or around the Socialist Party began to revive the subject in another light, attaining their major influence in Greenwich Village and the Masses magazine. With their philosopher the English homosexual writer Edward Carpenter, their international sexologist Havelock Ellis, and such noted writers as Upton Sinclair providing literary prestige, they marshaled a powerful case for free love as the soul of modernity.

The splintering of the Socialist movement and the rise of a Communist movement with little concern for personal (especially women's) issues once more thrust free love issues back into private life—except for anti-communists, who predictably charged that young revolutionary Russia had "nationalized" its women. During the 1920s, American bohemianism meanwhile gained a mass following of sorts, mostly hedonistic but connected in part with the Harlem Renaissance and the wish to escape the stifling American commercial culture. A small group of Left intellectuals around the Modern Quarterly, seeking to integrate sexology into a heavily anthropological "science of society," had little short-run impact upon the Left political movement. They did, however, help to keep alive a sexual element in the radical attack upon American racism. While Leninist workerism forbade the open return of the free love subject, a subterranean connection had already been made between interracialism and the principles of free love. Further connections with jazz, poetry and anti-war sentiments flourished in the bohemian and Beat movements of the late 1940s to early 1960s, with free love (including homosexuality) a measure of cultural bravado and a practical arrangement for transient lifestyles.

During the later 1960s, revolt against the Vietnam War, the overall youth culture sensibility, and the commercial sexualization of culture together conspired to return free love toward the center of the radical picture. "Make Love Not War," a slogan of antiquity renewed by John Lennon and Yoko Ono among others, seemingly embodied the ultimate rejection of capitalist culture. An evocative photo of a young couple kissing at the barricades of May 1968 Paris became overnight an icon of popular New Left sentiment.

The women's liberation movement, following upon the efflorescence and decline of youth culture, made a strident critique of free love as practiced by the New Left. These objections, mounted in polemical essays and pamphlets, themselves become important new statements of free love principles. A proposed permanent revolution of sex radicalism to overthrow patriarchal practices wherever they occurred, the feminist view of sexuality led directly to the commentaries by gay and lesbian spokespersons on the authoritarianism of heterosexual domination, and to widespread movements to decriminalize homosexual activity.

By the 1980s, gay liberation had become inseparable from other issues on the Left, substantially because gay activists had become a presence in virtually every field of struggle. At times and places (such as San Francisco), major gay political figures served doubly as socialist influentials. Meanwhile, free love (in the sense of an absence of legal bonds) had become paradoxically unassailable in Left (and liberal) attitudes toward private life, and somewhat more scarce in the practice of generations seeking economic and emotional security.

FREE SOCIETY was among the most influential anarchist journals published in English in the United States at the turn of the century. Founded in Portland, Oregon, in 1895 as the Firebrand, and edited by Abe Isaak, Henry Addis, and Abner J. Pope, the journal announced its intentions under the masthead: "For the burning away of the cobwebs of ignorance and superstition." Primarily serving as an exponent of anarchist communism, this popular weekly had a circulation of more than a thousand readers and addressed such varied topics as free love, birth control, and the single tax and other economic theories. It also carried local reports of lectures and speaking tours as well as international anarchist movement news. The editors suspended publication in 1897 when they were charged with sending "obscene" materials through the mails, specifically Walt Whitman's poem "A Woman Waits for Me." Found guilty and imprisoned, Addis and Pope subsequently left Portland for Home Colony, near Tacoma, Washington, and Isaak and his family moved to San Francisco, where they resumed publication of the paper in late 1897 under the title Free Society. The production of the paper became a family affair, and the Isaaks' household gained a reputation as the center of anarchist activities and for exemplifying the anarchist ideal. In 1901 the Isaaks moved the paper to Chicago, where it again became embroiled in legal trouble when Isaak, who had been approached by Leon Czołgosz, published a warning in the journal to other anarchists about Czołgosz. After Czołgosz's assassination of President William McKinley in September 1901, the Isaaks and other anarchists were arrested. The Isaaks later moved to New York, where they continued publication of Free Society until 1904. In 1908 the Isaaks moved to Lincoln, California, where they founded the Aurora Colony.

FREE SPEECH MOVEMENT. In the fall of 1964, white student veterans of the civil rights movement led University of California (UC) students in the post-war era's first major northern student uprising. When UC Berkeley administrators tried to halt growing civil rights activism among UC students by banning campus fund-raising activity for off-campus causes, activists from the Friends of the Student Nonviolent Coordinating Committee (SNCC) and the Congress of Racial Equality (CORE) mobilized a coalition of groups from the Young Republicans to the Independent Socialists and the youth group of the Communist Party to defy the ban. On 19 October, campus police arrested Jack Weinberg for staffing a CORE fund-raising table; but when they tried to put him in their car and drive him away, hundreds of students spontaneously sat down around the car and prevented it from leaving. In the course of a thirty-six-hour sit-down, the students won Weinberg's release and initiated a dynamic campaign that came to be known as the free speech movement (FSM).

Over the next three months the FSM battled the university with rallies, marches, sit-ins and, ultimately, a massive student strike. UC administrators, led by Chancellor Clark Kerr, alienated many UC students with their refusal to consider any concessions and their clumsy attempts at forceful repression of the FSM. When administrators suspended Mario Savio and other FSM leaders, thousands of students responded with a massive 5 December 1964 rally and occupation of Sproul Hall. By calling in the police and the National Guard to arrest those sitting in, administrators prompted a student strike and faculty walkout that ended only when UC gave in to FSM demands for campus freedom of political activity.

Over the course of the campaign, the FSM developed a pointed critique of the university as a servant of the status quo and a tool of social control. Analyzing the writings of Chancellor Kerr, who minimized undergraduate education and boasted instead of the university's service to corporations and the State, former Shachtmanite Hal Draper and other FSM leaders developed an ideology that linked student dissatisfaction at UC to the larger political and economic forces changing the university and American society. The transformation of students' individual concerns into collective political issues was essential to the FSM's success in building a broad-based campus movement.

The other key factor undergirding the FSM's success was its ability to adapt the tactics, philosophy, and organizational structure of the civil rights movement to a new context and constituency. Many key FSM activists had taken part in local civil rights campaigns, and leaders such as Mario Savio had gone South to work with SNCC in the 1964 Mississippi Freedom Summer. Drawing on this experience, the activists built a highly democratic, almost anarchic organizational structure, prefiguring their goal of a university where students could participate in the decisions that shaped their lives. Like early SNCC activists, they gained a wide audience by using the language of traditional American values such as democracy, community, and freedom, and avoiding the "alien rhetoric" of class conflict.

The size and militancy of the FSM startled observers who still thought that America's white college students were politically conservative and apathetic. Intensive media coverage of the FSM broadcast the unexpected image of bright, white young Americans braving arrest to mount a radical challenge to a highly respected liberal institution. Many veterans of the student movement of the late sixties in America and Western Europe have since recalled that watching news reports on the FSM encouraged them to begin thinking of themselves as radical student activists.

A few months after the triumph of the FSM, the United States escalated the war in Vietnam, and student protests helped initiate the anti-war movement. In the years that followed, student activists across the country drew upon the fresh language, tactics, and organizational style modeled by the FSM in protesting campus militarism, racism, and authoritarianism. The FSM not only revealed the contradictions of the modern "multiversity," but also demonstrated that white, middle-class students could be a significant force for social change in the postwar world. Historically linking the civil rights protests of the early 1960s to the anti-war and student power demonstrations of the later years, the FSM served as a catalyst for the explosive growth of the New Left in America and around the world.

FREE THOUGHT. The English-language anticlerical free-thought movement revived in post-Civil War America parallel to the labor and socialist movements. Although no merger took place, these movements converged on issues of atheism, secularism, free love, and some aspects of women's rights. In organized free thought, sympathy for labor's cause dates to the debates at the Free Thinkers' Convention at Watkins, New York, in 1878 in the aftermath of the Great Strike of 1877. Such leanings continued into the Haymarket era with free-thought organs such as the Truth Seeker (New York), Lucifer (Kansas), and the Word (Massachusetts) speaking out for the Chicago anarchists. These publications were associated with the names of their libertarian founders—D. M. Bennett, Moses Harman, and Ezra Heywood—who were forceful critics of both church and capitalist state.

From 1887, Left free thought influenced notable women, such as Lucy Parsons, Voltairine de Cleyre, and Emma Goldman. Emma Lazarus, Elizabeth Cady Stanton, Susan B. Anthony, Josephine Tilton, Matilda Joslyn Gage, Helen Keller, and other Left-oriented women of the Progressive era were also freethinkers.

Free thought flavored the rebirth of the radical labor movement with the forming of the Industrial Workers of the World in 1905. The Wobblies, most notably songwriter Joe Hill, aggressively attacked the theory of religious compensation in many writings and songs.

Free thought deeply influenced attorney Clarence Darrow, ardent defender of the labor Left in the Debs case of 1894 and the Haywood case of 1907. Theodore Schroeder (1864–1953), who aided Emma Goldman in San Diego and Denver trials, helped in free-speech fights in Chicago and Paterson, New Jersey. Schroeder also defended “Bad Bishop” William Montgomery Brown, expelled by his church for attacking religion from the communist viewpoint in Communism and Christianity (1920).

Publishers Emanuel Haldeman-Julius (1889–1951) and the Charles H. Kerr Company brought numerous scientific free-thought and socialist texts on the religious question to radical readers. After World War II the United Secularists of America, founded by socialist William McCarthy, brought out the journal Progressive World (1947–1981). The 1980s elicited strong convergences of socialist democratic and freethinking tendencies in humanism, while the anarchist-atheist affinity kindled the new series of the Match (1982–).

FREIE ARBETER SHTIMME. The outstanding anarchist publication in the Yiddish language, and the most popular anarchist publication of any kind in America, the Freie Arbeter Shtimme (FAS; Free Voice of Labor) long served as central mechanism for anarchist ethics and aesthetics within the Jewish immigrant world. It also epitomized the adaptation of many anarchists to the reality of shrinking influence, a strategy that matched accommodation to middle-of-the-road unionism with undaunted philosophical discourse.

The FAS was founded in 1890 as an American version of the highly successful London Arbeter Frint (Workers Friend), intended, like the Frint, to bring together anarchists and socialists under one editorial roof. But in America, the socialists had the upper hand in resources and editorial talent. The outstanding early contributor to the FAS, poet David Edelstadt, died of tuberculosis at the age of twenty-six after composing verses that became classics in the Yiddish choral repertoire. His comrade Joseph Bovshover, the earliest bohemian Jewish radical and the other outstanding anarchist poet, was soon confined to a mental institution. The FAS disappeared for a few years at the end of the century, only to return under the hand of experienced London editor Sh. Yanofsky, who dominated the paper until his departure in 1920.

In the meantime, the FAS and its constituency had adjusted themselves to a narrower political gauge. Active within the Jewish socialist fraternal movement and unions, they adamantly opposed the extreme Left embodied in the Socialist Labor Party and the revolutionary garment unions formed by the Industrial Workers of the World. They aligned themselves, informally and almost unconsciously, with the Poale Tsion (Labor Zionist) movement, many of whose members shared a vague utopianism and a desire to make practical changes in daily life.

The FAS, its pages studded with di yunge, young rebellious poets of the ghetto, reached a circulation of thirty thousand amid the last major Jewish diaspora. But Yanofsky's support of American entry into World War I (following anarchist Peter Kropotkin's similar endorsement) disheartened many readers. Others felt drawn, although sometimes only temporarily, to the Russian Revolution and the new Yiddish Communist Freiheit.

The FAS struck early and hard at the new Russian regime, and its followers could be counted upon to support the garment union mainstream against Communist challenges. Its own anarchism became steadily more philosophical and reactive. It retained perhaps ten thousand readers as a "free thought" forum for the older reader and the shrinking but still significant numbers of young Yiddish writers; and for the last outstanding "Yiddish" anarchist luminary, the gentile German intellectual Rudolf Rocker. But it remained a beacon of traditional anarchism as well, albeit mixed increasingly with a liberal anticommunism and a crypto-Zionism. Its activist readers, comfortable with the fraternal Yiddishist atmosphere of the Workmen's Circle, convoked anarchistic study groups within the Circle, raised funds for the Spanish anarchists, and accommodated themselves to an amiable libertarianism.

By the 1940s–1950s, the FAS became increasingly a newspaper of anniversaries and reprinted poems or essays. Several of the distinguished old-time Yiddish writers, such as Abraham Raysen, continued to write for the paper until their deaths. A handful of younger writers, such as the melancholy eccentric A. Almi, contributed fresh essays on a variety of subjects, from music to literature. For the most part, the FAS celebrated its own, the great individuals and causes past or passing. As the present dimmed, in a world diminished by the Holocaust and by the passing of Jewish labor into the middle classes, the past grew brighter. In the paper's last years, anarchist historian Paul Avrich became a major interpreter of tradition, his essays translated from the English for the faithful. In 1976 the final editor, Arne Thorne—syndicalist by inclination and typesetter at the Jewish Daily Forward by occupation—closed the paper for lack of finances and readership.

FREIE GEMEINDEN AND FREIDENKER.

The development of Freie Gemeinden, or "free congregations," in Germany was tied to the growing conservative influence of the established Catholic and Protestant churches during the Restoration after 1815. During the 1840s, Freie Gemeinden were formed by members of both church groups as a protest against strict orthodoxy and the conservative political position taken by the church hierarchies. These free congregations attempted to avoid hierarchical structures by having "speakers" who substituted for clergymen, and their members arrived at decisions in a democratic way on matters affecting them. The free congregations were by no means atheistic, but they advocated the practice of religion tempered by reason and science. In Germany, the high point of membership in the Freie Gemeinden occurred in the early 1850s, when they claimed approximately 150,000 adherents. After this point, these groups either lost members or evolved into Freidenker-Vereine (free-thinker societies), which were decidedly more atheistically oriented. The purpose of these latter groups was to free people from religious misperceptions, proceeding from a rational and scientific perspective, and to champion the absolute freedom of religious belief or nonbelief.

Among German immigrants to the United States, several free-thought papers existed prior to 1850. The most important of these was the journal Die Fackel (The Torch) published by Samuel Ludvig from 1843–1869. However, it was the immigration of radical "Forty-Eighters" that gave impetus to the founding of Freie Gemeinden in many cities around the country. The first Freie Gemeinde in the United States was formed on 6 November 1850 in Saint Louis by Franz Schmidt, member of the Frankfurt Parliament in 1848. Several attempts were made to unite local groups into a national organization, but these larger groups generally did not cohere for long. For example, in 1897 the Bund der Freien Gemeinden und Freidenker-Vereine von Nord-Amerika (Association of Free Congregations and Freethinking Societies of North America) was founded in Saint Louis, reporting that it had eight congregations with a total of 814 members but that more congregations existed outside it. Many of the most well known German Americans of the day were connected with the free congregation movement, including Eduard Schroeter, Friedrich Schünemann-Pott, Karl Heinzen, Adolf Douai, and Robert Reitzel. The freethinkers published a large number of papers and journals in cities around the country, most importantly the Freidenker (The Freethinker, 1872–1942, published in Wisconsin and Minnesota). After the turn of the century, membership in these groups declined, and there are no longer any active congregations.

As in Germany, the Freie Gemeinden tended to develop into Freidenker-Vereine with a more atheistic viewpoint. The main principles of the Freidenker with respect to religion were that they did not think that belief in God, immortality, and the divinity of Jesus was necessary to lead an ethical life. Placing their main emphasis on rationality and a scientific approach to the world, they argued against revealed religion and advocated the total separation of church and state. Politically, the Freidenker supported the equality of the races, sexes, and classes. They were in agreement with German American socialists on the necessity of a shorter working day, free public education, and other issues affecting the working class. Also, they were often allied closely with German American Turner groups until the latter became more conservative after the American Civil War and the unification of Germany. The Freidenker often established free schools for children (sometimes in conjunction with the socialists) that offered instruction in German, English, and the natural sciences.

In the United States, free thought was also a significant movement among English-speaking citizens and other ethnic groups (especially the Bohemians) in the late nineteenth century. Thus, the German Freidenker were part of a much larger context of groups advocating atheism, rationalism, or secular humanism.

FROMM, ERICH (1900–1980). A world-renowned psychoanalyst, social theorist, and public intellectual, Erich Fromm was the author of fourteen books, the most important of which were Escape from Freedom and Man for Himself. Although he felt drawn to the ideas of revolutionary transformation that he found in Marx, and the way in which Marx made spirit a dialectical projection of the alienated and unrealized human potential suppressed by the existing social order, he found the psychological foundations of Marxism lacking. He sought to remedy this failing by linking Marxism's psycho-spiritual foundations to a number of important developments in Western psychological and spiritual thought.

Trained by and affiliated with the Institute for Social Research (or Frankfurt School) from 1930 to 1938, he fled Germany in 1933 and resettled in the United States, lecturing at several universities. During this period, he sought to give Marxian psychology an orthodox Freudian base. By introducing concepts such as neurosis, the unconscious, libido, and resistance, Fromm hoped to deal more effectively with the popular attachments to authority and other problems that evidently blocked social transformation. As he continued to develop his ideas, however, he broke with the Frankfurt School, became a formulator of neo-Freudianism, and repeatedly reformulated the Marx-Freud synthesis.

In Escape from Freedom (1941) and other books capturing a large public audience, Fromm searched for a theory of human nature that would do justice to the concepts of spirit and transformation in Marx's own writings. Rejecting libido theory, the universality of the death complex, and the death instinct, he developed a philosophical anthropology that defined the distinctive essence of human nature in its ontological incompleteness.

A bold figure during the Cold War era, assailing capitalism's pseudo-solutions in Man for Himself (1947) and The Sane Society (1955), he was a founder of the National Committee for a Sane Nuclear Policy—it was his suggestion to call it SANE for short—and a prominent leader of the Ban the Bomb movement. Although often seen as a moderate and comfortable idealist in retrospect, his ideas and even more his gift for popularization made him an important figure for the early New Left. From the middle 1960s, however, Fromm grew more politically cautious as he fell out of favor with radical youths. Engaged in a long-running battle with Herbert Marcuse (whom he attacked as a "nihilist"), he associated himself with the social democratic wing of the peace movement unwilling to break entirely with mainstream liberalism or to demand the withdrawal of U.S. troops from Southeast Asia. For these reasons among others, Fromm seemed to many readers an outdated figure.

Nevertheless, Fromm wrote prolifically almost until his death, continuing his pursuit of a Freud-Marx synthesis and exploration of the irrationalities that blocked transformation. If his project remained unfinished, his work continued to have a wide popular following.

FRONT GROUPS. Radical organizations often seek to influence political events by creating groups that deal with only one aspect of their general program. Such groups are called fronts. In this context front does not indicate a façade but a broadly based coalition. Front may also indicate a general policy of working with other groups on commonly held positions even if there is no formal organization. Fronts take on issues such as opposition to nuclear war, defense of political prisoners, and promotion of civil rights in a manner that unites persons who would not join a political party or might disagree on other issues. The group(s) that originates the front tries to give it direction, but if the front succeeds in attracting wide participation, the sharing of decision-making becomes essential if the front is to survive. Activists in a front are usually aware of the forces that shaped the front, but the general public is likely to perceive the organization as spontaneously formed. Organizations and individuals within a front usually have a similarity of views on more than the issue at hand, but many fronts contain forces otherwise antagonistic to one another.

FUR AND LEATHER WORKERS. The International Fur and Leather Workers Union (IFLWU) is a prime example of a successful Communist-led American trade union. Its success was largely due to the efforts of Ben Gold and close associates such as Irving Potash, Jack Schneider, and Joseph Winogradsky. Gold joined the Communist movement from its inception and remained a member until compelled to resign in 1950.

The fur workers union of the 1910s was controlled by right-wing Socialists and trade union bureaucrats. Gold, who had been born in Bessarabia in 1898, entered the fur industry in 1912 and quickly drifted into the orbit of the left-wing Socialists. In 1917 he served as a leader of militant fur workers in a Montreal strike. Returning to New York, he became head of a progressive faction that sought to take over the leadership of the union. Through considerable courage and the skillful handling of strikes, Red-baiting, and other political challenges, the Gold group won the loyalty of the predominantly Jewish rank and file.

Typical of the leadership's foresight and determination was the organization of some three hundred shops employing fifteen hundred to two thousand Greek workers. Strikes had previously been lost or weakened when work at struck shops flowed to the nonunion Greek sector. The former leadership considered the Greeks unorganizable, but Gold, using Greek-speaking organizers from the Communist Party, unionized the Greek shops in a brief whirlwind campaign in 1926.

Shortly after the Greek shops were organized, the union called an industrywide strike. A bitter and difficult conflict was capped by a substantial victory that firmly established the Gold leadership. The forty-hour work week was won, wages raised, legal holidays obtained, working conditions improved, and job security protected. In subsequent years the union would build upon this base to establish wages, hours, and conditions that were among the best in the garment industry.

Employers had often used gunmen and "sluggers" to work their will in the garment districts of New York. During the 1930s the fur bosses hired gangs led by Louis "Lepke" Buchalter and Jacob "Gurrah" Shapiro. The union formed defense units and bested the hoodlums in a bloody series of confrontations that resulted in serious injuries and deaths on both sides. Almost alone among the garment unions, the fur workers could boast that they had defended their interests against gangsters without having to hire gangsters of their own to do the job. The battle with hoodlums is a central theme in Leonard Kriegel's Quitting Time (1982), a novel loosely based on the union's leaders and history. Lepke would become notorious in later years as the main figure in Murder, Inc.

By the end of the 1930s the fur workers had organized one hundred percent of their industry and had become pioneer members of the Congress of Industrial Organizations. Their success in fur led to a request by leather workers for affiliation. Wages, conditions, and hours for leather workers were despicable, and the existing union was collapsing rather than growing. Under the Gold administration, the new IFLWU was able to win benefits for leather workers that were comparable to those of the fur workers. Membership in the IFLWU swelled to 100,000.

While the union focused most of its energies on trade union issues, it was part of the Left culture of its time. The union sent an ambulance to the Spanish Republic, and some of its leaders and members fought in the Abraham Lincoln Brigade. The union later sent funds for a hospital in China set up by Dr. Norman Bethune for use by Mao Tse-tung's guerrilla army. In later years the union would question the Korean War and offer guards for Paul Robeson's threatened concerts in Peekskill, New York. While only a few members were African American, the union was a strong advocate of full civil rights for all races and elected African Americans to union posts. The Greek section of the union was the focus of Left cultural life of New York City's Greek community and the leader in Greek war-relief work directed through the trade union movement. More broadly, the fur workers had close working relations with the American Labor Party and its various initiatives.

In the postwar era, the IFLWU came under heavy pressure resulting from the Taft-Hartley Act. Gold had always avowed his Communist views and had held visible posts in the Communist Party, but his leadership group was a true alliance of Communists, Socialists, and liberals. The union was a model of internal democracy and was free of economic scandals. Gold voluntarily resigned his Party membership to comply with provisions of Taft-Hartley, but he did so in a letter that praised Communist objectives and practice. His resignation was termed "fraudulent" and "insincere" and led to long court battles in which radical East Harlem politician Vito Marcantonio served as Gold's counsel. Although Gold ultimately won in the courts, the survival of the IFLWU required additional concessions to the reunited American Federation of Labor and Congress of Industrial Organizations (AFL-CIO).

Other IFLWU leaders with past or present Communist affiliations had to resign their posts. Some of the Greek Communists would, in fact, be deported under the McCarran-Walter Act. Thus purged of card-carrying Reds, the IFLWU made an accommodation in 1955 by which it became the Fur and Leather Department of the Amalgamated Meat Cutters. Patrick Gorman, the secretary-treasurer of the Amalgamated, was a longtime socialist and a militant trade unionist. He integrated the IFLWU staff into important posts in the Amalgamated, which grew rapidly and took progressive stances on civil rights and was an early opponent of the war in Vietnam. In 1979 the Amalgamated merged with the Retail Clerks to form the United Food and Commercial Workers International Union, the largest in the AFL-CIO. The remaining fur and leather locals, greatly reduced in size owing to contraction of their industry, retained some sense of their special history and a commitment to a socially oriented labor movement.

FUTURIANS. The Futurian Society of New York, usually referred to simply as "the Futurians," was a left-leaning science-fiction fan club of the late 1930s and early 1940s. Of the thirty-plus members, nearly a dozen were at one time or another members of the Young Communist League and at least one, John B. Michel, was an active (though unadmitted) member of the Communist Party. Most of the membership, however, was at most liberal but unaffiliated (for example, Isaac Asimov) or simply nonpolitical. What held the Futurians together was not so much politics as a general desire to succeed as professional editors or writers of science fiction. More than half of the members attained that goal.

In the late 1930s a smaller group within the Futurians, styling itself "the Committee for the Political Advancement of Science Fiction," led by Michel and Donald A. Wollheim, attempted to politicize the science-fiction fan community along generally socialist lines. They published pamphlets and "fanzines"—amateur mimeographed magazines devoted to science-fiction fan affairs—espousing the doctrine of "Micheлизм," a sort of generic Marxism with heavy emphasis on future speculations. The Committee and Micheлизм died young, and it would be hard to detect any overt impact they may have made on the political thinking of science-fiction fans and writers in general. However, the many Futurians who went on to sometimes distinguished careers as professional editors or authors in the field (Wollheim, Robert W. Lowndes, Damon Knight, Asimov, James Blish, C. M. Kornbluth, and Frederik Pohl among them) were influential as individuals, in political as well as other areas. World War II thinned the ranks of the Futurians, as most of the members went into the armed services. Although it continued a sort of shadow existence until the late 1940s, its most active phase ended around 1943.

GALLEANI, LUIGI (1861–1931). The dominant figure of the Italian antiorganizational anarchist movement in the United States, Luigi Galleani was less a theorist than an agitator and propagandist who believed that ideas without action were sterile. His anarchism was of Bakuninist derivation but strongly influenced by Peter Kropotkin's The Conquest of Bread. For Galleani, anarchism was simply the absolute negation of authority and the autonomy of the individual in free association with others. But he rejected individualistic anarchism, emphasizing the solidarity of the proletariat as the basis for anarcho-communism. The anarchist society, in his opinion, could only be realized through social revolution, which required the violent and total destruction of the existing social order. Galleani hailed all spontaneous expressions of the revolutionary spirit, including the individual violent acts of Gaetano Bresci and Leon Czolgosz, as preparation of the masses for the final battle, the general strike that would bring about the collapse of the capitalist system. A charismatic orator, facile writer, and fierce polemicist, Galleani for a half century exerted a powerful influence over a substantial segment of the Italian workers in both Italy and the United States.

Born in Vercelli (Piedmont) on 12 August 1861 into a middle-class and monarchist family, Galleani received a good bourgeois education. But as a student of law at the University of Turin, he was swept up in the socialist ferment of the 1880s. His writings in the labor press, his speeches in the piazza, his prominent role in workers' organizations and strikes quickly established Galleani as a fiery leader of the emerging radical movement in northern Italy. These activities also brought him to the attention of the authorities, resulting in arrests, imprisonments, and a period of exile. In the split between anarchists and socialists that culminated at the Congress of Genoa in 1892, Galleani, then an organizational anarchist, was a leading exponent of the intransigent, antiparliamentary position. During the Crispian reaction of the nineties, he was sentenced to prison and confinement, but escaped after several years from the island of Pantelleria.

Upon his arrival in the United States in October 1901, Galleani immediately resumed his work of agitation and propaganda. He became editor of La Questione Sociale of Paterson, New Jersey, but because of his dramatic part in a violent silk-workers' strike fled to Canada in 1902. Reentering the United States under the pseudonym Luigi Pimpino, he began publication of Cronaca Sovversiva in Barre, Vermont, on 6 June 1903. For sixteen years, Cronaca was Galleani's pulpit, from which he preached the gospel of anarchism and lashed his enemies, particularly the socialists. Although he successfully solicited articles from such notables as Peter Kropotkin, Galleani complained that "the Cronaca in spite of the variety of pseudonyms ends up being the work of only one person." The newspaper had a circulation of some five thousand with wide distribution in Europe as well as both Americas.

Cronaca bore the stamp of Galleani's mind and character: forceful, polemical, passionate. Although his avowed purpose was the intellectual and moral elevation of the workers, one wonders how many of the semiliterate immigrants were able to master his elegant, sometimes ornate, prose. Many of his writings were subsequently republished in book or pamphlet form, as were tracts by other leading anarchists. Copies of these could be found in libraries of the circoli di studi sociali and in the homes of ordinary workers. Galleani also vigorously carried on the propaganda of the spoken word, delivering thousands of speeches in meeting halls and miners' shacks in the course of frequent tours. Wherever there were labor struggles, he leaned into the fray, suffering arrests and jailings. While it is difficult to measure the efficacy of this propaganda, the scores of autonomous groups of "Galleanisti" that sprang up around the country were evidence of conversions.

When the Great War broke out, Galleani, vehemently antimilitarist and antinationalist, took an uncompromising position. It was a quarrel among the bourgeoisie for power and profits. Rather than use arms against other workers, the proletariat should use them to reclaim its land, bread, and liberty, he believed. Galleani published anti-war tracts in which he sought to dissuade immigrants from returning to Italy for military service. In a 26 May 1917 issue of Cronaca, American military conscription was condemned as a form of slavery and thus contrary to the Constitution! During the war, Galleani and Cronaca came under increasing scrutiny by federal intelligence agencies. Galleani himself was arrested, as were hundreds of subscribers, and Cronaca was eventually suppressed. Its last regular issue was that of 18 July 1918, but two clandestine issues appeared in March and May 1919. Defiant to the last, Galleani called upon the comrades to avenge themselves upon their tormentors. Whether by coincidence or not, a series of bombings took place in the spring of 1919, culminating with explosions in eight cities on 2 June. On 24 June Galleani was deported, but the United States had not heard the last of him. He resumed publication of Cronaca in Turin in April 1920 with a special American edition under the masthead "A Stormo!" Galleani was finally silenced by the Fascist regime. Sentenced repeatedly to prison and confinement, he lived the last years of his life ill and destitute; he died alone at Caprioliola (Tuscany) on 4 November 1931. Meanwhile, the "Galleanisti" in America had established a new publication, L'Adunata dei Refrattari (The Gathering of the Incurables). Published from 1922 to 1971, L'Adunata continued to propagate Galleani's ideas. The "Galleanisti" persisted as a militant and troublesome presence in the Italian American Left until well after World War II. As their dreams of anarchism receded in the face of twentieth-century realities, they became more and more sectarian, devoted to maintaining the purity of the ideals that Galleani had taught them.

GASTONIA STRIKE. The Loray Mill strike in Gastonia, North Carolina, in the spring and summer of 1929 was largely the result of a decision made by the American Communist Party, following a shift in Comintern policy, to reverse its strategy of "boring from within" existing unions in favor of "dual unionism." The first of the separate revolutionary unions was the National Textile Workers Union (NTWU), created in September 1928. Among its major goals were solidarity with the Soviet Union and the organization of textile laborers in the American South. NTWU agents selected Gastonia's Loray Mill, the largest in the area, with thirty-five hundred workers, as a prime target.

Fred Beal, a New Bedford strike leader and Communist Party member, was selected to lead the Gastonia effort. Residing in nearby Charlotte for three months prior to the strike, Beal established contact with Loray workers, convincing them of the advantages of a union. On 1 April both shifts walked out, demanding increased wages, a forty-hour week, abolition of the notorious stretch-out system, and union recognition. Rejecting their demands, mill owners organized a "Committee of One Hundred" to fight the union. The local press incited citizens to violence, urging destruction of the strike and the "Red Russianism" inspiring it; the governor called in the National Guard to break up the picket lines.

While the American Federation of Labor denounced the strike, Communist Party officials in New York sent representatives of the Workers International Relief, the International Labor Defense, the Young Communist League, the Young Pioneers, and the Daily Worker to Gastonia. Directions from central headquarters, in accord with goals of the international Communist movement, often proved inappropriate for the Gastonia situation. Despite insufficient funds for the Loray strike, Party leaders called for a general strike throughout the textile South. Although only two blacks worked in Loray Mill, the Party made racial equality a central issue in the rhetoric surrounding the strike, antagonizing white mill-workers as well as the "uptown" community.

Intent on ending the strike, policemen terrorized picket lines composed largely of women and children, an armed mob demolished union headquarters, and mill owners evicted strikers from company houses. In an exchange of gunfire on the night of 7 June, the chief of police was slain. Sixteen strikers and leaders, including Beal and three women organizers—Vera Buch, Sophie Melvin, and Amy Schecter—were charged with first-degree murder. In major cities throughout the Western world, groups of the political Left gathered petitions and demonstrated in the streets on behalf of the accused.

At the trial, the defendants confined their testimonies to the facts of the case, but witness Edith Miller shocked the courtroom by denouncing capitalism and religion, and proclaiming the virtues of the Soviet system. Seven of the accused were found guilty of second-degree murder, charges having been dropped against the other nine. Released on bail provided by the American Civil Liberties Union, the defendants fled to the Soviet Union, where four remained permanently. In contrast, when mill worker and ballad singer Ella May Wiggins was slain in a hail of gunfire on 14 September, the five Loray employees indicated for her murder were never convicted.

Although Loray Mill workers gained a slightly reduced work week and the eventual abolition of night work for women and children, the strike of 1929 was a failure. Throughout the South, textile labor remained unorganized. Yet the Gastonia strike left its mark on proletarian literature. In the very year of the strike, Michael Gold, editor of the New Masses, urged young American writers to "go left" for a firsthand knowledge of working-class life.

To go left was to go South, to Gastonia for rich material that fed the imaginations of novelists eager to employ "art as a class weapon." The political issues and violent drama of the Gastonia strike inspired no fewer than six novels in the 1930s: Mary Heaton Vorse, Strike! (1930); Sherwood Anderson, Beyond Desire (1932); Fielding Burke (Olive Tilford Dargan), Call Home the Heart (1932); Grace Lumpkin, To Make My Bread (1932), recipient of the Maxim Gorky Award for the best labor novel of the year; Myra Page, Gathering Storm: A Story of the Black Belt (1932); and William Rollins, The Shadow Before (1934).

For realistic portrayals of mill workers, the four women novelists surpassed the more experimental novels of Rollins and Anderson. Vorse, Page, Lumpkin, and Burke were especially sensitive to the problems of women as mill workers and activists. Lumpkin and Vorse portray fictional representations of strike martyr Ella May Wiggins; Burke feminizes her rebellious heroine; and Page makes the problems of black women central to her work. In addressing issues of gender as well as class, women novelists added an essential dimension to proletarian fiction.

GAY/LESBIAN LIBERATION MOVEMENT.

On 27 June 1969, the patrons of the Stonewall Inn, a gay bar in New York's Greenwich Village, reacted angrily and violently to a police raid. The unprecedented response to police harassment sparked three days of rioting. That revolt is now recognized as the inception of a process that has transformed gays and lesbians into a minority group with its own issues, culture, and a politics very much on the Left of the U.S. political spectrum. Every year on the last Sunday of June, Stonewall is commemorated by massive Gay Pride marches in New York City and San Francisco as well as smaller manifestations throughout the United States. These events constitute some of the largest political mobilizations since the anti-Vietnam War rallies.

Intellectual and political developments in Europe prior to Stonewall, particularly in the Soviet Union and Germany, had enormous impact on the way gay liberation in the United States evolved. The conceptualization of "homosexual" as an identity as opposed to isolated sexual acts occurred for the first time in the second half of the nineteenth century. In 1869 Karoly Benkert, a Hungarian doctor, coined the word homosexual. Recognizing the scapegoating function that the homosexual served for a repressive society, Benkert joined the Scientific Humanitarian Committee, founded in 1897 by the German doctor Magnus Hirschfeld to further tolerance toward gays and lesbians.

The committee's efforts remained focused on circulating a petition among prominent people calling for the removal of the paragraph from the German criminal code criminalizing homosexual acts. Socialist August Bebel spoke in favor of the petition in the Reichstag on 13 January 1898, and from that time leaders of the Social Democratic Party, including Karl Kautsky and Eduard Bernstein, became its primary supporters. From abroad this campaign was supported by Emile Zola, Leo Tolstoy, and Sigmund Freud, who insisted that "inverts cannot be regarded as degenerate."

The Social Democratic Party took up the cause and Die Neue Zeit, its newspaper, carried news of the gay movement. In its pages, Bernstein defended Oscar Wilde (who had propagandized for socialism and protested against the execution of the Haymarket martyrs). Bernstein argued against the notion that homosexuality was unnatural by noting that "moral attitudes are historical phenomena" and reflect a society's stage of development rather than any genuine state of nature.

Hirschfeld's work led to the founding of the World League for Sexual Reform, which at its peak had affiliated organizations with a total membership of 130,000. The Nazis' rise to power forced Hirschfeld—triple threatened as a Jew, a Leftist, and a homosexual—into exile. On 6 May 1933, at 9:30 A.M., storm troopers raided the Institute of Sexual Science, which housed the World League for Sexual Reform. A few days later, in a torchlight procession, the Nazis impaled on a pike a bust of Hirschfeld and threw it on a pyre with the institute's ten thousand books. In 1935, while trying to reestablish the institute in France, Hirschfeld died.

The Nazis, extending penalties against homosexuals for actions that included thinking homosexual thoughts, murdered tens and perhaps hundreds of thousands of homosexuals. They summarily shot those homosexuals found in the military and delivered those found in the general society to concentration camps. Tagged with the pink triangle, homosexuals inhabited the ninth circle of this hell. Even to this day, organizations speaking for other categories of Holocaust victims have difficulty acknowledging their sharing the pyre with homosexuals.

The Soviet Union had sent official delegations to the world conferences of the World League for Sexual Reform. The League held Soviet law as the model because legislation by the Bolshevik government in December 1917 treated sodomy exactly the same as vaginal intercourse. The German Communist Party had supported the movement to decriminalize homosexuality and under the leadership of Wilhelm Reich had formed the Deutscher Reichsverband für Proletarische Sexualpolitik, which attracted more than twenty thousand members.

Shortly after the Nazi constitutional coup, however, the Communist Party of the Soviet Union altered its official ideology to define homosexuality as "the product of decadence in the bourgeois sector of society." Moreover, it increasingly linked homosexuality to counterrevolution. Mass arrests of gays began and in March 1934 the state introduced a law punishing homosexual acts with imprisonment of up to eight years.

Individuals elsewhere had taken up this cause. Most notably Edward Carpenter (1844–1929), an English man of letters, envisioned a revolution destroying the existing “commercial regime” and replacing it with a new society embodying “to the fullest extent the two opposite poles of Communism and Individualism in one vital unity.” But it was only in Germany where a sustained movement existed. Furthermore, although the gay rights movement had attracted the positive attention of many liberals, it was clearly a manifestation of the Left. The Soviet Union’s repudiation of civil equality for gays and lesbians caused the Left to withdraw from this struggle.

Within the United States, expressions of support for homosexuality were limited to passages from Walt Whitman’s poems, certain writings and lectures of Emma Goldman, and a short-lived Society for Human Rights established in Chicago in 1923. Therefore the United States was an unlikely place for the reemergence of the gay and lesbian movement. Even more unlikely was the time—1950.

In Los Angeles, a long-term Communist Party member, Harry Hay, invited four friends to discuss the formation of an organization for the purpose of “liberating one of our largest minorities from . . . social persecution.” By 1951 under Hay’s leadership, several Communists and Leftists founded the Mattachine Society (named after mattachines, mysterious medieval figures in masks who Hay surmised were homosexual). Mattachine viewed gays and lesbians as an oppressed cultural minority suffering from a false consciousness caused by the internalization of the dominant culture’s defamatory conception of gays and lesbians. Further borrowing from the Marxist-Leninist ideological armature, it saw the task of liberating homosexuals as the responsibility of homosexuals themselves, who alone could substitute for lives based on “self-deceit, hypocrisy, and charlatanism” an “ethical homosexual culture” based on a “new pride . . . in participating in the cultural growth and social achievements of . . . the homosexual minority.”

The Mattachine Society’s highly centralized structure, reflecting the Communist Party background of its founders, consisted of a pyramid of five “orders” of membership with increased levels of responsibility. The fifth order, comprising the founders, had representatives in the fourth order, representatives from the fourth had representatives in the third, and so on. The leadership expected this structure to duplicate itself as the society grew.

At this time all but two states classified sodomy as a felony, with only murder, kidnapping, and rape eliciting heavier sentences. Psychiatry branded the homosexual as pathological, and religion castigated homosexual activity as sinful. The entire culture of the 1950s reaffirmed traditional gender roles, casting further outside the pale those who deviated from the sexual norms.

In tandem with the anticommunist hysteria of the time, the government conducted an as yet largely unacknowledged antihomosexual witch-hunt. In 1950 the chair of the Republican Party asserted that “sexual perverts who have infiltrated our government in recent years . . . [are] perhaps as dangerous as the actual Communists.” That same year, the Senate authorized an investigation into the presence of homosexuals “and other moral perverts” in the government. Its report argued that homosexuals lacked the “emotional stability of normal persons” and had a weakened moral fiber and warned that even “one homosexual can pollute a government office.” By emphasizing the risk that homosexuals could be lured or blackmailed into betrayal of the United States, the Senate report directly linked the homosexual, the sexual subversive, to the Communist, the political subversive.

Starting in 1950 the number of homosexuals dismissed from the federal government’s employ rose from five to sixty per month. Under Eisenhower, the loyalty-security program explicitly listed “sexual perversion” as sufficient cause for disbarment from federal jobs. Contrasting with the relatively tolerant attitudes during World War II in the military, the number of “undesirable discharges” (an administrative remedy that precluded all due process guarantees) for homosexuality doubled to two thousand per year and then rose to three thousand in 1960. The Federal Bureau of Investigation fed the Civil Service Commission an endless stream of names of alleged homosexuals garnered from its contacts with local police departments. The Postal Department added to this blacklist by putting tracers on the mail of subscribers of suspect magazines. During the fifties, arrests of homosexuals—many through entrapment—exceeded one thousand per year in Washington, D.C., and twelve hundred per year in Philadelphia.

Defying the powerful currents that were causing all manifestations of nonconformity to retreat, the Mattachine Society grew. The Society’s semipublic discussion groups had a profound impact on their participants, many of whom for the first time found themselves together with others who affirmed their homosexuality.

When in February 1952 one of Mattachine's founding members became a victim of entrapment by the Los Angeles Police Department, the fifth order decided to fight back by organizing a front group, the Citizens Committee to Outlaw Entrapment. Gays and lesbians responded to Mattachine literature: they joined in increasing numbers and contributed generously to the legal defense fund. The defendant admitted to the court that he was homosexual but denied the charges against him. A deadlocked jury—eleven for acquittal—caused the district attorney's office to drop the charges. This absolutely unprecedented fight-back in the history of gay and lesbian people caused Mattachine to grow to more than two thousand participants organized into nearly one hundred discussion groups.

In January 1953 members of the Mattachine founded One, the first homosexual magazine, whose circulation soon reached two thousand. In October 1954, the Los Angeles postmaster seized copies of One as "obscene, lewd, lascivious, and filthy." The editors contested the suppression of their journal and in January 1958 the U.S. Supreme Court unanimously reversed the findings of the lower courts.

Hay and the other original leadership cadre (who had already resigned from the Communist Party) became the target of increasingly pointed Red-baiting by the press and within the Society's ranks. At Mattachine's first convention, held in Los Angeles in April 1953, the delegates supported the leadership's positions opposing McCarthyite attacks on the society and affirming the conception of gays and lesbians as a minority with its own culture. Nonetheless the leadership's fear that their recent political affiliation with the Communist Party would destroy Mattachine caused them to resign. Into the vacuum stepped the conservative spokespersons whose ideological positions had just been defeated.

Within a short time the new leadership replaced Mattachine's radical imprint with an orientation that viewed gays and lesbians as individuals who, except for their sexual preferences, were just like everyone else. Its political thrust consisted of attempts to enlist leading academics and legal experts in the cause of legal equality for gays and lesbians. Now Mattachine published pamphlets reassuring their readers that "homosexuals are not seeking to overthrow or destroy any of society's existing institutions, laws, or mores, but to be assimilated as constructive, valuable, and responsible citizens." The membership and presence of the Mattachine Society declined precipitously. By 1955, however, membership began to increase again and the publication of the Mattachine Review gave renewed impetus to the organization.

Lesbians had participated in the Mattachine Society in small numbers. From the first, it became clear that the Society's agenda did not coincide with the central needs of lesbians. Overriding concern with legal entrapment and persecution resulting from cruising and patronizing gay bars remained irrelevant for lesbians, whose lives tended to be organized around long-term relationships and friendship networks. Lesbians shared the castelike status as legal and moral pariahs, but they also experienced oppression as women. Even within organizations dedicated to gay and lesbian rights, women were often patronized and marginalized.

The Daughters of Bilitis (DOB) and its publication, the Ladder, were founded in 1955 to promote the specific needs of lesbians within the context of the movement for equality for all regardless of sexual orientation. DOB worked closely with One and Mattachine. Nonetheless, as late as 1959, Del Martin, one of the founders of DOB, had to remind the delegates to a Mattachine convention: "Lesbians are not satisfied to be auxiliary members or second-class homosexuals." Mattachine and DOB subsidized their publications, provided support for their membership, and attempted to influence opinion makers. Outside events would soon engulf these enclaves.

The effort to have gays and lesbians recognized as nonconformists rather than deviants began to gain scientific support when Alfred Kinsey (whose studies revealed a much more widespread incidence of homosexual behaviors than previously estimated) and Evelyn Hooker (whose pioneering sociological studies of the gay community suggested no greater incidence of psychological disturbance than in the general population) challenged the psychological and genetic understanding of homosexuality.

The emergence of an openly gay and lesbian community provided a haven where life independent of the straight world could be contemplated. An early expression of this lifestyle was practiced by Beats in the 1950s, who propounded a way of life defying society's conventions—including its rules and regulations about sexual relationships. Many of the most important figures in the beatnik movement were gay, including its poet laureate, Allen Ginsberg.

The Beat Generation's effect was largely limited to relatively small groups in some of the largest cities, and it had nothing to offer to women (that is, "chicks"), no less lesbians. The counterculture of the sixties, with its rejection of the conventional view of respectability and promotion of individualistic, sensual, and spontaneous expression, provided a larger space within which gays and lesbians could begin to live openly. The counterculture's respect for diversity encouraged many gays and lesbians to see their sexuality as something other than an affliction.

That a great center of the Beat Generation and the nascent counterculture, San Francisco, first experienced a mass gay and lesbian movement is no coincidence. Police raids on gay bars—always a problem for gays—reached extreme proportions in 1960. Misdemeanor charges resulting from raids began to total forty to sixty per week. In August 1961 the police arrested more than a hundred patrons of a gay bar. In October the Alcoholic Beverages Commission revoked the liquor licenses of twelve gay bars. Resistance originated when the Alcoholic Beverages Commission started proceedings against the Black Cat as a "resort for sexual perverts." José Sarria, a performer at the Black Cat, achieved great fame within the gay and lesbian community for his consciousness-raising satires. He is especially remembered for ending his performances by having the audience rise, hold hands, and sing "God Save Us Nelly Queens." In 1961 he ran for city supervisor as an open homosexual and a drag queen and garnered six thousand votes.

Subsequently, the homosexual rights organization Society for Individual Rights and the publication Vector—with the support of the tavern owners—emerged out of the bar milieu with participation and circulation greatly exceeding those of the traditional homophile movement. This underscored the centrality of the bars for gays and to a lesser extent for lesbians. It was only in the bars that gays achieved a public space that they controlled. For many it was the only place they could feel truly comfortable, at home, and not alone. By the 1980s there were a greater variety of institutions—churches, community centers, restaurants, political clubs—that served these purposes.

The early organization of gays out of the somewhat unedifying bar milieu explains why gay political power first developed in San Francisco. It also indicated that the gay and lesbian political movement would grow out of an approach that affirmed and helped develop the community while fighting political battles with the straight world.

One of those battles was to elect gay activists to public office. The landmark event in that effort was the election in 1977 of Harvey Milk as city supervisor of San Francisco. Milk's achievement was given a tragic dimension when shortly after taking office he was murdered by a recently resigned right-wing supervisor. The light prison sentence given to his killer led to rioting in the Bay Area. Since Milk's election, a number of politicians at various levels of government have been open about their homosexual orientation. The most prominent of these is Congressman Barney Frank of Massachusetts.

The liberalized milieu of the sixties gave rise to the women's movement—somewhat in advance of the gay liberation movement. From the beginning these movements showed certain tensions, and only gradually their underlying broader unity of purpose. The publication of Betty Friedan's Feminine Mystique in 1963 and the founding of the National Organization for Women (NOW) in 1966 announced the existence of a women's movement. In the June 1967 issue of the Ladder, Del Martin registered one of the first responses to the new feminism from within the growing gay and lesbian movement: "The Lesbian, after all, is first of all a woman—an individual who must earn her own livelihood . . . much more concerned with problems of inequality in job and educational opportunities." The logic of this position led Martin to argue in favor of lesbians leaving homophile organizations in order to participate in NOW, the League of Women Voters, and women's professional organizations.

NOW's ambivalence towards open lesbianism within its ranks surfaced when conservatives led by Friedan made efforts to purge lesbians from elected office. Friedan's effort was defeated in 1971, and NOW went on record to acknowledge "the double oppression of women who are lesbians" and that "the oppression of lesbians [is] a legitimate concern of feminism." Nonetheless, most straight women cringed when Ti-Grace Atkinson declared that "feminism is the theory; lesbianism is the practice."

The subordination of lesbian issues to those of heterosexual women within the women's movement established the need for gay men and women to remain united against homophobia and for antidiscrimination legislation. Within this natural alliance, however, gay men had to struggle to overcome their own male chauvinism and acknowledge independent lesbian concerns. Both gay men and lesbians got their most consistent nongay support from feminists. The mutual concern was patriarchy, defined as the supremacy of the masculine gender with rights conceded to inherent violence and superior physical strength. Gays and lesbians benefit enormously from the blurring of gender categories in daily life. The diminution of sexual stereotyping particularly reduces their being targeted as freaks. Only when women are no longer devalued will genuine equality for gays and lesbians be possible.

In the same way that "Black Is Beautiful" encapsulated the Black Power movement, "Gay Is Good" epitomized the outlook of the new gay and lesbian politics. Modeling itself on the concepts of the black militants, this branch of the gay and lesbian movement no longer sought acceptance by the dominant culture. The evolving gay and lesbian minority demanded respect for its own lifestyles however much at variance with those of the wider society. It demanded equality, not acculturation and total integration.

Organized shortly after Stonewall, the Gay Liberation Front promoted a politics that joined the gay and lesbian movement to other movements committed to the radical reordering of society. The openly gay contingents at peace marches and pro-Black Panther demonstrations often met hostility. Most wrenching of all were the verifications of widespread persecutions of homosexuals in Cuba.

In response, the Gay Activist Alliance (GAA), founded in 1970, focused solely on the needs of the gay and lesbian community. It set out a clear statement of principle: "We as liberated homosexual activists demand the freedom for expression of our dignity and value as human beings through confrontation with and disarmament of all mechanisms which unjustly inhibit us." The GAA began circulating petitions to public officials calling upon them to introduce legislation to eliminate discrimination against gays and lesbians.

Directly inspired by the civil rights movement, from which it frequently borrowed its tactics and strategies, the GAA's focus on antidiscrimination legislation has provided the arena for the greatest degree of unity between gay men and lesbians and the various ideological tendencies and lifestyles present in their communities. The passage of antidiscrimination legislation represents the most visible expressions of progress. Half the states have decriminalized homosexual acts, and fifty counties and municipalities and four states (Massachusetts, Wisconsin, Hawaii, and Connecticut) constituting ten percent of the country's population, have passed legislation barring discrimination against gays and lesbians.

Of inestimable importance to the progress of the gay and lesbian movement was the declaration in 1973 of the American Psychiatric Association and the American Psychological Association that homosexual orientation was not, in itself, an illness. The removal of the stigma of homosexuality as a mental illness has not been met by a similar move to eliminate homosexuality as a sin by organized religions. The Unitarian Church and the Metropolitan Community churches accept homosexual marriages, and liberal Protestant denominations—especially the Quakers, the Disciples of Christ, and the United Church of Christ—have supported antidiscrimination campaigns, but the largest denominations—especially Orthodox Judaism, Roman Catholicism, and most mainstream Protestants—remain a mass ideological base for the perpetuation of the oppression of gays and lesbians.

The strengthening of the gay and lesbian community has increased its power to fight for its rights. The gay and lesbian newspapers, softball teams, choruses, Democratic Party clubs, bars, and Alcoholics Anonymous meetings provide the basis for self-affirmation, self-expression, and the ability to lead lives not twisted out of shape by fear, self-loathing, and hiding. Although gay men and lesbians are found in every class, as an organized political force they inevitably become part of the liberal to radical side of the country's political life. As the stewards of tradition and nostalgia, the Right can never concede "the family"—that is to say, patriarchy. In ways far more radical than even the feminist movement, gays and lesbians represent a subversion of the patriarchal family. Support for even the most minimal degree of gay and lesbian rights is inconceivable from this quarter. Moreover, the Right seems unable to resist active gay-baiting. The religious Right would be at a serious loss to fill its television slots without homophobia, which in its sermons and tracts rivals abortion for condemnation.

Support for the gay and lesbian movement has grown within liberal institutions such as the American Civil Liberties Union, which in 1964 reversed its 1957 policy sustaining the constitutionality of the sodomy statutes and the security regulations barring gays from federal employment. In 1980 the Democratic Party included a gay-rights plank in its national platform.

Marxist organizations have had a mixed record regarding gay rights. The Communist Party has not supported the movement in any fashion and barely mentions it in its press. The various Maoist groups have generally followed in the same mold. During the 1970s, when some three thousand or so activists oriented toward Maoism tried to form a new Marxist movement, many of the participating groups did not allow gays as members and considered homosexual behavior to be antisocial. This antigay position derived from the conviction that political organization must be based on class and that any deviation from that outlook was a bourgeois luxury. Gay rights are seen as civil rights issues at best with a good possibility that gayness may indeed be a psychological illness.

Trotskyism, which in its totality in the 1970s also numbered about three thousand, had a different evolution. The major Trotskyist group, the Socialist Workers Party (SWP), was antigay until a major shift in the mid-1970s. At that time some SWP leaders revealed that they were gay, and gay issues have since been energetically advanced as part of the SWP program. Most of the smaller Trotskyist groups also support gay liberation, the Workers World Party being particularly vigorous.

Democratic Socialists of America, the largest socialist organization, has leaders who are gay and supports gay rights without making them prime issues. The Socialist Party has run a gay for president. The two Left newspapers of highest circulation, the Guardian and In These Times, promoted gay liberation, as have many of the radical quarterlies. Radical America, in the 1980s, was especially strong in its advocacy. The same was true of Left cultural organs such as Jump Cut, Heresies, and Ikon. The first radio programs devoted to gay rights were aired in 1962 on WBAL, the New York station of the Pacifica Foundation.

The more gays and lesbians organize on their own behalf, the more they find their affinity with other despised minorities. The system's tolerance of the failure of the public school system in the ghettos is mirrored in the indifference of the system to the AIDS epidemic. As a result of this reality, African American leadership has accepted gays and lesbians as full-fledged members of the Rainbow coalition. For example, black congress-people almost without exception have co-sponsored legislation to outlaw discrimination against gays. To date, the Reverend Jesse Jackson is the only leader of national prominence who has embraced the movement's full agenda, including spousal rights, the rights of gay and lesbian parents to claim custody of their children, and the decriminalization of sodomy. His 1988 campaign platform stated: "Historically, lesbians and gay men have made great contributions to humankind, yet they have often had to live under conditions of intense oppression. . . . The humanity of lesbians and gay men must be recognized and their rights fully respected." On 11 October 1987 he addressed over half a million demonstrators at the National March on Washington for Lesbian and Gay Rights, who mobilized around a platform that included a call for an end to sexism, racism, and apartheid. Not surprisingly, gays and lesbians constituted a major portion of Jackson's white supporters.

Organizations in the forefront of the struggle to advance gay liberation include the Lambda Legal Defense and Education Fund, which provides legal support for test cases; the Gay and Lesbian Task Force (the first gay and lesbian group with a paid staff and national mission), which provides lobbying resources for initiatives such as the statistical basis for the inclusion of gays and lesbians in antidiscrimination measures; and the Gay and Lesbian Alliance against Discrimination, which has convinced a score of major newspapers and television stations to provide balanced reporting on gay and lesbian issues. The many gay and lesbian caucuses in organizations such as the American Library Association and the Democratic Party are also making significant contributions.

The assertion of homosexual identification ("coming out") has been recognized as the prime step in the emancipation from the internalization of society's homophobia. What appears to be a personal act is, in fact, a profoundly political act. The potential risks include loss of employment, ostracism from family and community, excommunication from churches, and being targeted for violence. This set of circumstances usually leads to an identification of gay and lesbian communities as the primary sources of support and compensation. Organizations based on those communities become the political vehicles for establishing basic political and human rights.

The agenda of the gay and lesbian movement is a long one. Like rape, violence against gays is underreported. The National Gay and Lesbian Task Force found that more than one in five gay men and nearly one in ten lesbians had been physically assaulted in some manner. The murder of gay men is not uncommon, and perpetrators are most often lightly punished.

The federal government explicitly discriminates against gays and lesbians in the military, the Central Intelligence Agency, the Federal Bureau of Investigation, the National Security Agency, and the State Department. It refuses to give security clearance to gays and lesbians. Discrimination continues by state and local governments, private employers, landlords, immigration and naturalization agencies, insurers of all types, and custody and adoption organizations.

Antisodomy laws applying to same-sex adult couples are on the books in twenty-four states and the District of Columbia. These laws, though often no longer enforced, create a devalued sexual category. The movement to remove these statutes has come to a halt because the 1986 Supreme Court decision in Bowers v. Hardwick found that the Constitution does not "confer a fundamental right upon homosexuals to engage in sodomy."

The response of the gay and lesbian community to the AIDS epidemic is one of the best examples of communal self-organization in modern United States history. The Gay Men's Health Crisis (founded 1981) pioneered in every aspect of the AIDS epidemic. The AIDS Coalition to Unleash Power (ACT-UP)—the most visible and radical of gay groups in the late 1980s and the early 1990s—took to the streets to demand that the federal Food and Drug Administration release drugs suspected of combating some aspect of the syndrome prior to the completion of the total testing process, and that housing be created for people with AIDS.

The most unifying issue arising from the gay and lesbian community is the demand for legal recognition of "domestic partnerships." Berkeley, California, has passed domestic-partner legislation giving gay couples the same rights to city benefits as married couples. San Francisco's Board of Supervisors approved a law allowing unmarried partners, both heterosexual and homosexual, to register their relationships with the city, as has New York City. The AIDS epidemic has been responsible for thrusting this issue to the forefront. Innumerable gays have been denied visitation rights in hospitals where their life-partners lay dying. Lovers and friends have been denied access to funerals of gay men by families who previously had shunned the deceased. Cases constantly arise in which bereaved gay or lesbian partners have to leave their homes after the death of their loved ones because there was no legal way of getting their name on the lease. This fight by gays and lesbians for recognition of their relationships has potentially wide import in a nation where only twenty-seven percent of households contain two parents living with children.

Increasing numbers of lesbians and gays are determined to obtain custody and visitation based solely on their parenting. Gays and lesbians are also demanding the right to adopt and care for foster children. The growing visibility of stable gay and lesbian families with children threatens a liberalism that can tolerate deviant sexual relationships but may not be prepared to grant equal status to those hitherto marginalized by their sexual orientation. A wider consequence of the insistence of gays and lesbians for recognition of their relationships as familial has been the expansion of the rights of other nontraditional households through court decisions, union contracts, legislation, and executive orders. Gays and lesbians have been in the forefront of those demanding that society define "family" as an affectional and economic unit committed to the mutual benefit of its members and not a patriarchal relationship sanctioned by tradition, church, and state.

By the end of the 1980s, activists had identified the forces opposing gay liberation as the same forces opposing greater rights for other minorities and oppressed groups. As the Right increasingly stressed traditional values and social structures as a means of attracting and holding electoral support, gays and lesbians found their natural allies to be somewhere on the Left. Radical and liberal organizations, in turn, increasingly accepted gay rights as givens of the progressive agenda.

GELLERT, HUGO (1892-1985). Famous as one of the least overtly political artists of the Masses magazine, Hugo Gellert devoted most of his long political life to the Communist movement and in particular to its Hungarian language group, of which he was unquestionably the most famous member. Born in Budapest, the son of a tailor, Gellert moved with his family to New York at the turn of the century. By his teens, he had developed a double life. He Americanized himself easily, through literature, work as a machinist, and early design work on posters. Simultaneously, he became active with his older brothers in the Hungarian language federation of the Socialist Party, where he gained minor celebrity as an amateur athlete.

Gellert reached his artistic turning point when he attended the National Academy of Design and won a prize trip in 1914 to Paris. He intended to enroll at the Académie Julian, but instead was drawn to the sweeping style of contemporary commercial art, specifically the Michelin tire posters. After a walking tour across Europe, he returned to New York and drew anti-war cartoons for the Hungarian American daily Előre, while making his living in commercial lithography. In 1916 he gravitated to the Masses, and while not joining the staff, he contributed some of the most memorable drawings, famous for their innocence, occasional abstraction, and apparently nonpolitical character.

With the Liberator, Gellert became more directly political, drawing its first cover and serving on its editorial board until the magazine's last days. Its absence "keenly felt," as he recalled, he helped found the New Capitalism's favorite method of disposing of unneeded labor power: war (from Karl Marx's Capital in Lithographs, by Hugo Gellert, 1933).

Masses and contributed illustrations in a variety of styles to its pages. He made a commercial living contributing generally realistic illustrations to the New York World and the New Yorker. During the Depression, he exercised wide influence as director of the John Reed School of Art, chair of Artists Committee of Action, and initiator and prominent activist of the American Artists Congress and a founder of the Mural Artists Guild of the United Scenic Painters. As an artist, he created the billboard design for the Sacco-Vanzetti defense campaign, painted murals for the workers' cafeteria (at Communist Party headquarters), did lithographs for a 1933 edition of Capital, and exhibited his work widely.

Gellert was also extremely active with the Hungarian American Left, drawing frequently for Előre and campaigning on nationally related issues. He played a key role in the 1927 formation of the Anti-Horthy League (against the existing Hungarian government), the second antifascist movement after the Italian American anti-Mussolini efforts. During the Second World War, he joined actor Bela Lugosi, composer Béla Bartók, and others in a wide Hungarian American mobilization.

During the 1950s-1970s, he continued to contribute his art widely, on racism, militarism, and (in a noted poster for Local 1199 of the Drug and Hospital Employees Union) the cause of unionism.

GENERAL STRIKE. When all the workers in a given industry, region, or nation strike simultaneously with the same demands, a general strike is said to have occurred. As far as leftists are concerned, the general strike may be regarded as a tactical or a strategic weapon. If tactical, the general strike, like other strikes, has limited objectives. General strikes of this nature have occurred in various American cities, most notably in Seattle (1919) and San Francisco (1934). In movements influenced by anarcho-syndicalist theories, the general strike is viewed as a revolutionary weapon capable of ending capitalism. This view is distinct from the parliamentary strategy associated with the Socialist Party or the vanguard party concept of Marxist-Leninists.

Anarcho-syndicalists reject the parliamentary road on the grounds that worker power is maximal at the point of production, not at the ballot box. Elections are seen as based on relatively meaningless geographic divisions and conducted in a manner that favors middle- and ruling-class interests. At the turn of the century, when anarcho-syndicalism was strongest in the United States, the electoral road appeared particularly unappealing and essentially undemocratic. Women, workers under the age of twenty-one, and most new immigrants could not vote. Millions of migratory workers did not have a stable address to use for registration purposes, and minorities such as blacks were prevented from voting in the very venues where they were a majority or a significant percent of the population.

Leninism was rejected on the grounds that a genuine transvaluation of old values could not be accomplished by a group of highly trained and professional revolutionaries, however well intentioned. Change must flow from the direct action of millions of workers satisfying their needs and honing their skills through democratically operated unions. Each strike would serve as a training ground in self-management in an every-expanding movement that would culminate in the national general strike. The last strike, the ultimate revolutionary moment, would succeed only if each individual union had already developed a constellation of leaders from its own ranks. Common sense and direct-action experience—not abstract ideology, organizational discipline, or parliamentary guile—would distinguish these leaders.

The strategy of the general strike was most aggressively put forth in the United States by the Industrial Workers of the World during its peak period of 1905–1923. The “Preamble” stated that the solution to economic and social injustice lay in the creation of a worker-controlled system called industrial democracy. The primary task of revolutionaries was to create industrial unions that would fight for gains within the system until strong enough to call a general strike able to bring all economic life to a halt. The conditions for returning to work would be the substitution of industrial unions for all business enterprises and governmental activity. The means of production would then be run by unions to satisfy social needs rather than private profit. What had been done in one nation would be duplicated throughout the globe.

GEORGE, HENRY (1839–1897). Economist, social theorist, renowned lecturer, ardent bicyclist, political candidate, early advocate of the Australian ballot, and grandfather of famed choreographer Agnes De Mille, Henry George gained an international following in the last decades of the nineteenth century. Although he wrote a number of well-received studies, his fame rests almost entirely on one book, Progress and Poverty, published in 1879.

Born in Philadelphia but growing to maturity in the California of the 1860s, George spent his early years as an itinerant typesetter, struggled with poverty, read widely, and became a journeyman printer, a reporter for the San Francisco Times, and later editor of the rival Chronicle. Following a brief and financially unsuccessful stint as proprietor of an independent news service in New York City, he returned to San Francisco as editor of the Oakland Transcript.

But New York, the arterial center of the nation's economy, proved to be an irresistible magnet. George had become deeply interested in the relationships between land, humans, and values while living in California, and that interest was sharpened as he observed the chaos created by these relationships in New York. Progress and Poverty was the immediate result. The book became established in history as a pioneering model of economics enlightened by social theory. Only Marx's Das Kapital was its equal in originality of thought. George argued that (a) working the land is a natural right and (b) landlords' rents violate economic law and block, or inhibit, general community prosperity. Offering many examples drawn from his experiences in California and New York, George proposed a government tax upon land equal in value to its rent price. This tax would replace all other taxes. As a "single tax" it would fund regular government operations as well as prevent land speculation, allow the free operation of economic laws and a more equal distribution of wealth, and generate surplus revenue for funding public projects and activities. This idea of a single tax became the foundation of George's writing in later years, a departure point for probing and expanding its implications for human conduct. Progress and Poverty began sparking interest, and enthusiasm in some quarters, as George's popularity as a lecturer grew. A new edition in 1880 drew very favorable comments in European and American newspapers, and Russian novelist Leo Tolstoy expressed his enthusiasm in his Resurrection a few years later.

While George is better known today for the single-tax theory, American progressives of his day were more enthusiastic about and inspired by his social theory, notably Brand Whitlock, mayor of Cleveland, Ohio, who, in common with many other progressives, greatly admired the triumvirate of George, Walt Whitman, and John Peter Altgeld. But Tom Johnson, another mayor of Cleveland (1901–1909), was exceptional in this regard. A self-described "monopolist turned humanitarian" and an important benefactor of the Johnstown Flood victims, Johnson became a close friend and disciple of George, and spent his fortune on and devoted most of his brief life to furthering George's ideas.

George was considerably more appreciated abroad than at home. In New York he had met Michael Davitt, secretary of the Irish Land League. This meeting, combined with the stimulus of a correspondence with Charles Parnell, the League's president, motivated George to write The Irish Land Question (later retitled The Land Question). Editions were published in London, Manchester, and Glasgow. The book's immediate popularity, together with the continuing high regard for Progress and Poverty, led to George's becoming an international celebrity and world traveler. During the 1880s and early 1890s he made four trips to England and Ireland and other trips to Scotland, France, Australia, and New Zealand. He left in his wake single-tax societies, land leagues, anti-poverty societies, and, in Dublin, the Ladies Land League. He was threatened with arrest several times in Ireland and actually was arrested in London. In that city George impressed the young George Bernard Shaw, who wrote in later years, "My ambition is to repay my debt to Henry George . . . [by] trying to do for [America's] young men what Henry George nearly a quarter of a century ago did for me."

George was by now a well-regarded celebrity in New York, but his fame was a mixture of popularity and notoriety. The former was tested when he ran for mayor of New York in 1886 at the urging of the city's labor organizations and Democratic Party members disgusted with their party's corruption. Of course a campaign was also a splendid opportunity to publicize his thinking: "I do want to 'raise hell!' I am decided and I will run," he wrote in a letter to a party official. Considering that most of the city's newspapers and businessmen opposed him, as did the Roman Catholic hierarchy, George did surprisingly well: he lost to the railroad magnate and Democratic Party nominee Abram Hewitt by twenty thousand votes, but he ran eight thousand votes ahead of future president Theodore Roosevelt, the Republican Party candidate.

George's notoriety was tested owing to his friendship with the Roman Catholic priest Father Edward McGlynn, the champion of working-class New Yorkers and perhaps George's most vocal and articulate supporter. McGlynn was constantly in trouble with his superiors because of his views, to the extent that he was excommunicated (though later reinstated). In his newspaper the Standard (founded in 1887 but short-lived, by his own decision), George condemned the church hierarchy—"these Bourbons," he wrote—for needlessly mixing orthodox authority with the right of free speech in a democracy. He lectured frequently on this subject throughout the Northeast. In 1887 he and McGlynn founded the New York Anti-Poverty Society "to educate the public on the land question and to promote social justice." Despite internal conflicts the society was a fairly effective vehicle for publicizing George's social theories.

George published Protection or Free Trade in 1886, The Condition of Labor in 1891, and A Perplexed Philosopher in 1892. The first was exceeded only by Progress and Poverty in number of copies sold. Intended originally as a criticism of Herbert Spencer's extreme view of Social Darwinism, A Perplexed Philosopher was a frequently eloquent defense of an economy predicated upon democratic beliefs—a radical thought in its day and equally radical today. Because he was a strong advocate of paper currency, George wrote furiously against William McKinley's high protective tariff position during the 1896 presidential campaign and reluctantly supported William Jennings Bryan's free silver plank. With some misgiving, he accepted a nomination by disaffected Democrats to run once again for mayor of New York. At the same time, he was working on what he expected to be his magnum opus, The Science of Political Economy. Before either the work or the campaign was completed, however, he died at age fifty-nine. Considerably more than 100,000 mourners filed past his casket, viewed the funeral cortege on its way to Greenwood Cemetery in Brooklyn, or heard Father McGlynn's moving remembrance. "He was," said one of George's household maids, "the most innocentest man I ever knew."

GERMAN AMERICANS. The first important ethnic socialist group in the United States, German Americans established institutions, styles, and a political-cultural perspective that remained substantially constant for most immigrant groups until 1920 and in subtle ways continuous to the 1940s–1950s. Arriving in several large waves of immigration from the 1830s to the 1890s, reaching a peak of a quarter-million in 1882 alone, Germans would differ in important respects from most other immigrant-radical groups. First of all, they came from a political culture that, despite its internal divisions, bore little resemblance to an oppressed nationality. German working-class immigrants, however personally impoverished, carried their particular socialist heritage of German culture in a proud, sometimes imperious way. They sought and succeeded to a large extent, until the 1890s, in imposing their standards upon other nationalities, as did German-speakers in the Austrian socialist movement.

Second, Germans brought skills and a tradition of industrial organization that enabled them to take a leading role in the development of craft unions and a variety of labor-related social institutions. Toward the end of the century, German immigration patterns had turned heavily from a mostly rural origin to a mostly industrial-urban one. But even in earlier days, the 1840s–1870s, the number of German immigrants with artisan backgrounds of some kind was large enough to enable them to play a role in the fledgling American labor movement that was far out of proportion to their actual size. Not only unions proper but newspapers, halls, public labor forums, and a variety of socialist-laborist institutions bore their stamp.

Third, in the matter of timing, German American socialists moved into the forefront as the older "natural rights" radicalism (highlighted by the Civil War crusade to abolish slavery) ran aground on the increasing division of social classes. German Americans established the first Communist Club, by way of relations with Marx himself, and outnumbered all others in the American wing of the First International. As the small numbers and occasional enthusiasm of native-born socialists waxed and waned erratically, Germans resigned themselves to the task of bell-wethers. Like Jews in the 1910–1940 period, but with a class-cultural autonomy in mass society that would later be inconceivable, they tended rightly or wrongly to judge all phases of American radicalism by their own standard.

This hegemony proved remarkably enduring also because German Americans proved the most stable socialist grouping in class and political terms. Working-class households tended to remain so as years and a generation or so passed. Political loyalties altered very little relative to the fast-paced American scene. As late as the 1910s, Germans (by this time mostly well into middle age) dominated the membership rolls of the Socialist Party in greater New York. As late as the 1920s–1930s, Milwaukee, the Germanic city of beer making and Turnvereins (gymnastic societies), continued with a municipal socialist experiment abandoned or never approached elsewhere.

All this success, it might be argued, came at a considerable price. German American socialists suffered, through the entire history of their collective organization, from a sense of insularity within the more chaotic, less generally class-conscious American society (and working class) at large. The problem that therefore posed itself from the 1860s onward was how German radicals might reach out to the wide potential constituency of American socialism and yet maintain a clear class orientation.

During the German American movement's first major phase, the early 1870s, their leaders (principally Friedrich Sorge) desperately feared the prospect of home-grown radical reformers overwhelming the immigrant socialists, and consequently they expelled a majority of the First International's American section. In the second phase, the socialists, responding to the railroad strike of 1877, sought to encompass the most radical class forces within their own circles by opening the socialist movement to political action, American style. They watched as their new-found comrades melted away. In the third phase, during the middle 1880s, they earnestly sought to promote local labor tickets, as in the Henry George mayoralty campaign in New York City, and to coordinate craft union activity with that of the Knights of Labor. Whether socialist or "revolutionary socialist" (anarchist), they felt the cold breath of repression and public hostility fall upon them after 1886, and they withdrew to their tents for regrouping.

The German American socialists succeeded more readily along different lines. Building up their own institutions, especially the daily and weekly press in a half-dozen cities, they created a presence in the labor movement and in the German American community that could be denounced but not easily vanquished. German culture in America, from the theater to literature to choral groups, all felt their influence. The weekly Vorbote (Herald) and daily Chicagoer Arbeiter-Zeitung (Chicago Workers News), a case in point, grew out of the depression of the 1870s and consolidation of immigrant Left resources around an increasingly solid labor movement. Modeled in format and internal structure after the homeland socialist press, enjoying wide support in their neighborhoods, they survived the extreme repression following the Haymarket tragedy, and remained (Arbeiterzeitung expired in 1919, Vorbote in 1924) until the great majority of their readers had reached ripe old age.

Such institutions made possible the development of some of the finest leaders, both lecturer-agitators and thinkers, of the entire American Left saga. These men, largely trained in Germany, also stood in place of Left theoreticians and even Left artists in later generations, as they variously interpreted socialist doctrine in the light of American conditions, and wrote plays and poetry. One of the most distinguished, Adolf Douai, had been a noted pedagogue of the "Forty-Eighters" generation, editor of an abolitionist paper in Texas, and a writer of American travelogues for the German reader. Editor of several early German American socialist papers, he remained the tireless editorialist at his post until his death in the late 1880s. August Otto-Walster, one of the pioneer playwrights and writers of fiction of early German Social Democracy, not only edited American socialist papers in New York, Cincinnati, and Saint Louis but continued his short-story production, while serializing many of his own classics. Joseph Dietzgen, widely known as an independent discoverer of historical materialist principles, in 1886 took over the Chicago Vorbote as its editors faced extreme persecution. Paul Grottkau, once a noted labor leader in Berlin, became a prominent anarchist-leaning editor in Chicago and Milwaukee. By the 1890s, with the end of the Bismarckian repression, the stream of such men was largely cut off. Yet figures such as Alexander Jonas remained with the New Yorker Volkszeitung (New York People's News) through the 1910s (to be succeeded by the younger German immigrant Ludwig Lore), growing old with American socialism's most venerable aging constituency.

In consolidating their own forces during the late 1870s to early 1890s, the German American socialists also placed themselves ideally to promote smaller and newer immigrant-radical entities. In Chicago, especially, German socialists maintained an avuncular relationship with the Czech Left community as early as the 1880s. German Jews eased the way for the new Yiddish-language institutions, including newspapers, fraternal benefit societies, and social halls. To a lesser but still important degree, German radicals helped orient incoming Slavs, Hungarians, Finns, and the emerging mass English-language socialist movement.

According to their critics, who included Friedrich Engels, they had retarded the specifically American working-class developments with their insistence upon retaining socialist political leadership for themselves. In the 1870s–1880s, a strong argument could be made for this contention (although not the same argument Engels himself would make): the growingly exclusionary approach of craft unions had made co-operation with the largely Irish American (but also significantly black and female) Knights of Labor problematic, limited to moments of high mobilization. For that matter, socialism at large, in order to gain a wide following in the United States, needed to lay claim to republican traditions, as the Socialist Party would do forcefully after 1900. Lacking the capacity or will to do so, German American socialists froze their movement within a segment of the working class.

On the other hand, German Americans rather eagerly handed over leadership of the socialist movement, that is, the Socialist Labor Party, to non-Germans during the 1890s, with results disastrous on all sides. Embracing the young intellectual Daniel De Leon and his short-lived following in the ghetto Jewish environment, the Germans in effect encouraged an extreme sectarianism posing simultaneously as Americanization and political-class clarification. At the end of the experiment, most Jews and others having already withdrawn, the German loyalists split with the Socialist Labor Party. Henceforth they would settle for a narrower gauge, in the socialist movement led by Eugene Debs. They would live out their socialist beliefs as merely one (if the most venerable) of the ethnic socialist groups that, like most others, chose the Communist alternative in the 1920s. Unlike most other immigrant groups, the German American federation withdrew from the Communist movement en bloc, maintaining its primary institutions intact. Through the Depression and war years, it continued as an independent socialist entity, ranged around the New Yorker Volkszeitung (the Neuer Volkszeitung after 1931) as well as fraternal and cultural institutions whose publications and events were conducted in the German language.

GI COFFEE HOUSE MOVEMENT. In 1968 Fred Gardner opened the UFO Coffee House in Columbia, South Carolina. Its staff of anti-Vietnam War activists had the modest goal of making friendly contact with GIs from the local Fort Jackson army base. They quickly discovered that anti-war and anti-authoritarian sentiments were almost as widespread inside the army as out—and deeper. They were amazed at the risks GIs were willing to take in order to be part of “the Movement.”

An organization called the United States Serviceman's Fund (USSF) was established to help support GI activists. By 1971 the USSF was providing small grants to thirty-four GI coffee houses near army, navy, air force, and marine bases. Some, like the Oleo Strut in Killeen, Texas (Fort Hood), and the Shelter Half in Tacoma, Washington (Fort Lewis), served hundreds of cups of coffee a night, showed movies, and provided live music on the weekends. Many of the other “coffee houses” were actually bookstores, counseling centers, or simply a house near the base with a mimeo machine.

By 1971 the USSF was also providing tiny stipends to forty-three regularly appearing GI newspapers. FTA, originally printed in June 1968 at Fort Knox, is sometimes cited as the first GI newspaper of the era. But the movement was so widespread and spontaneous—one incomplete survey counted three hundred periodicals—that it would be risky to call any one GI paper the first. Titles like Left Face, Fed Up, Fatigue Press, All Hands Abandon Ship, and POW ("Every GI Is a Prisoner of War," said its masthead) indicate their tone.

As a loose fund-raising organization, USSF set no program for the coffee house movement. In the "let the people decide" spirit of the time, the coffee house staffs supported a range of GI-initiated activities from mutinies to pray-ins.

As a part of the broader civilian movement, GIs joined farm workers to protest the army's enormous purchases of grapes and lettuce. They organized mess-hall boycotts and in some cases threw the offending produce around the base. In protest against their own exploitation, a group at Fort Hood boycotted a chain of credit jewelers that preyed on servicemen in isolated base towns. Black GIs refused riot duty after Martin Luther King, Jr.'s assassination. The "Fort Hood Forty-Three" were arrested for refusing duty that might have brought them into conflict with demonstrators at the Democratic National Convention in Chicago.

Stateside GIs invented new forms of protest ingeniously attuned to base life. One company collectively canceled their U.S. Savings Bonds, another group changed their military life-insurance beneficiary to the Black Panther Party. An air force nurse leafleted her base from a plane.

In Vietnam itself, anti-war activity was more dangerous and emotionally complex. Though there were coffee houses near U.S. bases in Germany and Japan, the coffee houses were never able to bring the support of lawyers, mimeograph machines, or entertainers directly into the war zone. (They tried.) Still, there were several well-publicized mutinies and countless negotiated refusals that took the form "You let us sit here, and we'll let you report a body count." By the end of the war many commanders complained openly that a combination of dope and disaffection made the Army on the ground just about useless.

In movies of the 1970s and 1980s, Vietnam GIs were characterized as either betrayed patriots or confused victims—drafted, drifting, and drugged. There is some truth to each of those stereotypes. But it is also true that tens of thousands of Americans in uniform took organized, brave, and dramatic actions to end the war and to assert their own worth.

GILMAN, CHARLOTTE PERKINS (1860–1935). An exceptionally popular and prolific writer on the "woman question," Charlotte Perkins Gilman influenced many thousands of women through her sociological studies, novels, stories, poems, and lectures. Gilman had little direct influence upon political movements, choosing to remain unaffiliated most of her life. Her best work seemed dated by the late 1910s. But she had already created an analytical bridge between the views of the nineteenth-century woman's movement and the "scientific" socialist conceptions of woman's advance common to the early twentieth century.

Grandniece of Harriet Beecher Stowe, Gilman spent most of her economically impoverished childhood in Providence, Rhode Island. After attending college briefly, she married a local artist, and the next year gave birth to her only child. Shortly thereafter, she fell into extreme despondence, leading to near nervous collapse. Relocating to California, she gained a divorce and returned her daughter to the care of her husband, a fact treated as scandalous by Boston and California papers. Throughout the rest of her life, she suffered from the aftereffects of these experiences.

Shifting her base to the Bay Area and desperate to earn money, she turned to story-writing of an almost science fiction-like character. (Her best-known story, "The Yellow Wallpaper," recounts her own mental breakdown.) A volume of poetry earned praise, and for a short time she joined the socialistic Helen Campbell in editing the organ of the Pacific Coast Woman's Press Association. Most important, she had been attracted to Edward Bellamy's ideas, and made herself a lecturer on them to groups of all kinds. As her reputation spread and she became known for her discussion of women's topics as well, she devoted most of her time to the national lecture circuit. Although little inclined to become active in the sectarian Socialist Labor Party, she attended the Second International Congress in 1896 in London as an American delegate, and contributed to the short-lived American Fabian.

With Woman and Economics (1898), she emerged as a pioneer sociologist of women's topics. Much influenced by Lester Frank Ward's Dynamic Sociology and providing a "scientific" socialist text paralleling August Bebel's Frau und der Sozialismus, she broke decisively with the earlier communalistic-utopian views of work and the home. Women's emancipation, rather than coming through men and women sharing the "unproductive" labor of homemaking, would come through equal engagement in productive labor, she insisted. In her wider view, the era of extreme individualism had in any case passed with the evolution of modern economics. Woman's status would now change dramatically if social evolution were properly guided. The greatest need, she believed, was to set women on the path to earn their own livelihood. Shortly after the turn of the century, she broadened this argument to advocate communal nurseries and kitchens to replace individualized homes entirely and to eclipse motherhood as a social specialization.

Remarried to her first cousin in 1900, she assumed the name Charlotte Perkins Gilman, by which she would be principally known thereafter. She lived first in New York City and later in Norwalk, Connecticut, where she and her husband were joined by Helen Campbell, who cooked and cleaned while Gilman wrote essays and prepared Human Work (1904), an exaltation out of tune with the coming times.

She also edited, largely wrote and published the Forerunner (1909–1916), one of the most unusual of independent socialist magazines, equally devoted to improving the status of women and promoting social evolution. She filled the magazine's pages, in part, with manuscripts of her own rejected by other publications or never submitted. She boasted of "no capital except a mental one," and met half the magazine's expenses through her continual lecturing and writing. Much as Walt Whitman's literary executor, Horace Traubel, conducted his personal socialistic journal, the Conservator, Gilman filled the pages of the Forerunner with her own literary and cultural commentary on the age, addressing herself directly to her few thousand readers. She also frankly addressed questions of private morality, such as prostitution, social diseases, and marriage. For the Forerunner, she serialized some seven novels, including her major fantasy contribution, Herland, a visit to an island community of women governed by the principle of the New Motherhood, in which cooperative ideals (and parthenogenesis) have replaced the male-dominated competitive social-sexual order.

Joining Jane Addams as a founding leader of the Women's Peace Party in 1915, Gilman fell into obscurity with the sharp decline of socialistic sentiment and the upswing of Freudianism in the 1920s. Placing herself as an old-fashioned scientific evolutionist who held to the decreasing significance of gender differences, she and her emphases had been effectively bypassed. Nevertheless she dedicated herself to her autobiography, The Living of Charlotte Perkins Gilman, at last published posthumously. Overwhelmed by spreading disease, she preferred "chloroform to cancer," taking her own life in 1935.

GIOVANNITTI, ARTURO (1884-1959). Poet, playwright, editor, orator-agitator on behalf of the Industrial Workers of the World (IWW), and union official, Arturo Giovannitti gained the admiration of many. His politics were sometimes more passionate than consistent and, as a result, it was not unusual for a wide spectrum of the American Left—socialists, revolutionary syndicalists (the IWW), anarchists, Greenwich Village bohemians, and trade unionists—to consider him one of their own.

Son of a modest doctor/pharmacist, Giovannitti was born in Ripabottoni, a small hill town of southern Italy in the region of Abruzzi-Molise. Upon completing school he emigrated to Canada.

Little is known about Giovannitti's Canadian years, but, some time after his arrival, he became interested in the Protestant church and studied in several theological seminaries near Montreal. By the time he left Montreal for New York City in 1904, he was fluent in both French and English.

The great metropolis of New York completely captivated Giovannitti and he called it home for the rest of his life. At first he resumed his university studies at Columbia, but he soon became so deeply involved in radical politics within the Italian community that he never completed his degree. After convincing his comrades that he was no longer religious, he joined the Federazione Socialista Italiana (Italian Socialist Federation) in 1907. He always retained, however, a certain religious temperament, which manifested itself particularly in his poetry. By 1909 he had changed from a reformist socialist into a firm proponent of revolutionary syndicalism and had been chosen a member of the editorial committee of Il Proletario, the Italian-language journal of the IWW. In 1911 Giovannitti became the paper's sole editor and it was in this capacity that he went to Lawrence, Massachusetts, in January 1912 to aid in the great textile strike that had just begun.

The effectiveness of Giovannitti and fellow IWW organizer Joe Ettor during the bitter Lawrence strike of 1912 made them marked men. During a confrontation with the state militia, a young girl among the striking demonstrators was killed. Although Ettor and Giovannitti were not present at the shooting incident and evidence indicated that a police officer's bullet had actually killed the young girl, they were arrested and charged as accessories to murder. This blatant effort to break the strike by framing its leaders on false charges, a not unusual occurrence in that period, catapulted their case into national attention and turned their names into a rallying cry for the IWW and American labor. After almost a year of imprisonment, Ettor and Giovannitti were found innocent by a jury and set free.

Upon his release from prison Giovannitti chose not to reassume his position as editor of Il Proletario, though he still continued to work closely with the IWW and with his earlier comrade-in-arms, Ettor, and with the IWW's Carlo Tresca, Elizabeth Gurley Flynn, and William Haywood. He now began to frequent the American radical and cultural circles that were then flourishing in Greenwich Village and associated with such American writers and artists as Max Eastman, John Reed, Floyd Dell, Robert Minor, Art Young, Mike Gold, and Boardman Robinson. He was one of the few Italian-born radicals of his generation who moved easily through the wider world of American culture. He started to write regularly for the Masses and even the usually conservative Atlantic Monthly published his poem "The Cage," which dealt with his imprisonment during the Lawrence strike. In 1914 Giovannitti published his first book of poems (in English), Arrows in the Gale, which had an introduction by Helen Keller.

Giovannitti, like most of the American Left, fought fervently against America's entry into World War I and undertook a tremendous schedule of anti-war agitation. He managed at the same time to write prolifically for the socialist and anarchist press, to edit two short-lived Italian-language political-cultural journals, Il Fuoco (1915, New York City) and Vita (1916, New York City), and to stage the first of many Italian-language dramas, Tenebre Rosse (Red Shadows).

Upon the entrance of the United States into World War I, the American Left was fiercely, and often illegally, attacked by the federal government for its anti-war position. The Red Scare, the great, irrational fear that shook American society as a result of the Bolshevik revolution, also unleashed a political reaction against the Left. Giovannitti, one of the prominent targets of the authorities, was able, only by chance, to escape the arrest and imprisonment that was the fate of most of the IWW leadership.

At war's end, the political activity of Giovannitti changed direction. With the IWW essentially destroyed as a major force within the ranks of labor by governmental repression, he began to move from his almost total involvement with revolutionary syndicalism into a closer association with the main labor union movement. He played an important role in establishing Local 89, the Italian Dress Makers Union, of the International Ladies Garment Workers Union (ILGWU). As a writer he became a contributing editor to Max Eastman's Liberator, a member of the Workers Drama League, and a contributor to the New Masses, all groups that in time became more or less connected with the Communist Party. With the sponsorship of the union-backed Camera del Lavoro (The Italian Chamber of Labor, New York City), he undertook his last major editorial effort, the Italian-language cultural journal Il Veltro, 1924–1925.

During 1925 Ettor and Giovannitti reunited and fought together for a radical cause one last time. They made public appearances on behalf of two other Italian-born radicals, Sacco and Vanzetti, whose murder trial would not have the fortunate outcome of their own. (After 1925, Ettor essentially disappeared from the stage of radical politics, fading into the anonymous life of a farmer and wine maker in California. He lived quietly among Italian comrades, selling them wine, and died unnoticed in 1948.)

After 1930, Giovannitti no longer wrote much for the American press, radical or cultural. His activities became centered almost exclusively around organized labor—the ILGWU, the Amalgamated Clothing Workers of America, the American Federation of Labor—and his writings now appeared mainly in union journals and obscure Italian-language publications. As part of the Alleanza Anti-Fascista di Nord America, he did play a role in the antifascist activities that were centered in New York City, but by now Giovannitti spent more time associating with figures of the labor establishment—Luigi Antonini, David Dubinsky, Sidney Hillman, August Bellanca, Norman Thomas. He was appointed the secretary of the Italian Labor Education Bureau (New York City), but a certain fire and direction had disappeared from his life. He had become more of a romantic symbol of the past than an energetic actor in the politics of the present.

Max Eastman once commented that the names of Ettor and Giovannitti were as well known to American radicals as Lenin and Trotsky. Their voices, which had been among the most intelligent and the most energetic in the fight for freedom and social justice in the beginning of this century, faded, however, into obscurity, melancholy examples of how difficult it is to sustain a lifelong radical posture in America.

GOLD, MICHAEL (1893–1967). Born Itzok Granich to impoverished Jewish immigrants on Manhattan's Lower East Side, Michael Gold derived the major themes of his long career from those roots and reflected them most prominently in his major literary work, the fictionalized autobiography Jews without Money (1930). Like the boy in that novel, Gold dropped out of school in the eighth grade, but in real life, he also had a year of journalism classes at New York University (1912–1913) and a traumatic year as a special student at Harvard (1914). His novel concludes with a political rally that leads to a leftist conversion. The origin of that account was a rally in 1914, but Gold was not as politically naive as his fictional counterpart. He had considerable exposure to radical ideas through his younger brother Manny, who was active in the Industrial Workers of the World. Even after Gold became associated with the Communist Party, anarchist and syndicalist ideas would retain some appeal, for he remained an unsystematic and eclectic thinker.

Gold's first radical publication was in the Masses (1914–1917) and in the Sunday supplement of the New York Call (1916). Three of his one-act plays were performed by the Provincetown Players in 1916, 1917, and 1920, respectively. The entire period was filled with political and personal anguish. In 1918 he went to Mexico to avoid the draft, and during the Red Scare of 1919–1920 he changed his name to Michael Gold as a protective measure. Nonetheless, in 1920 he became editor of the Liberator, successor to the Masses, which had been suppressed in 1917. Six years later he became editor of the New Masses (1926–1947), which succeeded the Liberator. His period of greatest literary influence would be from the founding of the New Masses until the mid-1930s, a time when he was identified as the leading American advocate of proletarian literature.

The high point of his most fruitful period was publication of Jews without Money. In addition to the work's considerable intrinsic merits, its appearance coincided with the deepening of a depression that made a novel about poverty pertinent to a mass audience. Friends hailed him as the American Gorky, but Gold was never to fulfill his promise as a writer of fiction. Although he published short stories and left versions of partly completed novels at his death, there would be no second novel. His energy seemed to flow more naturally to editing and journalism than to fiction. He became a columnist for the Daily Worker in 1933, a role he would retain until the end of his life. As a columnist he could write in the short spurts that came easily to him and he could make immediate comments on ongoing political and literary controversies.

His columns were always provocative. He loved a literary fight. Max Eastman, his old mentor at the Masses, Thornton Wilder, and James T. Farrell were early targets. His grounds for attack were usually more ideological than literary and he became increasingly acerbic as he took up the bitter task of denouncing "renegades" whom the Moscow Trials and Hitler-Stalin Pact had alienated from the Communist Party. His views on the inadequacies of Ernest Hemingway, Archibald MacLeish, Waldo Frank, Robinson Jeffers, Sherwood Anderson, and Granville Hicks are found in The Hollow Men (1941), a collection of his Daily Worker columns. Another bitter dispute came in 1947 when he lashed out at Albert Maltz, radical novelist and screenwriter, who advanced the view that the politics of a writer did not necessarily determine the quality of that writer's work. Gold's last decade was spent in the San Francisco Bay area, where he worked on a memoir, which he never completed. He died in quiet obscurity, one of the few literary radicals of the 1920s and 1930s who never left the Communist movement. Ironically, he is now most respected not for his theoretical polemics but for his novel. Jews without Money remains a classic account of the Jewish ghetto during the first years of the twentieth century.

GOLDMAN, EMMA (1869–1940). More than any woman in Progressive America, the anarchist Emma Goldman captured popular imagination as a symbol of working-class militancy and female revolt. Many Americans, equating anarchism with terrorism, blamed her for inspiring the assassination of President William McKinley despite the absence of evidence connecting her with that act. Others admired her courage in standing up to police harassment, her daring lectures on topics ranging from anarchism and syndicalism to free love, homosexual rights, and the modern European drama. She endured repeated arrest, imprisonment, deportation, and exile without losing her enthusiasm for the anarchist ideal, which she saw briefly realized in Spain, at the start of the Spanish Civil War. A follower of Peter Kropotkin, Goldman called herself a communist anarchist. Yet her thought retained a strong individualist strand, and she took pride in her role as a "free lance." She also brought to the movement a new stress on sexual and psychological liberation. Her sex radicalism, controversial even among anarchists, influenced many young early twentieth-century feminists who admired her challenge to Victorian values and celebrated her as a feminist heroine, despite her outspoken criticism of the suffrage movement.

Goldman was born in Lithuania in 1869 to a Russian-Jewish family of shopkeepers. Educated in East Emma Goldman caricature in Yiddish press by Saul Raskin, c. 1912.

Prussia, she also attended high school in Saint Petersburg. Here she first heard of the Russian Narodniks, whose women members became her lifelong heroines. As an immigrant factory worker in Rochester, New York, Goldman was radicalized by the trial and hanging of the Haymarket anarchists in 1886–1887. In New York City, she joined the German anarchist movement and, under the tutelage of Johann Most, rapidly became known as a witty, provocative speaker. Her complicity in her lover Alexander Berkman's attempted assassination of steel magnate Henry Clay Frick during the Homestead Steel strike of 1892 sealed her commitment to the movement. While Berkman spent fourteen years in prison, Goldman rose to national attention through her coast-to-coast lecture tours. Routinely arrested and denied access to halls, she waged imaginative free-speech fights, often in alliance with the Industrial Workers of the World. She served one year in prison on charges of "inciting to riot" during an 1893 hunger demonstration, and two weeks in 1916 for her role as an early campaigner for birth control. For opposing the draft during World War I, she served two years in the Missouri State Penitentiary.

Revolutionary anarchism in America was largely an immigrant phenomenon. Goldman hoped to Americanize anarchism by appealing to English-speaking audiences, especially to intellectuals. From 1906 to 1917, she published an influential "little" anarchist monthly magazine, Mother Earth, which attempted to link European anarchist thought with American traditions of dissent. She also expanded her lectures into two books, Anarchism and Other Essays (1911) and The Social Significance of the Modern Drama (1914), the latter of which offered a useful introduction to European playwrights such as Ibsen, Strindberg, and Hauptmann. She attracted many native-born admirers, especially among the pre-World War I bohemian intellectuals and artists, including Floyd Dell, Eugene O'Neill, the painter Robert Henri, and Margaret Anderson, editor of the avant-garde Little Review. But unlike Goldman's protégé Roger Baldwin, founder of the American Civil Liberties Union, many remained personal admirers who disclaimed her radical politics or identified anarchism with personal rebellion. The heart of the anarchist movement in America remained in the Russian, Jewish, Spanish, Italian, and other foreign-language groups with whom Goldman maintained ambivalent relations.

At the height of the Red Scare in December 1919, Goldman was deported to Soviet Russia, along with Alexander Berkman. She had ardently defended the Bolsheviks while in the United States. But she was shocked by the catastrophic conditions in Civil War Russia and by the harsh politics of "war communism." She was especially outraged at the persecution of Russian anarchists, who had initially supported the October Revolution. She rapidly lost confidence in the Bolsheviks but continued to work with them, withholding public criticism until the Kronstadt uprising of March 1921, when both Goldman and Berkman became outspoken critics. They left Russia in December 1921 to settle temporarily in Berlin. Here Goldman wrote scathing indictments of the Bolshevik regime, including an emotional book, My Disillusionment in Russia (1923), which combined trenchant criticism of early Bolshevik repressiveness with a misleading picture of social, economic, and cultural conditions.

Granted a British visa in 1924, Goldman worked in London to mobilize public protest against Soviet imprisonment of left-wing oppositionists. Her efforts were hindered by her wholesale attacks on Bolshevism, which alienated British Socialists initially sympathetic to her aims. With the failure of her anti-Soviet campaign, Goldman tried lecturing on drama and other subjects in Britain and later in Canada. Her epic autobiography, Living My Life (1931), celebrated her dramatic public career while documenting her conflicted personal affairs, including her tormented passion for Dr. Ben Reitman.

Goldman lived to see a successful anarchist revolution in part of Spain, precipitated by the fascist rebellion of July 1936. She was thrilled by the sight of anarchist collectives, Barcelona in the hands of the working class. She made three visits to Spain in the course of the civil war, returning each time to London to act as publicist and fund-raiser for the Spanish anarcho-syndicalist organizations, the Confederación Nacional del Trabajo–Federación Anarquista Ibérica (CNT-FAI). Despite strong reservations about the decision of the Spanish anarchists to enter the Popular Front government, Goldman defended the CNT-FAI within the bitterly divided international movement as well as in public, while privately urging the Spanish militants against further concessions. With the defeat of the Republic in 1939, Goldman traveled to Canada, where she continued her efforts on behalf of Spanish anarchist refugees. She insisted she would oppose any support for the Allies in the approaching war, as she had in 1917. Yet the violent anti-Semitism of the Nazis made her anti-war position personally problematical. She was torn by conflicting loyalties she could not reconcile.

The consistency of Goldman's commitment to anarchism masked a considerable confusion in her ideas and her life. She never resolved the contradictions of her thought, which swung between extremes of faith in and contempt for the masses, between belief in revolution and despair of its benefits, between voluntarism and resignation to "fate." During her years in exile, a shrill anticommunism dominated her politics, although she remained a sharp critic of capitalism. What stands out in her fifty years of militance is her extraordinary energy and tenacity in the face of persecution, isolation, and loneliness.

Goldman died of a stroke in Toronto in May 1940. Although she had been denied entry into the United States except for one brief visit in 1934, death granted her a permanent visa. She was buried in Waldheim Cemetery outside Chicago, in the country she always regarded as her home.

GOODMAN, PAUL (1911–1972). Widely acknowledged as "the philosopher of the New Left," Paul Goodman had already run through several careers before his decade of fame as the author of Growing Up Absurd (1960). Critics charge that he spread himself too thin. He was trained as a philosopher at City College in New York and the University of Chicago, where his mentors were Morris Cohen and Richard McKeon, and went on to teach mathematics and the Greeks to ninth graders at a progressive school and literature at various colleges. He was fired three times for his open homosexuality. (Goodman was bisexual—a family man, twice married and father of three.)

With his architect brother Percival Goodman he collaborated on Communitas (1947), a classic of community planning. With Fritz Perls he wrote Gestalt Therapy (1951), the theoretical cornerstone of the movement that went by that name, and he practiced psychotherapy for a decade. The Structure of Literature (1954) and Speaking and Language (1971) were equivalent tours de force in literary criticism and philosophical linguistics. He also published stories, novels, and poems. His plays were produced by the Living Theater, where he was a kind of guru-in-residence. Including his social criticism, his output was more than thirty volumes.

The foundations of his anarchism had been laid in his youth, but he always spoke of himself as "apolitical," and it was not until World War II threatened that he set himself to formulate his radicalism. He became a central figure among the New York anarchists and published chapters of his manifesto The May Pamphlet (1946) in magazines like Why? Retort, and Politics. During this period his circle overlapped with the War Resisters League and the Committee for Nonviolent Revolution, where many leaders of the anti-war movement served their apprenticeships.

Goodman joined the editorial board of Liberation shortly after its founding in 1956 and was active there until the late 1960s, when he and the New Left parted company over the Leninist tactics and anti-intellectualism that, as he saw it, were betraying the spirit of the Berkeley free speech movement and the Port Huron Statement. Soon after, he suffered his first heart attack, and although he continued to speak out on radical issues, especially in New Reformation (1969), he now turned to work that was more congenial. His last books were poetry and apologias. He described himself as "a man of letters in the old sense," explaining that he had only one subject in all his multifarious works, "the human beings I know in their man-made scene."

GRAY, EULA (1912–?). The descendant of poor black tenant farmers, Eula Gray was born in Tallapoosa County, Alabama. At the age of nineteen Gray became a leader of the Communist-led Share Croppers Union (SCU) and subsequently joined the Communist Party. The daughter of SCU leader Tommy Gray, she held the union together in rural Alabama after her uncle, Ralph Gray, a Communist and union cofounder, was killed in an armed confrontation with local police in 1931. Besides serving as ad hoc secretary of the SCU until the spring of 1932, she organized and led the Young Communist League in the "black belt." Once she took up residence in New York (c. 1935), her public esteem diminished, though she continued to raise money for the Alabama SCU.

GREEK AMERICANS. Approximately half a million Greeks emigrated to the United States between 1900 and 1940. Although the post-World War II generation would emerge as one of the most affluent and best-educated ethnic groups, the initial immigrants were mainly unskilled male workers who were regarded as only quasi-European and were harshly discriminated against in local statutes and hiring. The first political clubs, while mainly concerned with republican versus royalist struggles in Greece, also served as centers for domestic politics. Through the 1930s, worker-led struggles against the Ku Klux Klan and state militias for political rights were as ardent as the battles waged on economic issues.

The first American radical organizations to reach Greeks were the Socialist Labor Party and the Industrial Workers of the World (IWW). The Socialist Labor Party developed a Greek-language section and a newspaper with some influence in New England. Two IWW pamphlets appeared in Greek, and there was IWW impact on miners in the West, loggers in the Northwest, and food handlers in the East. Militant Greek workers played major roles in the Bingham Canyon, Utah, copper strike of 1912, the Lowell, Massachusetts, textile strike of 1912, and the Ludlow, Colorado, coal strike of 1913. The most vibrant radical presence, however, formed around a New York group that published Phone tou Ergatou (Voice of the Worker), 1918–1923; Embros (Forward), 1923–1938; Eleftheria (Freedom), 1938–1941; and Helleno-Amerikaniko Vima (Greek-American Tribune), 1941–1959. These papers, sometimes daily, usually weekly, reflected the views of the Communist Party with name changes indicating policy shifts. Top weekly circulation of approximately ten thousand occurred in the 1940s when liberal and conservative dailies printed approximately fifteen thousand copies each. During the period when the Communist Party had ethnic units, there were some five hundred members in the Greek section. Organizational life revolved around publishing ventures and organizing worker clubs. These clubs, most of which were east of the Mississippi and north of the Mason-Dixon line, became the backbone of the thirty Greek lodges of the International Workers Order.

Greek Communists led Local 70 of the Fur Workers Union, which became a fulcrum for Greek radicalism in the East. Greek-speaking radicals, primarily Communists, were also active in organizing locals of the Congress of Industrial Organizations in the steel, rubber, mine, textile, food, maritime, and electrical industries. The Trotskyist-oriented Communist League of America had a number of Greeks who led a successful general strike of New York hotel workers in 1934. Some Greeks were founding members of the Socialist Workers Party and the Workers Party, but they had little impact on the Greek community. Other radical activity included a continuing attraction of intellectuals to various forms of anarchism, Greeks for Norman Thomas, Greek candidates for the American Labor Party and the Progressive Party, and a cooperative system of profit-sharing among Greek sponge divers in Tarpon Springs, Florida.

The Greek Left reached its peak of influence in the early 1940s when a liberal/radical coalition led community support of EAM-ELAS (the National Liberation Front of Greece) and the war effort at home. This respectability was shattered at war's end by the impact of the civil war in Greece and McCarthyism in America. A number of Greeks, nearly all involved with the labor movement, were deported and Greek dissent was chilled. No further Left initiatives among Greeks took hold until liberals and radicals created the anti-junta movement of 1967–1974. Among the lasting consequences were Left organizations in the Astoria community in Queens, New York, and a strong radical presence in both the English-language and Greek-language ethnic press.

GREEN, GIL (1906–1997). An early member of the Communist Party and a lifelong activist, Gil Green was one of the architects and executors of the policy evolved at the Seventh World Congress (1935) of the Communist International that reversed the "narrow 'class against class' political line into one that sought unity of Communists, Socialists, and all democratic forces into an all-inclusive people's struggle against fascism and war." He wrote in his book Cold War Fugitive that this reversal of policy derived in large measure from experiences of the Communist youth movement in the United States (especially with groups such as the American Youth Congress) and the Popular Front movement in France.

Green was born in Chicago in 1906 to working-class Jewish parents. After his father died when Gil was nine, his mother supported herself and three children by doing housework and receiving home relief (welfare).

In 1924 Green joined the Young Communist League and rapidly rose to become its national leader in 1931. The Comintern elected him as one of three youth leaders to the executive committee in 1935. Shortly thereafter, at the Sixth World Congress of the Young Communist International (YCI), he was elected to the executive and secretariat of that body. In 1936 he was part of the U.S. delegation to the World Youth Congress in Geneva. In 1937 Green was one of three YCI delegates to a meeting of representatives from the YCI and the Socialist Youth International that drew up a unity pact to aid the Spanish Republic. In 1938 he was a U.S. delegate to the World Youth Congress, held at Vassar College.

After he graduated from the youth movement, Green became a member of the National Board of the Communist Party, USA, and served as district organizer in New York and in Illinois. He was indicted by the federal government in July 1948 under the Smith Act for being both a leader and a member. The trial started on 17 January 1949 in New York and he was found guilty on 14 October. Selected by the Communist Party to remain outside of prison and work as a leader in the underground movement, Green became a fugitive until he surrendered voluntarily on 27 February 1956. Afterwards he remained active as a writer and national leader until his departure from the Communist Party in 1989. Although in failing health, he became an important senior figure of the Committees of Correspondence until his death in 1997.

A prolific writer, he wrote many pamphlets and seven books: The Enemy Forgotten (1956), Revolution Cuban Style (1970), The New Radicalism (1971), Portugal's Revolution (1976), What's Happening to Labor (1976), Cuba at 25: The Continuing Revolution (1984), and Cold War Fugitive (1984).

GREENBACK LABOR PARTY. Formally known as the National Independent Party, the "Greenback Labor Party" was organized in Cleveland, Ohio, in 1875 by a coalition of midwestern grangers and eastern labor reformers who allied upon their common belief that the social inequalities and economic crises of industrial society were the result of the control of the nation's currency by private financial interests. Squeezed by their deepening debts for land and machinery, the rising costs of transportation and storage of grain, and falling wholesale commodity prices, farmers embraced the economic panaceas of Edward Kellogg, an antebellum labor reformer whose demands for a federally engineered inflation of the currency (by replacing gold-based dollars with paper dollars, or "greenbacks") seemed to meet their most immediate problems. Kelloggism had long inspired workers with its promise to reform rather than abolish industrial capitalism by forcing the federal government to support artisanal entrepreneurship and producer cooperatives by nationalizing the instruments of currency and credit.

Initially, the party was primarily agrarian in membership, but it soon swallowed up much of the independent labor party movement after the great railroad strikes of 1877. Supported by the Knights of Labor and local Workingmen's parties, the greenbackers added labor planks to their platforms in a number of states and reaped the reward of sending over a dozen members to Congress and polling more than a million votes in 1878.

Though harshly critical of the greenbackers' obscuring of the issues of class by their myopic focus on financial questions, the newly organized Socialist Labor Party aligned itself with the National Independent Party and its presidential candidate, General James B. Weaver, in 1880. In the wake of an election fiasco that saw Weaver poll but 400,000 votes and the loss of a number of key greenback congressional seats, the Socialist Labor Party fractured as the anarchist and syndicalist factions left the party.

Ultimately, the greenback idea proved too weak a glue to overcome the sectional, cultural, and class differences within the alliance of merchants and farmers in the West and urban workers in the East. In the 1884 presidential election the greenbackers supported Benjamin Butler, a political chameleon, in the desperate hope that his fame as the longtime standard bearer of labor reform in Massachusetts would bring eastern labor back into the fold. Butler, however, garnered but a third of Weaver's 1880 total. Though Butler proved to be the last greenback candidate for president, the greenbackers' rhetoric and leadership soon rose again beneath the banner of populism.

GREENSBORO MASSACRE. An anti-Klan rally organized by the Communist Workers Party (CWP) in a black housing project in Greensboro, North Carolina, on 3 November 1979 was attacked by an armed nine-car caravan of Ku Klux Klan and Nazi Party members and supporters. The Klan-Nazi caravan was led to the rally site by a Klansman acting as a paid informant of the Greensboro police. After eighty-eight seconds of gunfire, five CWP members and supporters were dead or dying, seven others wounded.

The five murdered CWP members were: Dr. James Waller (president, Amalgamated Clothing and Textile Workers Union Local 1113-T), William Sampson, Sandra Smith, Cesar Cauce, and Dr. Michael Nathan. All were veterans of the radical student anti-war and black liberation movements of the late 1960s who became involved in the labor movement in the 1970s. In North Carolina, activists from both white and black Left groups in Durham and Greensboro began organizing in textile mills and hospitals beginning in 1974. By 1977, these forces had been consolidated into the Workers Viewpoint Organization (WVO), a national communist grouping that became the Communist Workers Party in October 1979. The WVO initiated the Trade Union Educational League, which, in addition to gaining leadership in several local unions in North Carolina, organized support for six labor strikes across the state in 1978 and four in 1979.

The CWP's anti-Klan rally was organized in the context of an upsurge of Klan and racist violence that swept across the Piedmont South during 1978–1979. Blacks organized armed self-defense patrols against the Klan in Tupelo, Mississippi; Decatur, Alabama; and China Grove, North Carolina. In China Grove, the CWP (WVO) assisted black residents in a militant confrontation at a Klan rally at the town's community center on 8 July 1979. Retaliation for the humiliation at China Grove may have been one motive in the Klan attack on the Greensboro rally.

In organizing the Greensboro rally and conference that was to have followed, the CWP sought to consolidate anti-Klan activists in the South who upheld the right of armed self-defense, as opposed to the anti-Klan network of the Southern Christian Leadership Conference, which promoted unarmed pacifist opposition and reliance on the police. The CWP (WVO) anti-Klan campaign was led by Nelson Johnson, a longtime black community organizer from Greensboro, and Paul Bermanzohn, a Jewish doctor from Durham who suffered permanent injury from wounds received in the 3 November attack. Of the five CWP members who died, four were rank-and-file union leaders and organizers. After this, CWP activity in the unions in North Carolina declined.

On 11 November, more than a thousand people participated in the funeral march organized by the CWP and held under conditions of a state of emergency and a heavy National Guard presence. Three months later, on 2 February 1980, the twentieth anniversary of the Greensboro lunch counter sit-in, more than ten thousand marched in an anti-Klan rally organized by a broad coalition, including the Southern Christian Leadership Conference and the CWP.

After two all-white juries acquitted Klan-Nazi defendants of criminal charges in the Greensboro murders, a third jury held two Greensboro police officers, the Klan police informant, and four Klan-Nazi gunmen liable for wrongful death in a civil suit that ended on 8 June 1985. As a result, the city of Greensboro paid $351,000 to Dr. Martha Nathan, widow of Dr. Michael Nathan, in the final settlement of the case.

GREENWICH VILLAGE. The intellectuals who gathered in Greenwich Village in the 1910s celebrated creative individuality over social adjustment, urban diversity and turmoil over middle-class assimilation and tidiness, radical dissent over bureaucratic regulation, improvisation over expertise, artistic vision over political pragmatism. Their traditions have since inspired the American Left, old and new: movements for women's and sexual emancipation; the artistic avant-garde, to the extent that one has existed in America; and many of the ensuing efforts to redefine American culture as pluralistic, diverse, and cosmopolitan. These struggles have included movements for civil rights, civil liberties, and increased democratic participation by all members of our society—regardless of race, class, gender, or sexuality.

These rebels are often referred to as “the Greenwich Village Left”—although there were other and earlier centers of rebellion, notably Chicago in the first decade of the century. Still, by 1912 or so, most of the cultural radicals of this generation had made their way to New York, and many stayed on for the next five or more years, before disbanding for Paris, Moscow, Taos, Croton-on-Hudson, Provincetown, or the more disciplined socialist community on New York’s Lower East Side. The names of some of the leading participants suggest the variety of careers and backgrounds that came together in this “rebellion”: Max Eastman, Crystal Eastman, John Reed, Emma Goldman, Floyd Dell, Mabel Dodge, Alfred Stieglitz, Margaret Sanger, John Sloan, Hutchins Hapgood, Dorothy Day, Randolph Bourne.

What drew this community of artists, journalists, activists, poets, organizers, and malcontents together and to the Village in the years after 1910? Most came from elsewhere—the majority of the rebels grew up in provincial American towns, children of respectable but often marginal or even downwardly mobile parents. Some historians have suggested that a characteristic shared experience of the rebels, male as well as female, was that they grew up in mother-dominated homes, with absent or failed fathers. Even if such circumstances were not as unusual in late-Victorian America as some historians would make them seem, there is merit to the speculation that such an upbringing produced in the children, especially the sons, a sense of alienation from the more traditional male modes of success in late-nineteenth-century America, as well as an unusual willingness in both genders to accept the possible equality of women.

Although many of the male rebels were products of Ivy League educations (Eastman, Reed, Bourne, Van Wyck Brooks) and several had continued on to advanced graduate work, most shunned the newly emerging routes to professional success—whether through university appointments, government service, the professions, or even conventional journalism. Instead, they sought to combine politics and art, advocacy and poetry, life and work—to reject predictable careers and to improvise. That explains, in large part, the appeal of the Village, where rents were still cheap, studio space and a sense of community still possible, and where the ethnic diversity and marginality of the neighborhood might shelter the “bohemian rebels” from the prying eyes of disapproving bourgeois neighbors. (The Italian immigrants in the Village disapproved, too, but their opinions clearly carried less sanctioning weight.) The women rebels were more likely to be professionals—lawyers, social workers—than were the men, but for a woman to enter these professions in 1910 was hardly to surrender to conventionality. In their private lives, these women defied more conventions than did their male comrades, as they challenged the double standard of Victorian sexual morality; advocated birth control, woman suffrage, and an end to traditional marriage and the conventional sexual division of labor; and probably to a greater degree than the men, experimented with homosexual and homoerotic relations as well as heterosexual liaisons. These experiments were not without their complications and emotional costs; conventional mores may be flouted while still maintaining a powerful hold on people’s imaginations, fears, and aspirations.

Perhaps the most characteristic unifying belief of the rebels, an idea that united people as different as Max Eastman and Emma Goldman and movement organs as various as the Masses and the Seven Arts, was their linking of artistic experiments—modernism—and an eclectic array of radical political positions—generally some variation on anarcho-socialism—in a sweeping belief in the primary necessity of a revolution in consciousness. In so doing, many rejected the means if not always the goal of the Marxist socialists’ more disciplined advocacy of organization toward a class revolution fueled by the inescapable contradictions of capitalism. Simultaneously and more consistently, the Greenwich Village intellectuals criticized the Progressives’ liberal faith in adjustment, expertise, and reform from within the existing political and economic arrangements. Crucial to this faith in the transformation of consciousness was the rebels’ sense that the individual consciousness would be the source of revolutionary (usually nonviolent) action. Modern art, liberated sexual energies, cultural criticism, and intellectual dissent would inspire the rejection of materialism, conventional morality, traditional gender relations, and the political status quo. This transformed consciousness would ignite a revolution that would somehow liberate both the individual genius and the oppressed classes of the world. Writers, artists, poets, intellectuals, and critics, of course, would play a defining role in any such reconstruction of consciousness, since they were already exploring the revolutionary implications of modernist literature and syndicalism, surrealism and feminism, Freud (in an often distortedly optimistic and therapeutic sense), and the connections between free love and the demise of private property. These radical aspirations clearly appealed as much to the various personal discontents of these writers, artists, and intellectuals as they did to the larger problem of a transformed social order. To the rebels, this would not have indicted their intentions but justified them, since personal disaffection and unhappiness were—as social scientists had taught them—a direct product of social alienation, political oppression, and economic dislocation. The famous Paterson Pageant of 1913, a rally for striking silk-workers of the Industrial Workers of the World orchestrated by John Reed and other Masses writers, was just one example of the Villagers' effort to join their political and artistic ideals, their personal desires and social commitments.

In the ensuing decades of this century and for several different generations of the American Left, Greenwich Village has had a continuing and storied importance. But for the celebrated generation of radicals who gave the Greenwich Village "rebellion" its name, the First World War brought an end to this phase of the history of the Left in the Village. With the federal government's wartime suppression of dissent, including the Post Office's battle against the Masses in 1917–1918, with the imprisonment of pacifists and the deportations of alien radicals like Emma Goldman, many of the Village rebels lost heart. Often they found their already fragmented and improvised political positions increasingly under attack or untenable, and turned to private lives and solutions, to art for its own sake, to postwar Paris or revolutionary Moscow, but in most cases away from the faith in the spontaneous liberation of human consciousness that had once united and inspired them.

GREIE-CRAMER, JOHANNA (1864–?). Born of middle-class parents in Dresden, Germany, Johanna Greie emigrated with her husband to the United States, where she became a leading socialist writer and lecturer on the "woman question." She played an instrumental role in supporting German American socialist women in their establishment of separate organizations within the Socialist Labor Party of the 1880s. Although Greie shared the commonplace opinion that women's emancipation depended upon the overthrow of capitalism, she readily challenged many of her contemporaries by pointing to men as being women's enemy.

In 1888 Greie spearheaded the formation of the Frauen und Mädchenbund, the first federation of socialist women's clubs centered in the Northeast and industrial Midwest. For one year she traveled to address these clubs only to witness their demise by the next. Following the Second International's adoption in 1896 of Clara Zetkin's resolution favoring women's organization, German American women organized the Social Democratic Women's Federation and once again provided Greie-Cramer (by this time widowed and remarried) with a platform. She edited a women's column in the New Yorker Volkszeitung and resumed her lecture tours. Johanna Greie-Cramer played an instrumental role in building a base for women's organization among the German American and Yiddish-speaking socialists who would form the Socialist Party after the turn of the century.

GROPPER, WILLIAM (1897–1977). One of the most important illustrators for the American radical press, William Gropper sharpened his pen against potbellied politicians and bloodthirsty fascist leaders, while honoring the heroism of the worker and the rituals of Jewish life. He also drew humorous caricatures of literary figures and flappers in the twenties for literary magazines such as the Bookman, Broom, and Dial. Throughout his lifetime, Gropper experimented with a variety of techniques including pen and ink, lithography, etching, and painting. Despite his numerous works on canvas, however, Gropper was most gifted as a political illustrator. Critics have often compared his drawings with works by Francisco Goya and Honoré Daumier.

Born and raised in a working-class family on the Lower East Side of New York City, Gropper developed an allegiance to the radical Left in 1912, when at age fifteen he began to study art with Robert Henri at the Ferrer School. He did not, however, start drawing leftist illustrations until 1918, when while working as a feature artist for the New York Tribune he did a story on the Industrial Workers of the World and discovered that his political sympathies lay with the Wobblies. He began producing the illustrations for the union's newspaper, Rebel Worker, which eventually cost him his job at the Tribune. During the 1920s Gropper contributed political drawings to the Liberator, Revolutionary Age, and the Freiheit, and in the 1930s he became one of the principal illustrators for the New Masses.

The Depression decade marked Gropper's greatest involvement in radical politics. Although he never officially joined the American Communist Party, he was in 1927 an American delegate to the tenth anniversary celebration of the October Revolution, and in 1930 he attended the Kharkov Conference. During the late 1930s and Second World War Gropper devoted his art to the antifascist cause. One of his antifascist cartoons published in 1935 by Vanity Fair provoked a minor international controversy. The illustration depicted a series of "five unlikely events" and included a picture of Emperor Hirohito pulling a rickshaw loaded with a scroll labeled "Nobel Peace Prize." The Japanese government, offended by the image of the emperor performing the task of a coolie, protested to the United States. Secretary of State Hull offered an "informal" apology.

Due to his involvement with leftist politics during the 1920s and 1930s, Gropper was called before the House Un-American Activities Committee in 1953, accused of drawing maps for the Communist Party. The document in question was a map of the United States with an American folklore hero drawn over each state. Between 1953 and 1956 Gropper did fifty lithographs entitled the Caprichos based on the McCarthy inquisition.

Gropper never gave up his commitment to the Left. After the Second World War he traveled to Poland in 1948 to attend the Congress of Intellectuals for Peace at Kraków as well as the unveiling of the Warsaw Ghetto monument. Afterward he decided to pay tribute to the Jews who died in the Holocaust by painting one picture on the theme of Jewish life every year. Overall, Gropper's drawings and paintings became less topical after the war, dealing instead with general themes of suffering and exploitation.

GROYSSER KUNDES. The "big wise guy," or "big stick," in Yiddish, the Groysser Kundes (1909–1927) was the leading satirical weekly in that language, and thereby one of the most widely read leftish satirical publications in the United States. Founded and published by a melancholy poet, Jakob Marinov, the Groysser Kundes (first called the Groysser Kibitzer, "big kibitzer") was at once the weekly sitcom and the conscience of the Lower East Side. It pilfered jokes or reprinted cartoons from the British Punch and Simplicissimus, usually on such standard themes as jilted romances. But it also dwelt in loving detail on the contemporary personalities and problems of the ghetto. Its artists caricatured every literary or theatrical notable, often with scathing satire but also as a form of Jewish celebrity-recognition. Its writers similarly analyzed cultural developments through witty poems and feuilletons. In effect, they upheld a standard of moral or aesthetic purity and commitment to Jewish culture against which they judged their own, often quite harshly.

The Kundes, therefore, for a long period found its most serious and continued butt of satire in the Jewish Daily Forward and above all the Forward's editor, Abe Cahan. According to the Kundes artists in particular, the Forward had been founded on socialist principles but conducted itself as a mere capitalist enterprise, with the production of literary shund (trash) a primary means of gaining readers and advertisers. The Kundes considered the Forward to be an organ, in essence, of assimilationism. In later years, the Kundes turned its barbs against the opponents, inside and outside the ghetto, of the proposed Jewish state in Palestine.

But the Kundes may be best remembered for its two great public campaigns: for Jewish labor, and against war. Its sentimental cartoons about Jewish martyrdom refocused attention upon socialism and the Jewish labor movement as the modern guides out of Pharaoh's Egypt. Its caricatures on World War I borrowed from the Yiddish literary tradition, which had since the 1870s detached Jewish interests from armies and fighting. For writers and cartoonists of the Kundes, militarism became the enemy and iconoclastic humor a chief Jewish strategy for survival. In its special "War Edition," August 1914, the Kundes cover shows "Brutality" (male) and "Civilization" (female) superimposed upon a map of Europe. As "Civilization" is overrun by shovelfuls of soldiers, "Brutality" gloats: "Ah, now I'll get even with my enemy: I'll bury her alive!"

Jewish radicals sympathetic to the Russian Revolution, themselves (like most younger Yiddish intellectuals of note) former contributors to the Kundes, tried several times to launch pro-Communist versions of the Kundes. All failed, although the editor of Der Humorist (1922), Sam Liptzin, became humor columnist for the Communist Morgen Freiheit for a half century. With the disappearance of Kundes, a popular humor tradition on the Left came to an end.

GUTHRIE, WOODY (1912–1967). Woodrow Wilson Guthrie, known as Woody, was the best known of the folk singers associated with the American Left during the 1940s. He subsequently emerged as a popular-culture hero whose reputation spread far beyond left-wing circles, serving as a model for politically oriented "singer-songwriters" such as Bob Dylan and Phil Ochs.

Born into an Oklahoma family rich in musical talent but dogged by tragedy (his father squandered all his money in losing political campaigns, while his mother's illness put her in an asylum), Woody spent his youth on the fringes of society, consorting with hoboes and itinerant laborers who added to his already growing repertoire of songs and stories. He began playing "hillbilly" music in local bands as a teenager, then drifted to California with other "dust-bowl refugees," where he became a popular country performer at a progressive radio station (KFVD) in the late 1930s.

His sympathy for the displaced farmer led him to write protest songs such as "Talking Dust Bowl" and "Do Re Mi" (which were apparently very well received by his Okie audience), and he soon became involved with union functions, strikes, and Communist Party rallies. Woody's charm and "authenticity" endeared him to left-wing intellectuals; he began writing a regular column, "Woody Sez," for the newspaper People's World, and entertaining at Hollywood political fund-raisers. After a while, political performances were his primary source of income.

In 1940 Guthrie went to New York City, where he became a dominant member of the developing folk movement; he recorded his Dust Bowl Ballads for RCA Victor, performed at union functions with Pete Seeger and the newly formed Almanac Singers, wrote for the Daily Worker, and at times even appeared on network radio, something that filled him with apprehension and conflict. As the war effort grew, Woody (who was never quite a pacifist) gave himself wholeheartedly to it, inscribing "This Machine Kills Fascists" on his guitar; he eventually entered the merchant marine, and finally, the army (this last with great reluctance though, and only when he was drafted and had no choice). He also authored a popular autobiography, Bound for Glory, during the war years, but the postwar witch-hunts, combined with chronic, degenerative illness, made his later career progressively more difficult.

Although Guthrie periodically flirted with conventional success, it seemed to make him sufficiently uncomfortable that he preferred to avoid it. He was handicapped throughout his career by an unwillingness to compromise, a single-mindedness that also (fortunately) helped preserve the purity of his music. He alienated socialists by refusing to denounce the Hitler-Stalin Pact, radio sponsors by refusing to soften his protest lyrics, and his wives and friends by refusing to stay put (although many of his later personal difficulties can be attributed to the onset of Huntington's chorea, a condition that finally caused his death). Generally weak on strategy, Guthrie had a credo that simply said, "Let's give up our selfishness and differences, and work together"—he left the details to others. Ideologically, he was as much a populist as a communist; in fact, he perceived the communist ideal to be identical with the Christian, often referring to Jesus as a "socialist outlaw."

Like the hoboes he traveled with, Guthrie was quite willing to blend fact with fancy, and he willfully encouraged sycophants who portrayed him as the archetypal American worker-hero; it was good business to do so. Yet within such hyperbole lay more than a kernel of truth: both his art and his politics were deeply rooted in American tradition.

Woody's songs were generally based either on standard Anglo-American ballads or blues structures; he often parodied the popular hillbilly song hits of the time, yet he managed inadvertently to write a couple of those himself: "Philadelphia Lawyer" and "Oklahoma Hills." Although he produced his share of transitory agitprop material, his best lyrics captured the spirit of America in a style so highly poetic and yet so extremely direct that one of them, "This Land Is Your Land," has often been proposed as a replacement for "The Star-Spangled Banner." He had that talent (possessed by great revolutionary poets) for fusing abstract political concerns with the minutiae of daily experience, plus a particularly marvelous sense of humor. Yet even when most of his songs are forgotten, he will be remembered for having created an activist role for folk singers in U.S. politics.

GUTMAN, HERBERT. See American Studies.

HAITIANS. Essentially an émigré Left more connected to political events in the old country than the new, Haitians played a significant role in New York Left politics during the 1980s–1990s. Home to the first successful slave revolution in modern history, Haiti was also a target of neocolonialism and the longest stretch of U.S. occupation (1915–1934) in the Americas. The brutal regime of the Duvaliers (1957–1990) and the extraordinary division of wealth drove post-quota emigration and the rise of an exile opposition. Liberal politicians who had opposed the first of the Duvaliers settled in New York, planning a first invasion effort from Manhattan. The failure of this bourgeois, mulatto-led effort in 1958 led gradually to a more black and social-revolutionary turn. Radio shows and newspapers in patois took a Left flavor after 1970, when the new organization Résistance Haïtienne was formed. A major demonstration against Duvalier at the United Nations in January 1971 dramatized the changing temperament, and by the end of the decade some twenty groups had taken shape, including the United Party of Haitian Communists, the Party of Haitian Workers, and the Organization of Patriotic Haitian Women.

A third of a million Haitians lived in Greater New York alone by the early 1980s, prompting new waves of commercial publications, radio shows, and cultural organizations with varying degrees of Left flavor. Of these, the student movements and theatrical and musical reviews were usually the most avowedly radical, but Sel (the organ of Catholic priests exiled in 1969) demonstrated the wide scope of the Left.

The electoral victory of Father Jean-Bertrand Aristide and the popular movement supporting him marked a new phase for the exile groups, reshaped by the 1991 coup (strongly supported by the Bush administration and the Central Intelligence Agency) against his government. The restoration of his presidency in 1994 was yet another landmark, underlining at once the strength of the gross-roots Catholic organizations in Haiti and the problematic character of any emigrants' mass return to a desperately poor society, whatever its government.

Ironically, homeland victory as much as defeat created the basis for Haitian participation within the American Left from the early 1980s forward. Haitians legal and illegal in the hundreds of thousands worked mainly in hotels, restaurants, hospitals, and retail services. Often politicized to a high degree, they managed despite language barriers to participate in Left-led or Left-connected unions like the Fur and Leather Workers and the National Union of Hospital and Health Care Employees, or UNITE.

HALL, GUS (b. 1910). Born Arvo Halberg, Gus Hall has been the official leader of the Communist Party, USA, since 1959. He personally symbolizes both the victory of Leninist orthodoxy over a more flexible and open style of Communist politics advocated during the later 1950s, and the relative insularity of American Communists from the New Left, feminism, gay liberation, and Left ecology movements of the 1960s–1980s.

Raised in a Finnish American home in the iron-mining region of Minnesota, Hall grew up in a Communist family, surrounded by one of the most intensive Left subcultures in the United States. By age seventeen he had joined the Young Communist League and soon toured the often-radical mining towns of Michigan, Wisconsin, and Minnesota for the Young Communists. As a leader in the Young Communist League, he became deeply involved in the Minneapolis of the early 1930s, participating in hunger marches, farm protests, and the famous 1934 Teamster strike led by Trotskyists. On strike-related charges, he served a six-month prison sentence.

Reassigned to the Ohio-Pennsylvania district, Hall took a leading role in the organization of the Youngstown Sheet and Tube plant where he had gone to work. He reached his apex of labor influence as a leader of the Warren-Youngstown area 1937 "Little Steel" strike and as a staff member of the United Steel Workers of America. Soon after, he resigned to become Communist leader of Youngstown, from which he rose to section organizer and finally leader of the Cleveland branch.

Elected to the Party's National Committee in 1944 while serving in the Pacific, Hall reentered civilian and Party life two years later at a most critical point. The ouster of Party general secretary Earl Browder and the resulting political confusion and disintegration over the next few years discredited or demoralized a number of familiar leaders and threw into question the validity of seemingly time-tested approaches. Under these conditions, Hall rapidly gained the reputation of a supreme Party loyalist and a deputy to Browder's successor, Eugene Dennis. Elected to the National Executive Board in 1946, he faced indictment under the Smith Act in 1948. Convicted in 1949 and sentenced to a five-year term, he became acting national secretary in 1950 (replacing the jailed Dennis) while appealing his sentence.

In this period of Hall's leadership, the Party—faced with multiple legal threats—adopted the view widely known as "five minutes to midnight"; that is, the time had arrived to prepare an underground movement. Many leaders became "unavailable." Hall himself, choosing the underground rather than prison, was arrested in Mexico City during a failed effort to reach Moscow, and sentenced to an additional three years in prison.

On his release in 1959, Hall found a Party still further diminished by the upheavals after the Hungarian Revolution and Khrushchev's denunciation of misdeeds by Stalin. Hall himself was indicted once more, in the early 1960s, under the McCarran Act, but escaped prison with the Supreme Court's ruling against most of that act. Winning the office of general secretary, then held by Eugene Dennis, Hall rapidly placed his stamp upon the movement. Like those within the main branch of socialism, he and his fellow Communist leaders chose to remain committed fundamentally to reorienting the liberal wing of the Democratic Party. Hall's own repeated candidacies since 1972 constituted a largely symbolic side-gesture.

Hall was hostile first to Eurocommunism as it developed in the 1980s and then to the reforms initiated in the Soviet Union by Mikhail Gorbachev. He vigorously resisted efforts within the American Communist Party for greater democracy and his possible replacement with a younger leader. This conflict came to a head in 1989. Hall outmaneuvered his opponents, leading to more than a thousand members leaving the Party. This number included many longtime officers and prominent personalities who promptly established the Committees of Correspondence. Still supportive of the old Communist Party leadership in the new Russia, Hall headed an increasingly graying Party. Hall himself was in declining physical health, but his speeches and writings remained, in the People's Weekly World, Political Affairs, and in pamphlet and book form, the authoritative Communist political statement of the moment.

HAMMETT, DASHIELL (1894–1961). Detective fiction owes its existence to the urban, industrialized society of the late nineteenth century. Earlier, Edgar Allan Poe had used several stories to show the wear and tear modernization exacted upon American culture, and such neo-Gothic radicals as George Lippard framed their novels around the investigation of crime. The last decades of the century saw the appearance of Cap Collier and other urban heroes wrestling with corruption and communism. Despite the formidable (and politically ambiguous) place of Sherlock Holmes in Anglo-American detective fiction, the predominant mode remained a conservative defense of existing standards.

Public disillusionment following the First World War changed the detective story forever. A group of writers around the new pulp publication Black Mask (1921–1954) "put murder back where it belonged," out of the suites of the cerebral master sleuth and into the streets with the cynical, hard-working private eye. In this version, the evil of society itself confronts the detective, whose story becomes the vehicle for a penetrating social commentary.

The most important writer for Black Mask was Dashiell Hammett, the Left's greatest detective novelist of any generation and also the Left novelist whose works also most frequently, through adaptation, reached the motion picture screen. The son of a clerk in Saint Marys County, Maryland, Hammett grew up both wild and intensely self-educated. He joined the Pinkerton Detective Agency, famous for its strike-breaking, in 1915. According to some accounts, he witnessed and even took part in the lynching of Wobbly militant Frank Little in Butte, Montana, in 1917. Embittered by his experience, Hammett joined the army, married a nurse, and decided to become a writer after seeing the new detective "pulp" magazine Black Mask. Novels and stories followed swiftly in the second half of the 1920s, including Red Harvest, The Dain Curse, The Maltese Falcon, and The Glass Key. Enormously popular, he was drawn to Hollywood, where he worked on various scripts and drank heavily. He also left his wife, moving in with Lillian Hellman and moving leftward with her into political activity. According to mutual friends of the two, Hammett also began rewriting Hellman's work as his own literary inspiration dried up.

Despite the aesthetic and box office success of Watch on the Rhine (for which he took playwriting and screenwriting co-credit), The Maltese Falcon, and the Thin Man series (not to mention The Glass Key and several other film adaptations), Hammett's best energies went into left-wing politics for the rest of his life. Enlisting in the service, he published a heavily pro-Russian GI newspaper from the Aleutian Islands. After the war he taught at the Jefferson School and gave countless speeches, served as president of the Civil Rights Congress, and donated large sums of money to left-wing causes. Imprisoned for contempt of Congress after his refusal to testify, blacklisted from Hollywood, and sued for back taxes, Hammett spent the rest of his life in physical decline. Since his death, he has been restored to the status of the "hard-boiled" detective novel's key innovator, the stylization and plotting of his work the inspiration for countless books and movies.

HANSBERRY, LORRAINE (1930–1965). Best remembered for her play A Raisin in the Sun, Lorraine Hansberry was also a talented poet, essayist, feminist, and political activist. In much of her writings, art and politics were inseparable themes. If her impressions of the African American experience provoked controversy, they also revealed universal truths without sacrificing integrity or artistic conviction.

Daughter of a successful Chicago businessman who was unflinching in his quest for civil rights, Hansberry was nurtured in a highly conscious and politically aware household. She was fond of recalling how her determined father, after moving his family into a restricted neighborhood where blacks were unwelcome, proceeded to fight the case all the way to the Supreme Court. Eventually the case resulted in a decision against restrictive covenants and became famous as Hansberry v. Lee. Aspects of this incident are vitally interwoven in A Raisin in the Sun.

At a very early age Hansberry decided on a career as a writer. "I think since I was a child, I have been possessed of the desire to put down the stuff of my life," she said at the beginning of her book To Be Young, Gifted, and Black. Her ability as a writer flowered right along with her political development. The aspiring writer was nineteen when she attended Paul Robeson's riot-marred concert at Peekskill, New York, in 1949. Three years later, at a mass meeting in Manhattan, she publicly assailed the witch-hunts of the House Un-American Activities Committee. By the time she was twenty-four, having studied at the University of Wisconsin and the Jefferson School of Social Science, Hansberry, now married to Robert Nemiroff, was active as director of special events at Camp Unity, conducted and attended by leftists and based in upstate New York. It was through her initiative that W.E.B. Du Bois appeared at the camp to speak on political affairs in 1954.

During this period her writing consisted mostly of poetry and occasional journalistic assignments, particularly for Paul Robeson's newspaper, Freedom. As an activist-journalist, Hansberry moved swiftly from front to front, covering and participating in numerous social and political events. All the while she was honing her skills as a playwright. In 1959 her first play, A Raisin in the Sun, which featured Claudia McNeil and Sidney Poitier, was highly acclaimed, earning her the New York Drama Critics Award, a first for a black playwright. This historic success marked the emergence of a new movement in black theater. "She broke new ground," observed playwright/actor Douglas Turner Ward, who met Hansberry when she first arrived in New York City in 1950. "She crossed new frontiers . . . created new possibilities. Her impact and influence upon her own generation and succeeding ones are historic."

Hansberry, however, was too busy to enjoy her new celebrity. She continued her involvement in the growing civil rights movement, writing articles, marching, speaking at benefits, and when she could, working on her next play. She was, as the late author Julian Mayfield recalled, "living each moment as if it were her last." Because of this uncommon energy and enthusiasm for life, it was doubly shocking for those who knew her to hear she was stricken with cancer and dead at thirty-four. Hansberry's short but remarkable life has left an indelible imprint on the world of letters.

HARBURG, EDGAR Y. (1898–1981). A lyricist who called for theater that presented the "guts of life," "Yip" Harburg began writing song lyrics while a student at the City College of New York. In the early years of the Depression, he collaborated with composer Jay Gorney on several musical revues. One of these, Americana (1932), included "Brother Can You Spare a Dime," which has long been associated with the Depression in the United States. A 1932 collaboration with Vernon Duke (Vladimir Dukelsky) produced Walk a Little Faster, the show that included "April in Paris." Duke and Harburg also wrote the 1934 Ziegfeld Follies. Harburg's career also included long working relationships with composers Harold Arlen and Burton Lane. He worked with Arlen on the 1934 production of Life Begins at 8:40 and brought his satirical pen to a discussion of the prewar arms race in Hooray for What! in 1937. His films written in collaboration with Arlen included Gold Diggers of 1937, At the Circus (1939), The Wizard of Oz (1939), Cabin in the Sky (1943), Meet the People (1944, with Sammy Fain and Burton Lane), and Gay Purr-ee (1962).

Harburg continued to write for the stage, and his most famous work, Finian's Rainbow (book by Harburg and Fred Saidy, music by Burton Lane), ran on Broadway for 725 performances, starting on 10 January 1947. Using a fantastic setting and fanciful characters, Finian's Rainbow confronted the issues of segregation and race relations in American society. Commenting on Broadway theater in the 1940s, critic Brooks Atkinson noted that "Harold Arlen's Bloomer Girl and Burton Lane's Finian's Rainbow, full of political satire and comic caprice [both with lyrics by Harburg], helped to redeem Broadway from drudgery." When Finian's Rainbow was revived in 1967, Harburg told the New York Times that his goal as a writer was to create "entertainment that brings people laughter and hope, but also spurs them to action." Finian's Rainbow received an award in 1967 from Ebony magazine for the play's contribution to improving interracial understanding. Finian's Rainbow was released as a film in 1968.

Harburg remained dedicated throughout his career to the causes espoused by various groups on the Left, although he did not have a specific party affiliation. As did those in Finian's Rainbow, the lyrics in Bloomer Girl (with S. Herzin and Fred Saidy, with music by Harold Arlen, 1944) and Jamaica (with Fred Saidy, music by Harold Arlen, 1957, starring Lena Horne and Ricardo Montalban) encouraged audiences to think critically about social problems and to consider seriously the writer's not-too thinly veiled critique of capitalism while enjoying the highest quality theatrical productions. He worked tirelessly in the American Society of Composers, Authors and Publishers to improve royalty payments to composers and writers, who often lost control over their creative work when it was produced on recordings. In addition to his work for stage and screen, Harburg published two volumes of poetry, much of which focused his wit and satire on current social issues. Rhymes for the Irreverent (1965) was dedicated to his wife, and he published At This Point in Rhyme in 1976. Harburg was closely associated with many members of the staff of Monthly Review and composed "Birthday Song" for the journal's fifteenth anniversary in 1964. It was reprinted in tribute to Harburg in April 1984, one month after his death. The Harburg Foundation, financed mainly by residual payments to Harburg's estate, has funded research and production projects in the arts.

HARRINGTON, MICHAEL (1928–1989). For years America's best-known "bright young socialist," Michael Harrington inherited the mantle of Norman Thomas and Eugene Debs. Although never the leader of a large movement, he was the only socialist after 1960 whom many Americans could identify and trust.

Born in Saint Louis in 1928, the only child of a teacher mother and lawyer father, he remembered a boyhood among the "lace-curtain Irish." His Jesuit education at Holy Cross College trained him well for a life of debate and battle in the socialist movement. After a year at Yale Law School, which he entered as a Taft Republican and left as a democratic socialist, he enrolled at the University of Chicago, where he earned a master's degree in English. He moved to New York's Greenwich Village in 1949 and led the life of a bohemian, writing poetry and spending late nights at the White Horse Tavern.

Two years (1951–1953) as a volunteer at the anarchist-pacifist Catholic Worker house on the Lower East Side, where he was associate editor of the Catholic Worker, marked him profoundly. He drew on those years for The Other America (1962), his groundbreaking book on poverty in America, and returned there twenty years later for research on The New American Poverty.

In between those two books and subsequent ones came a lifetime of socialist organizing and activism as well as writing and speaking about social issues that took him to thousands of lecture halls and college campuses. When he left the Catholic Worker and the Catholic faith, he became organizational director for the Workers Defense League in 1953. From 1954 to 1962 he supported himself as a researcher and writer for the Fund for the Republic. In 1957 he published a long article on poverty in Commentary, from which grew the book The Other America. This period coincided with changing political alliances and faction fights. As a leader of the Young People's Socialist League (YPSL), the youth section of the Socialist Party, Harrington differed with Norman Thomas over the latter's critical support for the American war in Korea and took the New York YPSL into Max Shachtman's Independent Socialist League (ISL) in 1954. He was YPSL national chairman until it dissolved in June 1958. Starting in September 1958, Harrington and other ISL-YPSL members entered the Socialist Party as a bloc. From 1960 to 1962 he edited New America, the Socialist Party's official paper.

With the publication in 1962 of The Other America, Harrington stepped into the national limelight. The book was read by President John F. Kennedy and is considered the intellectual force behind the anti-poverty programs of his administration and of Lyndon Johnson's War on Poverty. As the Boston Globe editorialized in 1987, Medicaid and Medicare, food stamps and expanded social-security benefits are "directly traceable" to it. Harrington was also active in the civil rights movement and served on Martin Luther King, Jr.'s Advisory Committee.

During the 1960s Harrington's rigid anticommunism and thus his inability to support an unconditional withdrawal of U.S. troops from Vietnam contributed to divisions on the Left that haunted him for years. As liaison for the League for Industrial Democracy, he came into conflict with the League's youth section, Students for a Democratic Society (SDS). He was upset that SDS allowed the Communist Party an observer at its Port Huron convention in the summer of 1962. Harrington had come to believe in realignment, that the seeds of a labor or socialist party existed within the Democratic Party and could be nurtured by coalition work with Leftists. He therefore believed that sections of the SDS Port Huron Statement would offend the liberals with whom he hoped to work, because they took an insufficiently critical attitude toward the Soviet Union and other authoritarian regimes. Later, Harrington would call his actions "stupid" and publicly berate himself for this blunder, but at the time he was a key force in the split between the Old Left and New Left.

He was elected chairman of the Socialist Party in 1968 as it debated its stance toward the Vietnam War. Harrington's Realignment Caucus opposed the war, but did not support unconditional withdrawal. (Shachtman continued to give critical support to the U.S. efforts, while the Debs Caucus was militantly anti-war.) Although he split with the Realignment Caucus and formed the Coalition Caucus—which backed George McGovern—Harrington did not resign as Socialist Party co-chairman until October 1972, two months before leading his caucus out of the party convention to become, in February 1973, the Democratic Socialist Organizing Committee (DSOC), of which he was chairman.

DSOC pursued its Democratic Party strategy through such projects as Democracy '76 and Democratic Agenda, which were program and policy coalitions within the party. In the 1980s, the successor coalition was called New Directions.

A rapprochement between some members of the Old Left and New Left occurred when Harrington supported the merger of DSOC and the New American Movement in 1982. Now he was working with many who had disdained him during the 1960s but whose politics had come closer to his, as had his to theirs. The new organization, Democratic Socialists of America (DSA), claims to be the largest democratic socialist organization in the United States since the Socialist Party of 1936. Harrington co-chaired it with socialist feminist Barbara Ehrenreich until his death.

Although widely known for his work on domestic issues, Harrington took great pleasure and pride in DSOC's, and then DSA's, participation in the Socialist International. As secretary of the Resolutions Committee at the Socialist International Congress in 1983, he drafted the Manifesto of Albufeira, a political resolution adopted by the sixty-five parties, and served as coordinator of the Committee on a New Declaration of Principles.

In 1972 he became a professor of political science at Queens College. Harrington's contribution to American society through his writing and speaking helped legitimize left-wing discourse in American politics. Unlike many intellectuals, he was more than willing to participate in the tedious work of building an organization. Colleagues marveled at his patience and conciliatory skills and chafed at his inability to share power. Despite a losing battle with cancer of the esophagus, Harrington maintained a grueling writing and speaking schedule and remained active in DSA. He joked that he hoped to stave off death by writing so much. His sixteenth book, Socialism: Past and Future, was published in July 1989. He died on 31 July 1989.

HARRISON, HUBERT H. (1883–1927). A Socialist Party functionary whom historian Joel Rogers described as "perhaps the foremost Afro-American intellect of his time," Hubert H. Harrison was a self-educated journalist and orator whose activism helped lay the groundwork for the New Negro movement in Harlem. Originally from the Virgin Islands, Harrison joined one of two Harlem branches of the Manhattan local of the Socialist Party in 1909, and soon distinguished himself as a speaker. In 1911 he published two editorial letters critical of Booker T. Washington's accommodationist philosophy. Subsequent pressure from members of the Tuskegee political machine resulted in the loss of his job with the U.S. Post Office, and he was hired as an organizer by the New York local of the party, working in the black community to win Socialist votes for the municipal campaign of 1911. His success led to his assignment to establish the Colored Socialist Club in Harlem. He wrote for the Call, and became an assistant editor of the Masses.

Harrison protested the local's quick abandonment of the recruitment campaign among blacks in 1912, but continued as a lecturer while openly criticizing the racial prejudice manifested by some party leaders. His support for Bill Haywood and the Socialist Party wing that backed the Industrial Workers of the World, including his participation with Haywood and Elizabeth Gurley Flynn in the silk-workers' strike in Paterson, New Jersey, in 1913, further alienated him from the executive committee. He was suspended in 1914, and withdrew from the party. He returned to street speaking in Harlem, emphasizing black history and racial issues central to the black community. In the wake of the extreme racial violence of 1917 he launched the nationalist Liberty League of Negro-Americans, and edited its organ, the Voice, urging a stringent self-defensive response by the New Negro to white-instigated attacks. Marcus Garvey met Harrison in these years, and later recruited him to edit the Negro World (1920–1922). In the mid-twenties Harrison advocated the creation of a separate black state within the territory of the United States, and in 1925 he founded the International Colored Unity League and a new periodical, the Voice of the Negro. His publications include The Negro and the Nation (1917) and When Africa Awakes: The Inside Story of the Stirrings and Strivings of the New Negro in the Western World (1920).

HAWAII. The unique political economy of the Hawaiian Islands has meant a quite different political spectrum from the rest of the United States throughout most of Hawaiian history. From 1850 to the end of World War II, Hawaii was ruled by a very small oligarchy that controlled both the political system and the plantation economy. Entirely dependent upon imported Asian labor, the planters established a firm grip on the political system—a grip that was only dislodged by the climactic attack on Pearl Harbor. The stark contrast between the opulence of the small ruling class and the destitution of the Asian workers made for a greater degree of class consciousness in Hawaii. The plantation camps and villages further promoted solidarity among the workers, who slowly learned to eliminate ethnic and racial animosities. Resistance to the political system was perforce confined to individual plantations until 1900.

The U.S. annexation of Hawaii in 1900 brought federal law to Hawaii. Workers promptly took advantage of the freedom from indenture contracts and formed strikes organized around issues and goals. Convinced by strikes in 1909 and 1920 that a radicalism similar to that perceived on the mainland was coming to Hawaii, authorities introduced a wave of repressive legislation to eliminate plantation labor unions. The fear of radicalism was spurred by the development of the Japanese-language press. Of the fourteen such newspapers, three were distinctly Marxist in orientation. A handful of American Federation of Labor craft unions struggled for survival in Honolulu. The Socialist Party that had put in a brief appearance in 1910–1912 disappeared from the scene in World War I. The military, always prominent in Hawaii, viewed the large non-Caucasian population as potentially radical. Military intelligence monitored labor activity closely.

The Great Depression began the effective alteration of the oligarchical structure in Hawaii. The final cutting off of imported labor supplies in 1934, New Deal subsidy legislation, and the growing militancy of the American labor movement were the principal agents in this process. Radical sailors organized a weekly newspaper, the Voice of Labor, in 1937, which reflected the militancy of the maritime labor community of the Pacific Coast. The Communist Party in New York sent Bill Bailey to Hawaii in 1937 to organize a chapter. Recruiting members on the waterfront and in Honolulu, Bailey also served as a writer for the labor paper. He and seaman Jack Hall (1916–1972) were sent to Maui by the newly opened office of the Congress of Industrial Organizations to assist the Filipinos in the last ethnic strike in Hawaii. For the first time the planters sat down and negotiated with the workers.

Hall began to organize plantation workers for United Cannery, Agricultural, Packing and Allied Workers of America on Kauai and to bring workers' political pressure to bear on the oligarchs with the Kauai Progressive League. The strong Marxist message appealed to the group-conscious Japanese and Filipino workers. There were enough citizens in the plantation work force to replace Kauai's two aristocratic senators with labor representatives in 1938 and 1940.

The International Longshoremen's and Warehousemen's Union (ILWU) responded to local workers and led a sweeping organization of agricultural and maritime workers. Between 1944 and 1946, all but one of the sugar plantations were organized. Frank Thompson, veteran of the Industrial Workers of the World and the California Agricultural Industrial Workers Union, led the field organizing, while Jack Hall handled the very effective political organizing. Union-endorsed candidates were elected in 1945 in sufficient numbers to secure passage of a "little" Wagner Act, which closed the loopholes of the national act and permitted the effective organization of field-workers along with the sugar-mill workers.

All of this activity came to a focus in the first industrywide sugar strike of 1946. The ILWU effectively shut down the industry and defied the companies to use the old technique of eviction from plantation housing. The seventy-nine-day strike won union recognition and significant changes in the work situation. This victory gave the union the strength and base to conduct a 1949 strike in which longshoremen effectively curtailed shipping for 179 days. Solidarity with West Coast maritime workers made it impossible for the usual employer tactics to succeed.

Reflecting the rising antiradical sentiments in Washington, the territorial governor launched a Red-baiting assault in 1947, targeting two prominent schoolteacher-activists—John and Aiko Reinecke. Their dismissal, despite the complete lack of evidence in the "hearing," launched a vigorous anti-union campaign in the press and the legislature. An effort was made to split the Filipino workers away from the supposedly radical Japanese by forming an anticommunist rival to the ILWU. A parade of congressional committees, both House and Senate, linked the labor movement to Communism with a variety of paid informers.

The indictment of Jack Hall, regional director of the ILWU, and six of the leading members of the Hawaii Communist Party in 1951, came as no surprise. The indictments charged the "Hawaii Seven" with "conspiring to teach and advocate the need to overthrow the government of the United States by force and violence," as well as with a variety of other crimes. Other than their membership in the Party and labor organizing, the evidence against the seven consisted solely of reading from Marxist-Leninist works, day after day, in the lengthy trial.

Although the convictions were overturned, the trial eroded public support for the labor movement. It had little impact on the loyalty of ILWU members. The democratic structure of the union and the continuing impressive contract gains turned aside all efforts to split the workers away from the union. The influence of the Communist Party had been strongest among secondary leaders of the ILWU. As mechanization of the plantations reduced the work force, the sugar and pineapple workers were converted into something approaching mass-production industrial workers. The locus of radical activity shifted to the urban community.

Active Left-oriented groups have continued in Hawaii since the 1960s. The University of Hawaii's firing of a young assistant professor over the Vietnam War issue in 1966 mobilized the heretofore tranquil student body to win his reinstatement after a two-year struggle.

The decade of the 1970s was a time of transition from the old Marxist Left to a younger, more environmentally oriented Left with few connections to the labor movement. This shift is reflected in the history of radical newspaper publishing in Hawaii. The Honolulu Record, edited by Koji Ariyoshi, one of the Hawaii Seven, between 1948 and 1953, was financed by the ILWU. A recent Left-oriented newspaper was Ka Huli'au (1982–1986), edited by a young radical environmentalist and supported by public contributions; the editor then won election to the state legislature.

Land utilization, environmental issues, and, since the 1970s, the rights of native Hawaiians, have been major issues. Much of the post-Vietnam War progressive spirit was evident in the successful campaign organized by former Communist leader Howard "Stretch" Johnson for a state holiday in honor of Martin Luther King, Jr.

HAWES, ELIZABETH (1903–1971). One of the few fashion designers to involve herself with politics, Elizabeth Hawes not only believed the two were necessarily interconnected, but spent most of her working life trying to show how. A progressive political program, she argued, had to include the right to things that pleased the eye and heart, and not just the stomach.

Born to a well-respected Ridgewood, New Jersey, family, Hawes graduated from Vassar College in 1925, when she left for Paris to train as a traditional couturière. It was a demystifying experience, which she detailed in reports to the New Yorker magazine in 1927 and 1928 under the pen name "Parisite." Ultimately, disgust with the French fashion scene moved her to return to the United States in 1928.

Hawes opened her own couture business in New York just as the Great Crash was wiping out many of her potential customers. Throughout the 1930s, she supplemented her income by doing design commissions for mass-market manufacturers. In 1935 she was the first foreign dress designer invited to show her work in the Soviet Union, where she traveled with the man who would become her husband in 1937, the stage (and later film) director, Joseph Losey.

In her first book, the 1938 best-seller Fashion Is Spinach, Hawes stripped the fashion business naked, revealing both its corrupt practices and its essential indifference to the needs of consumers. Men Can Take It—Hawes's argument against the oppression of men—followed in 1939, in it she suggested that men try skirts and bright colors. In January 1940, Hawes closed her business, restructuring it as a collective, and joined the founding board of the newspaper PM. As editor of the "News for Living" section, Hawes transformed the traditional women's page into a kind of populist guide to better living, focusing on education and consumer rights, as well as affordable entertainment and clothing. In this period Hawes also worked for the Committee for the Care of Young Children in Wartime.

Realizing her need for some firsthand experience of ordinary working life, Hawes took a night-shift job as a grinder at the Wright Aeronautical plant in Paterson, New Jersey, an experience that formed the basis of Why Women Cry, or Wrenches with Wrenches (1943). Here, in one of the rare "war plant diaries" to rise above propaganda, Hawes laid out a "bread and roses" platform of radical proportions.

In 1944 Hawes was hired by the education department of the United Automobile Workers (UAW) in Detroit as a troubleshooter for women workers in UAW locals across the country. At the same time, she wrote a hard-hitting weekly column for the Detroit Free Press. By mid-1945, Hawes was Red-baited out of the UAW and her job at the Detroit Free Press. She returned to New York, where she wrote of these experiences in Hurry Up Please It's Time (1946).

Ever since her PM days, however, the Federal Bureau of Investigation had been collecting a file on Hawes's activities, a file that seemed doubly dangerous since they had confused Hawes with another radical woman of the same name. While Hawes herself was not aware of the file, some of her business associates were, and she found difficulties returning to her former fashion work.

As the Cold War climate in America became unbearable, Hawes looked for alternatives. Her choice was Saint Croix, the Virgin Islands, where she taught herself to live as a self-styled bohemian. Anything but Love (1948) was a sarcastic exposé of the new mythology of contented postwar womanhood.

Life in the Caribbean also opened her eyes to the fact of American imperialism, which she discussed in But Say It Politely (1951). Uncomfortable with the contradictions of her position as a "Continental," Hawes moved to California in the early fifties, where she became the inspiration for younger designers such as Rudi Gernreich. But it was not until her 1967 retrospective at the Fashion Institute of Technology that the depth and consistency of Hawes's design work was finally recognized. Her more central vision—of the necessary unity of art and politics—remains to be appreciated.

HAYDEN, TOM (b. 1939). One of the most influential of the 1960s student radicals, Tom Hayden personifies one pathway of the New Left generation into the 1990s. Hayden was born on 11 December 1939 in Detroit, of Irish parentage. His parents were divorced when he was ten. Growing up Catholic in a largely Protestant neighborhood, he sensed the alienation he would feel more acutely when, in 1957, he became a student at the University of Michigan. As a journalism student, Hayden joined the staff of the Michigan Daily and entered the world of student radicalism.

In 1960 Hayden traveled to the West Coast and the South as a reporter for the Daily. Impressed by the Berkeley radicals and southern civil rights workers he met, he returned to Ann Arbor and joined Robert Haber's efforts to build Students for a Democratic Society (SDS). Al Haber and Hayden envisioned a northern counterpart to the Student Nonviolent Coordinating Committee (SNCC). The open, decentralized structure of SDS reflected a distrust of authority that became a mark of the emerging New Left and a basis of Hayden's own ambivalent relations with the movement.

In 1961 Hayden married SNCC activist Sandra Cason. They lived in Atlanta, Georgia, where Hayden worked as an SDS field secretary. Hayden was jailed in Mississippi and later in Georgia and traveled to Washington to enlist aid for civil rights workers. A futile meeting with Justice Department officials deepened his frustration with mainstream politics.

In June 1962 Hayden drafted a seventy-five-page declaration of SDS philosophy and brought together a group of nearly sixty radicals to discuss the document at a retreat near Port Huron, Michigan. Despite tensions between younger and older participants, the group endorsed its central themes: participatory democracy and faith in the power of the people. The shorter version, known as the Port Huron Statement, condemned the Cold War and racism, called for a decentralized government, and endorsed the labor, civil rights, peace, and student movements. In 1962 Hayden became president of SDS, working out of its headquarters in Ann Arbor. Cason returned to Atlanta to rejoin SNCC. Eventually the two were divorced.

In 1964 Hayden and several other student activists moved to the Newark ghetto, where they formed the Economic Research and Action Project and began organizing block associations to deal with problems of housing, welfare, police abuse, crime, and schools. During the Newark riot of July 1967, Hayden urged officials to withdraw the National Guard and published the results of his subsequent investigations as Rebellion in Newark (1967).

Convinced that the fate of Newark's ghetto was linked to the politics of war, Hayden became one of the first student radicals to protest the war in Vietnam. In November 1965 Hayden visited North Vietnam with Herbert Aptheker and Staughton Lynd, a trip that crystallized his commitment to end the war. Hayden returned to Newark but found it difficult to work within SDS, which had been fractured by competing ideological commitments. Straddling the gap between student activists and liberal power brokers, Hayden was becoming, as Jack Newfield put it, the "Lone Ranger" of the New Left. In 1967 Hayden traveled to Prague to explore peace options with leaders of the National Liberation Front, and he and Rennie Davis continued on to Hanoi and Phnom Penh, where Hayden helped facilitate the first U.S. prisoner-of-war release.

In April 1968, Hayden participated in the occupation of a Columbia University building as part of a nationwide series of campus sit-ins. Later in that eventful year Hayden and Davis worked with the National Mobilization Committee to End the War in Vietnam regarding plans for a series of protests at the Democratic National Convention in Chicago in late August. City officials refused to issue permits and Mayor Richard Daley warned of possible violence. In response, the Mobilization Committee decentralized its activities, trained protesters in self-protection, and recruited medical and legal support teams. Nevertheless, the extraordinary violence of what was later termed the "police riot" in Chicago left Hayden and other radicals pessimistic and battle-shocked. Hayden and seven others were indicted on charges of conspiracy and incitement to riot amid a growing clamor for law and order from the new Nixon administration. Politically exhausted, Hayden moved to Oakland, California.

The eight defendants—Davis and Hayden, Abbie Hoffman, Jerry Rubin, Dave Dellinger, Bobby Seale, John Froines, and Lee Weiner—were brought to trial in 1969 in Chicago in the court of Judge Julius J. Hoffman. Against a national backdrop of rising student rebellion, the defendants attempted to delegitimize the court system, and Judge Hoffman, making no secret of his disdain for the defendants, responded with repressive procedures. Media representations of Bobby Seale chained and gagged in the courtroom left an indelible public image. Seale was imprisoned on contempt charges even before the trial ended, and Davis, Hayden, Hoffman, Rubin, and Dellinger, already facing numerous contempt charges, were found guilty of incitement.

The invasion of Cambodia in 1970 brought a new surge of campus protest, but Senate repeal of the Gulf of Tonkin resolution that year seemed to Hayden a signal that the "system was beginning to respond." At odds with SDS and struggling to come to terms with the trial experience, he moved with Anne Weills Scheer to a collective in Berkeley called the Red Family. Within a year, Hayden's manipulative personal politics led to his ouster.

Having lost his political and personal support, Hayden moved to Venice, California. He taught extension classes on three Los Angeles area campuses, conducting workshops that produced anti-war pamphlets, slides, and posters. Preoccupied with writing and teaching, he distanced himself from the splintered student movement. In 1972 he began working with Jane Fonda, whom he had first met in February 1971 at a peace rally. They toured the country for the Indochina Peace Campaign and were married in January 1973. Their son Troy was born in July. In November the Court of Appeals reversed the Chicago conspiracy convictions, and in 1974 Hayden was cleared of contempt charges. The end of the war in 1975 found Hayden, as he claimed later, a " 'born-again' Middle American."

In 1975 Hayden ran against Democratic incumbent John V. Tunney in the U.S. Senate primaries. Although he had abandoned leftist rhetoric by this time, his thirty-seven-percent showing was surprising, given the tenor of the campaign. In 1976 Hayden formed the Campaign for Economic Democracy (CED), taking on such initiatives as community rent control, peace, and safe energy sources. The CED elected a majority to the Santa Monica City Council and carried into power more than fifty local candidates statewide. During Governor Jerry Brown's administration, Hayden chaired the state's solar energy program.

In 1982 Hayden won a seat in the California State Assembly, representing the wealthy Santa Monica district. With financial backing from Fonda, he campaigned on issues ranging from environmental protection to support for small businesses. In the legislature he chaired the Labor and Employment Committee and championed the successful Proposition 65, a sweeping state initiative to regulate toxic substances. In 1989 Hayden and Fonda were divorced.

In the 1992 California reapportionment, the 44th Assembly District, which Hayden had held for ten years, was abolished. Hayden ran successfully for the Twenty-third State Senate District, representing an affluent region stretching from Malibu to the San Fernando Valley and including Beverly Hills and Hollywood. Highlighting campaign finance reform, he made an unsuccessful bid for governor in the 1994 Democratic primaries. Two years later he was a delegate to the Democratic National Convention in Chicago, held, ironically, at the old Conrad Hilton (Chicago Hilton), the storm center of the 1968 riots.

Hayden's politics became increasingly centrist as he attempted to convert his 1960s idealism into 1990s pragmatism. His bids for political office outraged many fellow activists, but his odyssey from campus radical to California legislator was not unlike the accommodations other sixties radicals made in the nineties; most found it difficult to straddle these very different eras. Although student radicals failed to create a lasting organizational challenge to corporate capitalism in America, many went on to become influential shapers of public opinion—professors, labor leaders, social service advocates, lawyers, filmmakers—and politicians. Thus they helped consolidate the achievements of the sixties in civil rights, women's rights, peace, environmental regulation, and more open public institutions, at a time when conservative pressure on these liberal landmarks was mounting.

HAYES, MAX. See Cleveland Citizen.

HAYMARKET INCIDENT. On 4 May 1886, a bomb was thrown as local police attacked an anarchist-led labor demonstration in Chicago's Haymarket Square. Eight policemen died as a result of the bombing and of crossfire among police. An undetermined, but probably larger, number of demonstrators lost their lives amidst the tumult and police gunfire. The identity of the bomb-thrower remains a mystery, but the events leading up to Haymarket, and the tremendous repercussions of the bombing, are more clear.

The Haymarket Square demonstration grew out of a massive nationwide movement of working people demanding the eight-hour working day. That demand had begun to attract support during the Civil War as workers identified their long hours as a kind of "slavery" from which they could be "emancipated" by legislation. After the war, Eight-Hour Leagues boomed in membership and successfully lobbied for eight-hour laws in several states. But these laws almost all featured gaping loopholes. In Illinois, Chicago Eight-Hour Leagues were instrumental in securing the passage of a shorter-hours law in 1867, albeit an unenforceable one. On 1 May of that year, tens of thousands of Chicago workers attempted to make the statute apply by striking. Their actions failed, largely as a result of police violence, but the episode in that booming industrial city presented in microcosm trends that would mature in the next twenty years and lead toward Haymarket.

By the early 1880s, radical workers in Chicago and elsewhere had accumulated further grievances against the political system, especially in the bloody suppression of the 1877 railroad strike and in subsequent local elections in which socialist candidates charged that fraud had "counted them out" of victory. Three separate national organizational responses resulted, all of them seeking to reconcile republic citizenship with industrial society and to address the question of how the labor movement should interact with a government hostile to labor action. The oldest of these organizations, the Knights of Labor (founded 1869), preached the virtues of cooperatives, of working-class self-education, of agitation for political reform, of cultivation of good relations with local politicians, of organization of both skilled and unskilled workers, and of caution in undertaking strikes. Irish-American workers strongly supported the Knights of Chicago. The Federation of Organized Trades and Labor Unions (FOTLU; founded 1881, evolved into the American Federation of Labor in 1886) stressed trade union organizing and sought to avoid politically divisive issues and reliance on the state in labor-reform matters. The smallest organization, the International Working People's Association (IWPA; founded 1881) mixed anarchism, socialism, and syndicalism. The IWPA utterly rejected both politics and reform while embracing revolutionary self-defense and writing romantically about the possibility of dynamite as a tool for labor militants. It attracted substantial support among German, Czech, and Scandinavian immigrants. Its Chicago branch, led by Albert Parsons, Lucy Parsons, and August Spies, emphasized the role of industrial unions and farm organizations in providing the basis for a new and stateless society.

Lines dividing these various approaches to labor organization were extremely fluid, with many activists easily switching organizational affiliations or even belonging to different groups simultaneously. In Chicago, with the approach of the 1 May 1886, date designated by the FOTLU for transition to an eight-hour day, Knights, craft unionists, and the members of the IWPA who helped lead the large Central Labor Union joined forces to build a huge strike involving perhaps eighty thousand workers.

During this strike, it became apparent that Mayor Carter Harrison, who earlier had urged restraint in the policing of labor disputes, had abandoned such as policy in favor of the stance of his appointee, police captain John Bonfield, who held that "the club today saves the bullet tomorrow." On 3 May, lumber workers rallying for the eight-hour day joined strikers from the McCormick Harvester Works, involved in a separate labor dispute, to harass strikebreakers at the latter establishment. Police fired into the crowd, killing at least two and wounding many strikers. The anarchist leader August Spies had spoken to the lumber workers and witnessed the bloodshed. The IWPA, which had promised to defend the eight-hour strikes against the kind of police, Pinkerton, and National Guard violence that had caused scores of workers to die in the 1877 strike wave, called the 4 May meeting at Haymarket to protest police violence and to memorialize the victims at McCormick Works. Tensions ran high as employers' associations and the press demanded decisive antistrike measures while one version of the IWPA's leaflets against police violence bore the headline: REVENGE! WORKINGMEN, TO ARMS!!!

The demonstration in Haymarket Square was itself uneventful until the police attacked. Rain was heavy and attendance light. Mayor Harrison, who came as an observer, found the gathering peaceable and orderly. But after the mayor and most of the demonstrators had departed, Captain Bonfield led 180 police in an attempt to break up the rally. Moments later, the bomb exploded, sparking a police riot.

The first fruits of the bombing were accelerated campaigns of repression against the eight-hour strikers, anarchists, and labor leaders in Chicago and, to an extent, nationally. Chicago's press mixed anti-immigrant, anti-labor union and antiradical stereotypes in a hysterical campaign against anarchist "serpents," who were seen as the "offscourings of Europe." Police for weeks kept up a steady pattern of raids on Chicago labor leaders' homes and labor organizations' headquarters, and their spurious reports of finding caches of arms and explosives just as steadily splashed across front pages of the city's daily papers.

Eight IWPA members were prosecuted in this atmosphere for conspiracy to murder policeman Mathias Degan, who died at Haymarket. In their trial, State's Attorney Julius Grinnell affirmed that "anarchy" was the real defendant and, as Paul Avrich has recently put it, Judge Joseph E. Gary "flaunted his bias against the defendants" at every turn. All eight defendants received guilty verdicts in August 1886, though no evidence specifically linked them to the bomb. In November of the following year, four of them—August Spies, Albert Parsons, George Engel, and Adolph Fischer—were executed by hanging. A fifth condemned anarchist, Louis Lingg, killed himself in jail. Oscar Neebe, Samuel Fielden, and Michael Schwab stayed in jail until released in 1893 by Illinois governor John Peter Altgeld, whose stinging pardon message acknowledged the injustice of the trial.

Haymarket's bomb echoed long and deep. The explosion and ensuing repression decimated the anarchist labor movement, though the martyred defendants became heroes to many and inspired countless individual conversions to anarchism and to socialism. Victimized too were the Knights of Labor, who suffered both from the general repression of workers' organizations and from the refusal of their national leadership to endorse the broad-based campaign in defense of those accused as a result of the bombing. The pardons ruined Altgeld's promising political career. The tactic of the mass strike was far less appealing to pragmatic U.S. labor leaders after Haymarket, and the idea of self-defense by labor never again received so broad a hearing on the national scale. On an international scale, the Haymarket events and 1886 eight-hour strikes contributed to the 1889 decision of the Second International to adopt 1 May as World Labor Day.

HAYWOOD, HARRY (1898–1985). Of all the African American figures in the history of American Communism, none was more important in ultimate impact than Harry Haywood. Born to a sharecropping family that fled the South at the turn of the century, Haywood came to Chicago as a young man following World War I. He joined the Communist Party in 1925 and in 1926 sojourned to Moscow, where he was strongly influenced by the first generation of anticolonial revolutionaries (among them M. N. Roy of India, Tan Malaka of Indonesia, and Ho Chi Minh). During his years of study in the Soviet Union his peasant background merged with this anticolonial tradition to crystallize his major theoretical contribution to American radicalism—the theory of self-determination in the "black belt" of the American South for the Afro-American people.

Haywood initiated the debate on self-determination within the Party during the 1930s and vigorously fought for this position until his expulsion in 1959. Accused of "Left sectarianism," Haywood continued to be one of the most astute observers of the civil rights and black power movements from an independent standpoint during the later 1950s and 1960s. His work on the insurrectionary potential of the black masses bore fruit in the "long, hot summers" of 1965–1968; his work on the revolutionary implications of black nationalism with the emergence of Malcolm X, the Revolutionary Action Movement, and the League of Revolutionary Black Workers. He was no less prescient in cautiously warning about the co-optation and subversion of an independent black mass movement. During the last years of his life, he was instrumental in nurturing a new generation of Afro-American radicals, exposing them to the intricacies of his own experience in Party politics, while exposing them to the dangers of the integrationist dogma of liberal and radical alike. His major works include Negro Liberation (1948) and his autobiography, Black Bolshevik (1978), in addition to numerous articles, pamphlets, and political tracts. Ernest Allen of the University of Massachusetts is preparing a collection of his lesser-known writings for eventual publication.

HAYWOOD, WILLIAM D. (1869–1928). A hard-rock miner, William D. "Big Bill" Haywood became the leader and symbol of the Industrial Workers of the World (IWW) during its brief heyday as a power in American industrial relations. William Dudley Haywood was born in Salt Lake City, Utah, on 4 February 1869, the son of a South African woman and a Kentucky miner who had also worked as a Pony Express rider. In 1884 the young Haywood went to work as a miner's helper in Nevada, where he learned the rudiments of industrial unionism and the principles of socialism from a member of the Knights of Labor. He soon married Nevada Jane Minor, the daughter of a rancher, and filed for a homestead near the Idaho line. The land was lost when the federal government recalled it for use as an Indian reservation. With his wife ailing with chronic arthritis, Haywood returned to mining, settling in Silver City, Idaho.

He quickly rose to be head of the Western Federation of Miners (WFM) in Silver City. He was an excellent administrator, maintaining virtually total organizational control of the town, supervising the hospital, and negotiating peacefully with employers. In recognition of his success, Haywood was brought to Denver in 1901 to be secretary-treasurer of the national WFM, which had become the target of an aggressive regional campaign by employers and state governments out to break its power in the mines, mills, and smelters. Over six feet tall, well over two hundred pounds, and with a glowering glass eye, Haywood soon earned a reputation as a resolute crisis leader. He went about his rounds armed with a revolver and ready to exchange blows and epithets in his capacity as editor of the Miner's Magazine. An increasingly militant socialist, he was also a heavy drinker and a womanizer. Nevada Jane converted to Christian Science and the Haywoods became estranged.

In 1905 Haywood was the keynote speaker at the founding convention of the IWW, which he called "the Continental Congress of the working class." His immediate role in the union was aborted when in 1906, along with WFM president Charles Moyer, he was charged with the bombing murder of former Idaho governor Frank Steunenberg, arrested, and irregularly extradited to Idaho. Defended by Clarence Famed sabotage sticker by Ralph Chaplin, c. 1915.

Darrow, Haywood was acquitted in July 1907, but his career in the WFM had ended due to a falling out with Moyer, the causes of which are obscure.

As a radical cause célèbre, Haywood found himself in a wider world of agitation. Vaudeville operators offered him thousands of dollars a week in fees if he would appear on their circuits. Haywood, who had stood as Socialist candidate for governor of Colorado while in prison, chose to lecture for the Socialist Party. At one meeting in Chicago he addressed sixty thousand paid admissions and in Milwaukee twenty-five thousand. Haywood also contributed to the International Socialist Review, which supported the "revolutionist" wing of the Socialist Party, was elected to the party's national executive committee, and twice represented the party at meetings of the Second International. In the course of representing the Socialist Party abroad, he met many prominent revolutionaries, trade unionists, and intellectuals. Among these were George Bernard Shaw, V. I. Lenin, Rosa Luxemburg, Ramsay MacDonald, Jean Jaurès, and Clara Zetkin. Haywood addressed large gatherings in Scandinavia and Great Britain.

By 1912 Haywood was an organizer-at-large for the IWW. He played the leading role in the successful Lawrence, Massachusetts, textile strike of 1912 and in the unsuccessful but historic IWW strikes in Akron, Ohio, and Paterson, New Jersey, in 1913. Although a favorite of the fashionable Greenwich Village Left of Mabel Dodge and John Reed, Haywood irritated "reformist" Socialist leaders such as Morris Hillquit and Victor Berger. They disapproved of his militant rhetoric on behalf of sabotage, which they interpreted as meaning violence, and by his disdain for their electoral approach to socialism. While never rejecting electoral politics, Haywood emphasized that revolution could be affected only by workers at the point of production working through their industrial unions.

When their expectations for the election of 1912 were unrealized, the reformers blamed the shortfall on the public's association of the Socialist Party with the IWW. In early 1913 they arranged to recall Haywood from his party office, the main complaint being that he would not unambivalently disavow the use of violent sabotage. Haywood did not resist and soon succeeded Vincent St. John as secretary-treasurer of the IWW. He soon led the union to significant organizational successes, especially among western loggers, copper miners, and migrant farm workers. The IWW had reached its peak membership of approximately 100,000 when the "preparedness" campaign and American intervention in World War I presented it with a mortal challenge. The IWW opposed the war but, largely at Haywood's behest, did not agitate against it nor forbid members to comply with the draft. Nevertheless, politicians, patriotic organizations, and employers' associations attacked the union as disloyal and dangerous. A series of raids resulted in the indictment of Haywood and most of the union's leadership under the Sedition Act. After a long and celebrated trial in Chicago, infamous for its lack of hard evidence, Haywood was sentenced to a fine of $20,000 and twenty years' imprisonment.

Haywood had urged members of the IWW to submit to arrest and a mass trial, convinced that the government's case would collapse and the subsequent IWW victory would launch it into an era of renewed growth. In March 1921, with his strategy discredited and himself ailing with diabetes, Haywood jumped bail and fled to the Soviet Union while most of his co-defendants languished in prison. IWW morale was shattered. Although individuals remembered him affectionately and excused his action without justifying it, his influence on the American Left had all but vanished.

Haywood's years in the Soviet Union have been a subject of dispute in the Left. Those opposed to the Communist Party have claimed Haywood was extremely unhappy in Moscow and perhaps disillusioned with the Bolsheviks. Others have written that his major problems in the Soviet Union had to do with his health. What is clear is that after failing as a manager of a factory complex, Haywood spent most of his time in Moscow, where he chiefly mixed with journalists such as Walter Duranty of the New York Times and radicals like Harry Haywood (no relation) who had come to study in the Soviet Union. He was not entirely idle politically. James Cannon credits him with launching the idea for the International Labor Defense, and Harry Haywood has written that Big Bill often met to discuss political issues with Moscow-based Communists. While in Moscow, Haywood wrote an autobiography, Bill Haywood's Book, which has become a focus of partisan acrimony. Anticommunists reject it as inauthentic, or, at best, heavily edited to serve the purposes of the Communist Party. The book comes to a climax with Haywood's arrival in Moscow and a meeting with Lenin, feeding the speculation that someone other than Haywood completed the book or that Haywood rushed the final parts due to illness. He suffered two strokes in the spring of 1928 and died on 18 May. He is interred in the Kremlin wall.

HEALEY, DOROTHY (b. 1914). Postwar leader of the southern California Communist Party, Dorothy Healey was a full-time Party activist and spokesperson for over forty years. She was born in Denver, Colorado, and raised in Oakland, California. Her mother was a founding member of the Communist Party, USA. Shortly after joining the Young Communist League in 1928 Healey became known as a popular and effective organizer of migrant farmworkers in the agricultural valleys of California, and in 1940 she was appointed a deputy labor commissioner by liberal Democratic governor Culbert Olson. Healey quietly opposed Earl Browder's dissolution of the Communist Party during World War II, and in 1945 she emerged from the intra-Party factional struggle as a compromise candidate to head the Los Angeles branch.

In 1952 Healey was among a large group of Party leaders arrested under the Smith Act. Following her release in 1952, she began to campaign within leading Party circles for a more flexible and independent approach toward the Soviet Union. In the years after Khrushchev's revelatory speech in 1956, she became something of a maverick figure in the Party, concentrating most of her energies on southern California.

In the early- and mid-1960s Healey became widely known for her frequent appearances on college campuses and her strong support for the student-led antiwar movement. These activities, however, increasingly brought her into open conflict with the national Party leadership, and in 1969, having openly opposed the Soviet invasion of Czechoslovakia, she effectively removed herself from the Party. Following her formal resignation in 1973, Healey became active in the New American Movement and the Democratic Socialists of America.

HEALTH LEFT. The health field, long dominated by the medical profession and its commercial and institutional allies, has a widely recognized and well-deserved reputation for its right-wing politics and for its obstruction to meaningful social change in- and outside the health field. This dominance has obscured the existence during the past 125 years or so of a continuum of Left physicians, nurses, dentists, and other health workers. They have rejected the prevailing profit-oriented, dehumanizing values of the American medical care system and have been appalled by the huge and brutal human costs of American industrial capitalism. They have played important left-wing political roles both inside and outside the health field and joined various people's movements in resisting economic exploitation and other social injustices and in fighting for improved medical services and better health for all. In so doing, they have been willing to risk income, professional advancement, personal relationships, legal liberties, and, even at times, life.

Also rarely identified or even noticed in labor, political, and medical history are the health-policy proposals and health-service programs that originated in Left labor unions, women's clubs, political parties, and community organizations. These ground-breaking efforts, often marginal in these original settings, significantly influenced the thinking and products of mainstream health reformers in contemporary and later periods.

During the latter part of the nineteenth century, socialist and other Left health practitioners, in response to the tragic and frequently man-made medical problems of poor people, provided them care in their private offices at little or no cost, or at public dispensaries and hospitals. Physicians, in particular, also gave money and the prestige of their names to mass events and campaigns organized by the Left. A few assumed leadership positions in local and national Left political parties.

Physicians were especially numerous among the politically influential veterans of the 1848 people's uprising in Germany who emigrated to the United States. The most prestigious during his life and subsequently was Abraham Jacobi, "father" of American pediatrics. Another physician Forty-Eighter, Ernst Schmidt, ran for mayor of Chicago in 1879 on the Socialist Labor Party's first ticket and in 1886 chaired the defense committee for the Haymarket martyrs.

Environmental health concerns were a high priority among the measures formally proposed by the Left political parties of this period for "improving the conditions of the working classes." Typical is item two in the eleven immediate demands specified in the "Declaration of Principles of the Workingmen's Party of the United States," adopted 22 July 1876: "Sanitary inspection of all conditions of labor, means of subsistence ['victuals'] and dwellings included."

Women union leaders and radical activists were prominent in advocating for this demand, particularly the elimination or control of hazards in sweatshops, factories, and mines. A significant example of such efforts is the 1891 report The New Slavery: Investigation into the Sweating System by Socialist Elizabeth Morgan and comrades, published by the Chicago Trade and Labor Assembly. The associated campaign resulted in the 1893 enactment of the Illinois Factory Inspection Act and the appointment of Socialist activist Florence Kelley as the state's first chief factory inspector (1893–1897).

Left workers also helped organize and run unions and mutual-aid societies that, among their functions, provided death (funeral) and sickness (income maintenance) benefits and sometimes paid for general physician care, medicines, and other medical services on an insurance (group-payment) basis. In a few such situations hospitals were built and operated. The first was established in 1891 by the Coeur d'Alene union of the lead and silver miners in northern Idaho, part of the Western Federation of Miners, probably the most radical union in the country. The left-oriented Cuban and Spanish societies of the cigar makers of Ybor City (Tampa), Florida, were another early example of worker-controlled medical benefit activities expanding into hospital ownership and management (1904).

Some three hundred or so communitarian settlements attempted to create here and now a bit of the communist utopia that Edward Bellamy "revealed" in Looking Backward 2000–1887. Most had difficulty attracting physicians for general medical care, which seems to be as much as they intended to provide, and many had a religious/spiritual orientation that minimized or even excluded mainstream medicine. These experiments in applied communism apparently provided no insights or inspiration to the Health Left in its political functioning.

When the Socialist Party was founded in 1901, the immediate demands again included environmental health concerns, this time recognizing existing but inadequate government programs: "more effective inspection of workshops and factories." In addition, the Socialists' increased reliance on government for solution of social problems resulted in two further health demands of substantial magnitude and political significance: (1) "compulsory insurance against . . . illness, accidents, invalidism" [income maintenance during such situations as well as during "unemployment, old age and death"], and (2) "the creation of a [federal] department of public health." Essentially similar positions were endorsed by Jane Addams and other social reform leaders and were accepted by Theodore Roosevelt for the platform of his 1912 Progressive Party. Left physicians in many parts of the country and with a variety of political perspectives were frequently zealous participants in union health clinics, occupational health programs, and women's health services including abortions and birth control, and in public education/advocacy campaigns about tuberculosis, mental health, sexual health, healthful living, and national health insurance.

The concept of using social insurance to cover the costs of medical care was first proposed in the United States in 1904 in scholarly articles by I. M. Rubinow. Rubinow was educated both as a physician and political economist, was a leading theoretician for the Socialist Party in this period, and is best known as this country's pioneer disability insurance actuary and as a social agency administrator. He was a key member of the social insurance committee of the American Association for Labor Legislation and was employed by the American Medical Association for its one-year (1916) campaign for government health insurance.

The concept of combining nongovernmental worker group payment and physician group practice was an influential part of the "calling" of James P. Warbasse to promote consumer cooperatives in the United States along the lines of those in Europe. Out of political conviction and personal wealth, he retired in 1916 from a successful surgical practice in Brooklyn to become the protagonist, major funder, and first president of the Cooperative League of the USA, a position he held for twenty-five years. He authored the first monograph on "cooperative medicine." Having rejected strongly both the competitive-for-profit and total-government approaches, he believed the only salvation for American medical care was the local, consumer-controlled model.

As a result of thorough studies and astute agitation by Progressives, notably radical physician S. Josephine Baker and Socialists Florence Kelley and Julia Lathrop, social worker, the promotion of the health of women and children became recognized as a social responsibility and appropriate for government intervention at local, state, and federal levels, culminating in the passage of the Sheppard-Towner Maternity and Infancy Protection Act in 1921. Another outstanding achievement of the women's movement of this period was America's first family planning campaign, organized by Margaret Sanger, Socialist and nurse.

Not surprisingly, in this period emerges the first (and rarely replicated) avowedly Socialist organization of health workers—the Dentists Study Chapter of the Intercollegiate Socialist Society. Organized in 1910, the chapter was located in New York City, and its active members were both dental students and dentists. In addition to educational meetings, social events, and distribution of literature (including their own leaflet on "oral hygiene from the Socialist standpoint"), they published Progressive Dentist, the first Health Left periodical. Like most Socialist enterprises with strong anti-war positions, both the chapter and its magazine did not survive long after World War I started.

The heyday of Socialist electoral politics enabled some demonstration of a Socialist health program. For instance, George R. Lunn, the Socialist mayor of Schenectady, New York, addressed that city's aldermanic council in 1912 as follows:

We place health in our administration as the one consideration that should outweigh all others. As Socialists, we recognize it as part of the duty of the twentieth century state to assume the responsibility for the health of its citizens . . . . We propose to use the whole force of the Health Department as an educational power. Through lectures, demonstrations, and exhibits, we shall seek to enlighten people as to those social conditions which are the root of so much disease. . . . A maternity and infancy nurse trained also as a social worker, will be appointed. . . . In the public schools rigid inspection by qualified physicians will begin—cases of illness and deficiency will not only be reported but will be followed up by nurses. . . . Hindered though we are by unjust laws, we shall nevertheless use every available power to make it possible for the people to maintain their homes in the face of the deplorable conditions that tyrannize over them. . . . We assert as socialists that tuberculosis is due to economic and social causes. The community is, therefore, responsible for the disease, and must act upon that responsibility by remedying the vile living and working conditions which produce it. So far as the laws permit we shall work with prevention as our first aim. . . . The disease must be wiped out.

Perhaps the most creative contribution of Socialists of this period to the health field was a demonstration of a neighborhood health center under the control of those it served. This local democracy-enhancing concept was conceived by Socialists Wilbur C. Phillips and his wife, Elsie Cole Phillips. After an abortive try to establish such a center in Milwaukee at the request of that city's Socialist administration, they were able to try again in Cincinnati. In three years there (1917-1920), they did create a functioning, democratically elected Citizen's Council to govern the enterprise. Despite strong neighborhood support, this unique experiment in social organization for health service was killed by postwar Red-baiting conservatism.

Women played precedent-setting leadership roles in worker-oriented occupational health and safety. Alice Hamilton, M.D., a member of the Jane Addams circle and the nation's preeminent industrial toxicologist, conducted pioneering studies of lead and other hazardous substances in the workplace and crusaded for better control of these substances by industry and government. The Workers Health Bureau of America was organized in 1921 by several Communist women with experience in the consumer and labor movements. By means of research, education, advocacy, and assistance to unions for developing their own programs, the bureau attacked the detrimental impact of the workplace on the health of workers. At its height, it had the support of 190 labor organizations in twenty-four states. It viewed workers' health and safety as class issues to be controlled by unions and workers themselves. This distinguished it from most contemporary and subsequent occupational health efforts premised as the province of special technicians and professionals. It organized the first national labor health conference in 1927. A year later it disbanded when hostility from the conservative leadership of the American Federation of Labor resulted in loss of its union support.

The Russian Revolution was a powerful and complex stimulant to the Health Left and its visions of greatly expanded governmental health responsibilities. In the 1920s and early 1930s a few health professionals, after visiting the Soviet Union, reported enthusiastically on the potential if not the actuality of the first completely nationalized system of medical practice, training of health workers, scientific research, and public health.

In the 1930s, Left practitioners, more than ever, continued to contribute their clinical skills to social change movements and to Left activists, providing emergency and non-emergency care to strikers, demonstrators, and low- and no-income members of Left political parties and other organizations. With substantial support of Left physicians, the International Workers Order (the Communist split-off of the Workmen's Circle) and other Left union and mutual-aid societies revitalized the medical benefit programs that were traditional among immigrant working people.

The most dramatic example of contributed clinical skills was evoked by the Spanish Civil War. Medical/surgical units for the American George Washington and Abraham Lincoln Brigades were organized by the Medical Bureau to Aid Spanish Democracy with major leadership from New York City surgeon Edward Barsky and a few other Communist physicians and nurses. Those who risked their lives for their political convictions on and behind the battlefronts in Spain in 1937 numbered about sixty-five nurses, about thirty physicians, two of whom were killed, and about forty other health professionals, technicians, and ambulance drivers. In addition, the bureau raised money at medical institutions across the country to purchase and send to the Spanish Loyalists seventy ambulances and large quantities of medicines and medical/surgical supplies.

On the home front, Left physicians and health planners developed short-lived federal medical care programs for the rural poor and long-lived group practice health insurance plans for the middle class—the earliest precursors of health maintenance organizations (which half a century later would be transformed into profit-making businesses with little concern for the health of people). Several of these—in Elk City, Oklahoma; Washington, D.C.; Minneapolis and Saint Paul, Minnesota; and Seattle, Washington—implemented James P. Warbasse's consumer cooperative model; they had to fight for their existence against vigorous attacks by organized medicine, eventually winning all court cases.

The magazine Health and Hygiene was perhaps the most significant attempt at education of the general public about health matters from a Left perspective. An outgrowth of the medical column in the Communist Party's Daily Worker, it was published monthly for about four years beginning in 1935. It provided up-to-date advice on personal health matters as well as coverage of the political aspects of the health field.

Among the unions organized in the 1930s with Communist leadership was Local 1199, the union of New York City pharmacists and drugstore clerks. Its founding raised the fundamental issue of Left health professionals then and ever since—do health professionals, mostly not working class by background, income, or social status, belong in labor unions? Later this union expanded to include other kinds of health workers including nurses and a few physicians. Today its several descendants still proudly identify themselves as “1199” and play politically progressive roles in the labor movement.

Activist medical students and hospital interns dodged the “union” issue in the nation's first organizations for these constituencies. Although the Interne Council of America (founded in 1934) and the Association of Medical Students (founded in 1936) did not describe themselves as unions, they mainly worked on their own special “bread-and-butter” issues. In addition they dealt with public policy regarding medical care for all people, war and peace, and discrimination against women and blacks in health science school admissions and hospital staff appointments. In 1941 the two organizations merged and for another ten years pursued this two-track course—improving the quality and environment of their training and joining the student movement and health progressives in broader political efforts.

Left physicians generally did not join unions but were responsible for a variety of political organizations. Notable among these for its comprehensive scope and longevity is the Physicians Forum, this country's first national membership society of Left physicians. It was founded in 1941 as an amalgam of Communist and other radical clinicians, mainly Jewish, mainly from New York and several other large cities, and a few but highly prestigious academic physicians with progressive but independent political perspectives and activist bents, led by Ernst Boas. The forum's central commitment was education and advocacy for national health insurance. It also did pioneering work on racial discrimination in the health field, was the first national physicians' group to endorse the right to abortion, and introduced the concept of nuclear weapons testing and use as a top-priority public health issue. This last was picked up brilliantly early in the 1960s for a new, sole-purpose organization, Physicians for Social Responsibility; many of its leaders were alumni of Left medical student activities in the 1930s and 1940s, one of whom, Bernard Lown, received the Nobel Peace Prize in 1986 on behalf of International Physicians for the Prevention of Nuclear War, which he co-founded.

Beginning in the 1940s, Left public health workers—academic physicians, health administrators, and others—invested considerable energy in the internal affairs of the American Public Health Association, making it the major left-of-center political force in the health field. Several of its presidents were known leftists, and in recent years it has even flaunted a large and energetic Socialist Caucus, the only such in a mainstream health professional society.

Laudatory education about health developments in the Soviet Union reached maturity in the systematic studies and prolific writings and lectures of Henry E. Sigerist, internationally recognized medical historian and health systems scholar. He was a temporary but influential American, imported from Europe in 1932 by Johns Hopkins University to head its Medical History Institute, Sigerist's Socialized Medicine in the Soviet Union was published in 1937 by a major commercial publisher and was immediately accorded authoritative status by the health field and the general public. This book begins with a forty-page “Background of Soviet Medicine,” which sympathetically presents the history of the Communist revolution and the Marxist political foundation of the Soviet health system. His national recognition as an apostle of “socialized medicine” earned him the cover of Time magazine in January 1939.

Sigerist followed this up in the 1940s by conceptualizing, helping to organize, and guiding the American-Soviet Medical Society and its journal, the American Review of Soviet Medicine. This enterprise provided Western medicine for the first time with extensive reports about Soviet medical research, medical practice, and health service organization. It functioned for four years and then became a Cold War casualty.

This was but a small part of the destruction of the Health Left by the domestic side of the Cold War—McCarthyism and its milder but still pervasive successors. A few indomitable physicians maintained the Physicians Forum without subjecting it to political "cleansing," and others expressed their Left perspectives in ways that were politically less vulnerable. Three major examples of the latter were the unprecedented medical and hospital care system established by the United Mine Workers of America in Appalachia (1956–1963), comprising ten new, coordinated, quality-conscious hospitals in locales previously lacking modern or any health services; the monumental comparative studies of national health systems worldwide by Milton Roemer; and The Medical Letter (conceived and published beginning in 1958 by Harold Aaron, a physician and Health and Hygiene alumnus, and Arthur Kallet, a journalist and first director of the Consumers Union), the purpose of which was to provide physicians with scientifically rigorous evaluations of pharmaceuticals untainted by the manufacturers' biases and deceptions, a mission it continues to carry out today.

In 1964 the Medical Committee for Human Rights (MCHR) was started by Left and liberal, black and white, health professionals as an adjunct to the civil rights movement. Initially its main contribution was "medical presence." The physical presence of physicians and other health professionals, mainly white, at major civil rights demonstrations in the South added credibility to the events and increased the safety of all participants; first aid and minor medical and surgical care were also furnished. A community health program and clinic was established in a poverty-stricken rural county of Mississippi.

With the withdrawal of northerners from southern civil rights activities, MCHR experienced intensive and prolonged internal review and upheaval, becoming a multi-issue, radical-style Left organization. In this process it lost most of its liberal support. Unlike the New Left generally, the Old Left was prominent and respected in MCHR during the years it flourished.

MCHR chapters in different parts of the country continued to provide "medical presence" at movement demonstrations, but they also developed proficiency in organizing and furnishing emergency medical care required by police brutality, one particularly notable example being the demonstrations at the 1968 Democratic National Convention in Chicago.

Although racism in the health field was a principal concern, MCHR's agenda included opposition to the Vietnam War and support of government policies and programs to eliminate or ameliorate the plight of the poor. It created an occupational health and safety project that was reborn as independent Committees on Occupational Safety and Health in a number of large cities, and it developed the principles that served as the basis for the National Health Service bill introduced by Congressman Ronald Delums, an avowed socialist.

Enough medical students were caught up in the student-centered New Left world to establish a number of militant groups nationwide; these identified themselves as "student health organizations" and were affiliated with each other loosely so as to accommodate to their dominant local focus and independence. Their concerns overlapped those of the New Left with emphasis on adding a Left social/political dimension to their own education. One of their most important tasks was establishing "free clinics" in San Francisco's Haight-Ashbury district and in other cities with medical schools. Dependent on the available time and continuing commitment of unsettled health professionals in training, these efforts were tenuous in scope, quality, and longevity. An important variant were the free clinics established by the Black Panthers in the black ghettos of Chicago, Kansas City, Oakland, Philadelphia, and other big cities. These were the most authentic, albeit brief, demonstration of health care organized and delivered by the population it served.

The emergence of the women's self-help/mutual aid groups in 1969 and subsequently the women's health movement constituted a profound ideological challenge to modern health care—who owns medical science as well as who owns the body needing care. Although such radical (but not so new) ideas did not appear in Left party platforms, many in the leadership of the women's health movement, both with and without academic health-care training, were on the Left as traditionally defined.

Left health professionals, most also active in MCHR, organized and staffed the health/medical unit of Ralph Nader's Public Citizen and a health think-tank and professional journal, Health/PAC (Policy Advisory Center). These, MCHR, the Health Law Project of Philadelphia, and the National Health Law Program nourished the concept of health rights, which soon became formalized, tempered by court decisions, legalized at times, and, in the case of hospital patient rights, taken over and grossly distorted by hospital administration.

Two other Health Left journals were founded and are still guided by academic physicians with different Left credentials predating the New Left: International Journal of Health Services (Vicente Navarro, 1971) and Journal of Public Health Policy (Milton Terris, 1980). Both of these editors with their own extensive research and publications have shed much light on the politics and economics of the health field. They and several other younger and older Left physicians with teaching positions in medical and public health schools have immeasurably influenced the thinking and practice of a host of health professionals.

During this period many Left health professionals actively participated in the anti-Vietnam War movement; best known is the famous pediatrician and Left fellow-traveler Benjamin Spock, remarkable for his fortitude and militancy in countless civil disobedience and other public protests. These and other physicians were also ardent supporters of "solidarity" with the successful socialist revolutions in China, Cuba, Nicaragua, and Vietnam, and with the people's liberation struggles in Central America, South America, and Southern Africa. Some of the solidarity organizations had a medical/health focus (e.g., the U.S.-Cuba Health Exchange and the Committee for Health in Southern Africa), while others were broad (e.g., the U.S.-China People's Friendship Association). The educational aspect of this solidarity work highlighted socialized health systems as well as the people's health needs, and prioritized visits of health professionals in both directions. These organizations also raised substantial amounts of money for medicines, medical/surgical supplies, and professional textbooks and journals; in a few instances they funded the construction of a clinic or hospital.

In the eighties, the AIDS epidemic engendered a very militant movement of people with AIDS, initially gay men, mainly white and middle/upper class; although rarely grounded in Left theory or practice, they admired and built on the confrontational "in-the-streets" style of student and civil rights activists of the previous decades. The people-with-AIDS movement, led by the AIDS Coalition to Unleash Power, exposed and fought the "doctor knows best" ideology, the elitism, sexism, and racism of medical science, the homophobic-based neglect of the epidemic by government and politicians, and the greed of the pharmaceutical companies. It forced the mainstream to accept models of patient care and medical research in which the customary power relationship between those needing care and cures and those providing care or doing research were greatly altered, giving much more power to those needing care and cures.

The full impact of the radical challenges to the health field from the women's health movement and the people-with-AIDS movement has yet to be experienced. Current Left political organizations and parties continue to count on the day when the federal government will take responsibility for assuring medical care as a right for all people. Although that day does not seem imminent, considerable effort to hasten it along is being exerted by activist health workers, mainly in several left-leaning physician organizations; the Physicians for a National Health Program, for example, is vigorous nationwide and quite influential among physicians.

HELLMAN, LILLIAN (1907-1984). When Lillian Hellman met Dashiell Hammett in 1930, she was unknown and he was a famous writer. At the age of twenty-three, she had sold a few short stories to obscure magazines and worked as a press agent and a reader for a publishing house, various theatrical producers, and, concurrently, for Metro-Goldwyn-Mayer Studios. Hammett at thirty-six was already started on his final book but finding it difficult to write or to stop drinking.

By 1934, that last book, The Thin Man, was out, but his writing block had grown so severe he never functioned professionally again. Her play The Children's Hour, about the evil power of slander against two women accused of lesbianism, was banned in several cities but was a Broadway hit, and she was on her way to becoming the leading writer of her sex in the English-speaking theater.

By her own testimony, Hammett was not only her love and political mentor but a critical and editorial influence on her plays. A Marxist and professed Communist, he guided her from a loose set of liberal leanings to an understanding of historical materialism and an appreciation of the role of the Soviet Union in the struggle for collective security against Hitlerism. In a sense, the intelligence and energy he had put into creative writing and political activism was diverted into her career as a playwright and celebrity spokesperson for the American Left.

After The Children's Hour, she wrote Days to Come, a drama about a strike. Then traveling to Spain, she co-wrote Joris Ivens's movie The Spanish Earth, returning to the United States to campaign for Loyalist aid. The Little Foxes, a drama about southern money and power, was an enormous success. Her most political play, Watch on the Rhine, which treated a German antifascist refugee and his encounter with a middle-class American family, won the New York Drama Circle Critics Award. Among her other works, The Searching Wind treated the appeasement of Hitler before the war. After Hammett's death in 1961, she wrote only one play, My Mother, My Father and Me.

Instead, she showed her brilliance as a prose writer in the volumes of reminiscence An Unfinished Woman, Pentimento, and Scoundrel Time, all based upon real events but reworked for dramatic effect, which Hellman always preferred to the literal truth. Her "Julia" story was rendered into a film starring Jane Fonda. A number of plays were also adapted for films, most notably Watch on the Rhine.

Perhaps her most memorable line was not in any of her plays but in the letter she addressed to the House Committee on Un-American Activities to explain why she would not talk about other people in her testimony. "I cannot and will not cut my conscience to fit this year's fashions."

HERBST, JOSEPHINE (1892–1969). An important Left journalist of the 1930s, Josephine Herbst was one of the most accomplished of the "proletarian novelists" around the peripheries of the Communist Party and Popular Front. Born in Sioux City, Iowa, and raised in near-poverty, Herbst attended several colleges between periods of work, and graduated from the University of California at Berkeley in 1919. That year she moved to New York City, and almost immediately became involved in the circles around the Liberator and, later, the New Masses.

Following an unhappy affair and near-breakdown, Herbst moved to Berlin in 1922 to pursue full-time writing. There she met a writer she later married, John Herrmann, an alcoholic eight years her junior. By 1928 she settled down in Erwinna, Pennsylvania, which became her lifelong residence and the site of her most productive literary work.

Shifting from the Hemingway orientation of the 1920s that marked her first two novels, Herbst took up proletarian literature for her monumental trilogy Pity Is Not Enough (1933), The Executioner Awaits (1934), and Rope of Gold (1939). These family sagas from the Civil War to the then-present were widely recognized at the same time as manifesting the maturity, the breadth, and the careful style lacking in nearly all other full-scale proletarian literary efforts.

As her marriage to Herrmann broke up in the middle 1930s, Herbst also became a noted journalist on such topics as the farm crisis, the Cuban uprising, German antifascism, and the civil war in Spain. Especially as a writer for the New Masses, she drew wide praise. Her experience in Spain in 1937 left her in personal despair and distanced her from formal political involvement. (Although she had never joined the Communist Party, she had been very close for several years.)

From 1942, when she lost a government job for political reasons, to 1954, she endured government harassment in a variety of forms. Her further literary work meanwhile received scarce recognition. Although little more was published before her death, she began to enjoy a literary revival, with her own Pennsylvania home an informal center for once-radical writers such as Alfred Kazin and Saul Bellow.

HERNDON CASE. In 1932, Angelo Herndon, a nineteen-year-old black Communist, helped organize an interracial hunger march in Atlanta, Georgia. Less than a week later, Atlanta police arrested him when picking up mail at his post office box, held him without bail, and charged him with “attempting to incite insurrection,” a capital crime.

Thus began one of the legal causes célèbres of the 1930s. The International Labor Defense, the Communist Party’s legal defense arm, took charge of Herndon’s defense, retaining a young black Atlanta attorney, Benjamin J. Davis, to try his case. Davis challenged the constitutionality of Atlanta’s jury and grand jury systems (which excluded blacks), the constitutionality of the insurrection law, and the employment of racial epithets in court by prosecutor and judge, but his arguments were swept aside by a white-supremacist judge and jury who convicted Herndon and sentenced him to twenty years on a chain gang. The outrageous conduct of the judge, as well as the extraordinary severity of the sentence (for organizing a peaceful demonstration), prompted a nationwide movement in Herndon’s behalf, including black organizations, labor unions, and religious groups as well as the Communist Party.

Appeals on the Herndon case lasted for four years. Finally, in 1937, the Supreme Court, by a five-to-four margin, ruled that the Georgia insurrection law was unconstitutional and secured Herndon’s release. The trial, the appeals, and the movement in Herndon’s defense helped educate the northern public about abuses in the southern legal system and strengthen liberal opposition to racial segregation.

HEYWOOD, EZRA (1829–1893). An individualist anarchist, Ezra Heywood participated in the abolitionist, labor reform, and free-love movements of the nineteenth century. He lived in Princeton, Massachusetts, with Angela Tilton Heywood, his companion for twenty-eight years. A Garrisonian nonresistant, Heywood broke with the abolitionists over their support for the Civil War. Subsequently he embraced the anarchist philosophy of Josiah Warren. Branding marriage a form of slavery, Heywood was a key figure in the postwar free-love movement, which called for social, political, economic, and sexual equality between men and women.

Heywood organized reform leagues and created the Cooperative Publishing Company. His writings addressed labor reform, free love, temperance, and free speech. From 1872 to 1893, Heywood edited and published a monthly paper, the Word. Published in 1876, Heywood’s Cupid’s Yokes denounced marriage, and the Victorian enforcer of virtue, Anthony Comstock, arrested him for selling it. Heywood only became a more aggressive advocate of woman’s rights, including her right to birth control. Comstock was responsible for arresting Heywood five times for various obscenity charges. Two of those arrests resulted in prison terms.

HICKS, GRANVILLE (1901–1982). One of the most influential practitioners of the Marxist literary criticism developed in this country during the 1930s, Granville Hicks was ideologically located somewhere between the hard-line leftism of Michael Gold and the liberal Marxism of Edmund Wilson and Malcolm Cowley. He tried to practice a criticism that brought social and economic questions to the center of the critical debate.

Hicks studied theology for two years after graduating from Harvard in 1923, but abandoned his plans to become a minister, returned to Harvard for an M.A. in English, and took a job at Rensselaer Polytechnic Institute, where he taught until he was fired for political reasons in 1935. He joined the Communist Party in the early 1930s, became the literary editor of the New Masses when it reappeared as a weekly on 2 January 1934, and helped to make it one of the best Left literary journals of the 1930s. During this crucial period, in addition to his numerous articles and reviews, Hicks produced three important books: The Great Tradition: An Interpretation of American Literature since the Civil War (1933; rev. ed., 1935), a biography of John Reed (1936), and Figures of Transition: A Study of British Literature at the End of the Nineteenth Century (1939). Although he quit the Communist Party after the Hitler-Stalin Pact of 1939 and later repudiated his own Marxism in autobiographical works such as Part of the Truth (1965), Hicks remained a literary critic until 1977—most notably as a literary columnist for the New Leader during the 1950s and the Saturday Review during the 1960s—and his Marxist orientation was one important underpinning of his later critical practice.

Hicks's limitations as a Marxist critic are clear. His Marxism was often puritanical in bias and mechanical in application. Worse, by demanding that literature be used as a class weapon, he limited its range and possibilities. "The critic will demand," he wrote in "The Crisis in American Criticism" (1933), "that the author's point of view be that of the vanguard of the proletariat." On the other hand, his support for proletarian literature helped encourage some of the younger writers who emerged in the 1930s, and his discovery of a social-realist past (in the literature of Whitman, Sinclair, London, et al.) gave them an American literary tradition to join.

HIGHLANDER RESEARCH AND EDUCATION CENTER.

Highlander Folk School opened in a two-story frame house in Monteagle, Tennessee, on 1 November 1932 as a residential adult-education center. Since that time, uncounseled southern activists from labor, the civil rights movement, and Appalachian mining or land struggles have used the school to learn from each other's experience demanding social change. Highlander's purposes, the people who have learned and taught there, and the radically different educational philosophy undergirding what is taught and how, as well as its durability despite attack from government and allies, place Highlander uniquely within, yet apart from, the American Left.

Founded by southerners who met at Union Theological Seminary at a time when the nation's economic and political institutions were in disarray, Highlander was one of nearly 250 operating labor colleges. Many had been started by the Socialist Party, unions, immigrants, or the Industrial Workers of the World to counteract the failures of public education, or to train new leadership. From the start, Highlander's purposes differed in part. For Myles Horton, Elizabeth Hawes, James A. Dombrowski, Rupert Hampton, and Malcolm Chisholm, the founders, the school's ideology welled up from people rather than party, platform, or proclamation. They believed poor people themselves knew best what they needed to learn, and when, and could determine their own goals. Music, games, washing dishes, making a play, and traditional storytelling were as valued for their educative outcomes as books or lectures. Doing these activities together, the founders reasoned, was the means by which the poor learned the power of unity and organization, as well as the capacity of self. And when enough "students," all deliberately recruited from "the underclass," put these lessons into action, the founders' vision for a socialist revolution would be realized.

Barney Graham, leader of miners striking for union recognition in Wilder, Tennessee, was one of the first persons to shape Highlander's work and history. Besides leading the strike, Graham had been teaching Highlander students. He was shot to death by thugs on 2 May 1933. Other Highlander students experienced nonfatal intimidation while participating in historic conflicts: Paul Christopher, Esau Jenkins, Rosa Parks, Buck Maggard, Pedro Arculeta, Fanny Lou Hamer, Florence Reece, Stokely Carmichael.

With these and other equally determined activists coming and going, Highlander inevitably attracted both loyal support and fierce reaction. Perhaps as many as three thousand persons, and a handful of foundations, have kept the school in operating cash. Others, however, including the state of Tennessee, Ku Klux Klan, the Federal Bureau of Investigation, the Internal Revenue Service, and several congressional investigating committees have tried to shut the school, sometimes with temporary success.

Highlander Folk School was raided and padlocked in 1959 during an interracial voter-education workshop. After a long, losing court fight, Highlander Research and Education Center opened in an abandoned warehouse in Knoxville, Tennessee, operating there until the city used its power of eminent domain to seize the property. The school moved to New Market, Tennessee, its present location, in 1972. Internal conflicts have gripped Highlander from time to time, and were equally threatening, especially as the region's two principal social movements—the union drives of the thirties and the civil rights movement of the fifties and sixties—ebbed or welled. Communists have spurned the school as reformist. Many unions repudiated Highlander as Communist controlled.

The school's pedagogy, which predates what has come to be called the Freirian model, holds that education is a tool for social change, rather than the means by which labor and power relationships are reproduced in a capitalist wage and industrial system. To some extent, Highlander's original aims have been, and continue to be accomplished. New leaders have forged significant changes through unions, voter drives, music festivals, blockading strip mines, or taking polluters water they poisoned. The second aim, social reconstruction ending exploitation of labor, race, and gender, as yet eludes the still-functioning school.

Highlander outlived its peers, including many of the better known and connected among them, such as Brookwood, the Work People's College, and Commonwealth. Its unexpected survival for over a half-century may be its most important achievement.

HILL, JOE (1879–1915). The most popular songwriter and most celebrated martyr of the Industrial Workers of the World (IWW), as well as one of the union's early cartoonists, Joe Hill was also very much a hobo and "lone wolf" and, as such, has long been the despair of biographers, for, as is generally true of migratory workers, very little is known of his life. He was born Joel Emmanuel Hägglund in Gävle, Sweden, of Swedish Lutheran parents. As a child, after his father's death in 1887, he worked in a rope factory and as fireman on a steam-powered crane. In his teens he was stricken with tuberculosis and hospitalized in Stockholm. In 1902 he emigrated to the United States.

For the next eight years almost nothing is known of his doings except that he made his way across the continent working as a porter, harvest-hand, long-shoreman, and at various other odd jobs. He lived in New York for a year, working on the Bowery, and in the course of his wanderings spent time in Philadelphia, Pittsburgh, Cleveland, Chicago, the Dakotas, Spokane, and Portland. In 1906 he wrote a firsthand account of the San Francisco earthquake that was published in his hometown paper in Sweden.

Exactly when and where Hill joined the IWW is not known (the union's records were seized by the U.S. government in 1918 and later destroyed), but it seems to have been sometime in 1910, and possibly in San Pedro, California, where he lived for several years and served for a time as secretary of the IWW local. In 1911 he and other Wobblies took part in the Mexican Revolution in Baja, California, and in the following year we find him in British Columbia writing songs for strikers on the Canadian Northern railroad.

Hill contributed to the IWW cause primarily as wordsmith and artist rather than as organizer or soapboxer. He loved to draw (his home in Sweden, now the Joe Hill Museum, has an oil painting that he did as a young man), and his cartoons show that he carefully studied the work of such pioneering exemplars of the cartoonist's art as F. B. Oppen and Rube Goldberg. He played piano, accordion, guitar, and banjo, and clearly enjoyed the popular music of his day. He also had a natural ear for slang that gave his lyrics an added "punch." The few articles that he wrote—such as his celebration of Wobbly sabotage, "How to Make Work for the Unemployed," published in the International Socialist Review in December 1914—reveal the same qualities evidenced in his songs and cartoons: a vivid, overriding hobo humor, and an extraordinary ability to express revolutionary ideas with a simplicity as compelling as it is appealing. Hill's first contribution to the IWW press, a letter to the editor, appeared in August 1910. His first song published in the IWW's Little Red Songbook, "The Preacher and the Slave," appeared in 1911. Another edition of the songbook, in 1912, carried his first Wobbly cartoon.

By mid-1913 Hill was one of the better-known Wobs, admired in IWW halls and hobo jungles and on picket lines throughout the land above all for his rousing "songs to fan the flames of discontent." Hill's songs, raucously comic ballads, mostly sung to popular tunes ("Casey Jones, the Union Scab," "Mr. Block," "Scissor Bill") or revolutionary rewrites of old hymns ("The Preacher and the Slave," "There Is Power in a Union," "Stung Right") quickly became Wobbly favorites; the union's 1913 songbook contains many more songs by Hill than by anyone else.

His growing reputation as leading IWW bard did not go unnoticed by those he and his fellow workers recognized as their class enemies. In January 1914 he was arrested near Salt Lake City, Utah, and charged with a murder that had taken place in the city several days earlier. Hill had no criminal record, no connection with the victim, no motive for the killing; moreover, none of several witnesses identified him as the man leaving the scene of the crime. But the police chief of San Pedro, who had once held Hill for thirty days on a charge of "vagrancy" because of his efforts to organize longshoremen, wrote to the Salt Lake police: "I see you have under arrest for murder one Joseph Hillstrom. You have the right man. . . . He is certainly an undesirable citizen. He is somewhat of a musician and writer of songs for the IWW songbook." Utah

"public opinion," dominated by the Copper Trust and the notoriously anti-union Mormon church, followed this cue in a case that nearly all historians have come to recognize as one of the worst travesties of justice in American history. After a trial riddled with biased rulings, suppression of important defense evidence, and other violations of judicial procedure characteristic of cases involving labor radicals, Hill was convicted and sentenced to death.

The IWW's vigorous defense campaign, exposing the "frame-up" and demanding a new trial, won enormous support. The American Federation of Labor, the Swedish government, and even President Woodrow Wilson intervened on Hill's behalf, but to no avail. On 19 November 1915, Hill faced the firing squad.

Shortly before his execution he wired IWW secretary-treasurer Bill Haywood, in Chicago: "Don't waste any time in mourning—organize." In shortened form—"Don't mourn, organize!"—these became the most famous "famous last words" in U.S. labor history, and remain a battle cry not only for militant labor but for oppressed people throughout the world.

Many thousands had to be turned away from Hill's funeral service in Chicago, and the throngs who filled the streets for blocks en route to the cemetery, lustily singing his songs all the way, made up one of the largest funeral processions in the city's history. After his cremation, his ashes were divided into small printed packets and sent to fellow workers in every state except Utah, and in dozens of foreign countries, to be scattered on May Day 1916.

Hill was already something of a legend in the last months of his life, and his legend—as the Wobbly poet, the poet-organizer, and "the man who never died," after a line in a 1925 poetic tribute by Alfred Hayes—has steadily grown ever since. Honored in novels, short stories, films, plays, poems, songs, and the plastic arts, as well as in several biographies and collections of his work, he has long since entered popular consciousness as a folk hero like Davy Crockett and Johnny Appleseed. It was above all as a songwriter, however, that Joe Hill was best known in his lifetime, and his songs—recorded by many well-known singers and still popular on picket lines today—remain his greatest legacy.

HILLQUIT, MORRIS (1869–1933). Popularizer, politician, consummate adapter of European-style social democracy to Jewish American life, Morris Hillquit played a leading role in the Socialist Party from its formation until his death. Born Moses Hillkowitz in Riga, Latvia, of assimilated Jewish parents, he attained an exceptional education for a Jew in the Russian school system, and immigrated to the United States in 1885. Working in the garment trades of the Lower East Side, he joined the Socialist Labor Party (SLP) and soon helped to organize the United Hebrew Trades. Less a journalist than an organizational talent, he was named manager of the weekly Arbeter Zeitung, and meanwhile studied law at New York University. Passing the New York bar exam in 1893, Hillquit became the most prominent of a handful (later, a far larger number) of Jewish former workers turned lawyers who remained loyal to the socialist cause. In the following decades, he would handle many hundreds of workers' injury or civil liberty cases with only the smallest of fees.

Meanwhile, he emerged as an orthodox Marxist in his own terms, a "centrist" in the 1890s political lineup of loyal De Leon followers on the Left and independent socialists (mostly but not entirely native-born) on the Right. This perspective placed him roughly with Karl Kautsky of the German Social Democrats, against Bernstein's "revisionism," which denied the efficacy of socialist orthodoxy, but also more forcefully against the proponents of the general strike or other mass direct actions. Officially taking the name "Hillquit" in 1897, he led the "Kangaroo" rebellion within the SLP two years later, splitting the organization roughly in half. Hillquit dominated this dissident SLP in strategy and in theoretical perspectives. Along with other leaders of his group, he bargained intensively before agreeing to unity with Eugene Debs's Social Democracy of America in 1901. Through that agreement, he emerged a foremost leader of the New Yorkers in the new Socialist Party.

According to his critics, Hillquit's factional maneuvering did not cease, but only changed form. He reluctantly accepted the titular party leadership of Eugene Debs, and sought occasionally to put up other candidates for the presidential race. He was an inveterate foe of the Industrial Workers of the World and of the Socialist Labor faction that urged labor activity independent of the American Federation of Labor. He led the bitter internal party struggle to renounce the theory of sabotage, precipitating William D. Haywood's removal from the National Executive Committee and the abandonment of the party by many revolutionary socialists. On the other hand, Hillquit had personally defended Haywood in the 1907 Steunenberg case, and he earnestly opposed, at Socialist International congresses and elsewhere, efforts by Milwaukee leader Victor Berger to urge immigration restriction to curry favor with the American Federation of Labor and supposedly raise the living standard of American workers. He also generally resisted calls for socialists to merge their efforts into a labor party. In the war years, Hillquit took a courageous anti-military position, doing much to shape the official party posture and the extraparty anti-war groups such as the People's Council of America.

As a public figure, Hillquit proved an attractive political candidate, if not the equal of Berger or of Meyer London. His runs for Congress in 1906 and 1908, although unsuccessful, garnered wide public interest (including the endorsement of noted liberal and radical intellectuals) and helped lay the basis for London's victory in the Lower East Side a few years later. Hillquit's New York City mayoral candidacy in 1918 was widely viewed as a referendum on the First World War, his more than twenty percent of the total vote a strong signal to Washington and his forceful campaign an inestimable assistance to numerous Socialist candidates elected to New York city and state offices that year.

Hillquit also emerged, in these years, as the earliest official historian of American socialism, and as one of its prime popularizers of socialist theory. The History of Socialism in the United States, published in 1903 and revised for a new edition in 1910, had the memoirist's touch, but also a preliminary scholarly dedication. His primary perspective, dividing early "utopian" from later "scientific" socialism, was consistent with Friedrich Engels's brief Socialism, Utopian and Scientific. Rather unfair to his factional opponents (especially De Leon), the book was in many other respects a remarkable intellectual achievement for its time. Hillquit's 1912 theoretical study Socialism in Theory and Practice, on the other hand, was not greatly different from or superior to a half-dozen other contemporary American efforts along the same lines. Like the others, it had its following, mainly among Americanizing Jewish immigrants.

Hillquit suffered his major and permanent political defeat with the Russian Revolution's impetus to American Bolshevism, and with the ascendancy of a new generation of Jewish radicals no longer sharing his calm confidence in socialism's inevitable, peaceful, parliamentary advance. In another sense, the defection of liberal middle classes from municipal socialism to mainstream politicians and to Woodrow Wilson's war policies had already restricted Hillquit to the Jewish ghetto. Stricken by tuberculosis in the late 1910s, Hillquit hoped in vain for an amicable separation of Communists and Socialists. Following the split, and following many savage verbal attacks upon him by the Communists (including Lenin himself), Hillquit became bitterly anticommunist, penning in 1923 From Marx to Lenin as a formal denunciation of Leninism.

Hillquit meanwhile had become the reigning senior figure in the reduced Socialist Party. He led the Socialists in supporting Robert La Follette's 1924 Progressive campaign, and once again in nominating Norman Thomas as a titular leader to fill Debs's shoes. A partial revival of the Socialist Party, ironically, found many critics regarding Hillquit as an obstacle to the successful Americanization of the movement. After a political brawl, he won a Pyrrhic victory in 1932, retaining his post as national chairman but helping to set the stage for the ultimate Socialist faction fight of 1935 in which his fellow "Old Guard" activists withdrew themselves and most New York socialist institutions from the party. In a last electoral effort for mayor in 1933, campaigning heroically despite his illness, Hillquit won a quarter-million votes. A few months later, his autobiography, Loose Leaves from a Busy Life, appeared, an anecdotal treatment not destined to become a classic of American socialist literature. Almost within weeks, he died of tuberculosis.

HINTON, RICHARD JOSIAH (1830-1901). The relationship of pre-Civil War radicalism with its focus on slavery and post-Civil War radicalism with its focus on labor and socialism can be traced through the life of Richard Josiah Hinton. Born on 25 November 1830, the son of a London stonemason, Hinton was apprenticed to both the craft and trade unionism. Soon after his twentieth birthday he sailed for America, landing in New York where his evening school education and countrymen's ties drew him to the printing trade. A talented student, Hinton continued his earlier interest in geology and geography at the Columbia School of Mines and dabbled in medicine as well. He soon rose from the compositor's bench to the newsroom and began his lifelong career as a journalist.

His first political commitments were formed by his hatred of slavery. He was an early organizer of the Republican Party. Resolved that more was necessary to defeat slavery than ink or ballots, Hinton went west to support the Kansas free-state forces in 1856. Before departing he was given a Sharps rifle by New York abolitionists Theodore Parker and Henry Channing, though he kept his pen as well, serving as correspondent for both the Chicago Tribune and the Boston Traveler. Hinton's hyperbolic report of the sackings of Lawrence galvanized northern indignation and presented the Republicans with the issue of "Bleeding Kansas."

During his days with the free Kansas forces Hinton first met John Brown. The two became friends and Brown confided his plans for a guerrilla invasion of the South. Believing the scheme impossible, Hinton did not volunteer to go along, though he remained a behind-the-scenes supporter throughout. When Brown's raid failed and he awaited the gallows, Hinton conspired with other radicals to free him. He reconnoitered federal facilities, planned safe houses and routes of flight, and with the help of his friend, the socialist editor Adolf Douai, he recruited several German-American Forty-Eighters with military expertise. The odds were daunting, Hinton reportedly had difficulty keeping secrets, and the plan was eventually called off.

Like other radical abolitionists of his day, Hinton's ideal of emancipation encompassed far more than freedom from bondage; he was a consistent advocate of color-blind equality. These views earned him the first commission to recruit and command black soldiers in the Civil War. During his four-year tour of duty, Hinton denounced the discriminatory treatment of the black men in his regiment who were passed over for promotion because of their color. He also helped found the Kansas Emancipation League, which aided the more than four thousand slaves who fled to Kansas. Such a wartime résumé fitted him well for his appointment in 1865 as acting inspector general of the Freedmen's Bureau. A few years later he distinguished himself as one of the few labor journalists who supported free Chinese immigration to the United States and denounced the intolerance with which they were received in the Pacific states.

With the end of the war and the rise of a new labor movement in its wake, Hinton covered the conventions of the National Labor Union for several papers. In 1867 while touring the cooperatives of Europe, he was invited to address the General Council of the International Workingmen's Association in London. Deeply impressed with the socialist program of the First International, Hinton went on to help organize a secret section of the party composed mostly of federal government employees in Washington, D.C. In 1872, Hinton and the rest of the English-speaking "Yankee" sections were purged from the party by German-American Marxists who viewed their feminist and civil libertarian ideals as petit bourgeois reformism.

In spite of these bitter factional battles that soon destroyed the First International in America, Hinton retained his socialist principles. He joined the Socialist Labor Party and emerged as one of the party's leaders in New York City during the Henry George campaign of 1886 and was appointed managing editor of the New York Leader after the socialists wrested it away from the single-taxers. Hinton's refusal to surrender his equalitarian ideals to socialist expediency soon got him in trouble again. In 1893, the same year he published a biography of John Brown (John Brown and His Men), he was thrown out of a socialist party for a second time, in this instance for allegedly campaigning for a Republican candidate.

Hinton found a new leftist niche when Eugene Debs announced his conversion to socialism and the formation of the Social Democracy from the remnants of the American Railway Union. Within that organization the major fight was between the advocates of political action and the proponents of "colonization," a plan to plant a cooperative colony in some sparsely populated western state. Hinton was appointed chair of the Colonization Commission and wrote a column for the party organ, the Social Democrat. After spending months in 1896 searching for a suitable homesite for the first cooperative commonwealth, Hinton and his fellow commissioners surprised the party when they announced that their preferred site lay in Tennessee. In the end, the scheme failed to secure the backing of the party and floundered. Undaunted in his retiring years, Hinton helped his old comrade from the Yankee First International, Joshua Ingalls, to set up a cooperative colony at Henderson Bay, Washington, that grew to include 110 members.

HISS CASE. In his book Six Crises, Richard Nixon wrote that had it not been for the Alger Hiss case, he would never have made it to the White House. He rightly observed, "My name, my reputation, and my career were ever to be linked with the decisions I made and the actions I took in that case, as a thirty-five-year-old freshman Congressman in 1948."

The Hiss case erupted on the consciousness of the American people just as the first postwar presidential campaign was getting underway. Beginning in August, the Republican-controlled House Committee on Un-American Activities (HUAC) started a series of hearings that featured ex-Communists Elizabeth Bentley and Whittaker Chambers. Their stories were difficult to disentangle and between them they named scores of former New Deal officials they claimed to have known or known of as Communists. The testimony of the forty-seven-year-old Chambers would have enormous political repercussions. He stated that from 1924 until 1937 he had been a functionary of the Communist Party (CP). He named Alger Hiss, Hiss's younger brother Donald (at that time law partner of future secretary of state Dean Acheson), and six other former New Deal officials as having been part of a secret underground group organized in the 1930s by the CP. Chambers consistently testified that he and the group never engaged in espionage. He said, "I should perhaps make the point that these people were specifically not wanted to act as sources of information."

With the exception of the Hiss brothers, the individuals named by Chambers were publicly known as left-wing activists. Lee Pressman, John Abt, Nathan Witt, Victor Perlo, and Charles Kramer were officials of the newly formed Progressive Party, and Henry Collins was executive secretary of the American-Russian Institute. All six claimed their Fifth Amendment privilege and refused to testify. Donald Hiss appeared before HUAC to deny Chambers's allegations and to state that the only organizations he had ever belonged to were the Boy Scouts of America and the Maryland Yacht Club.

The most prominent of those named was Alger Hiss, then forty-four years old and president of the Carnegie Endowment for International Peace. Previously Hiss had worked as staff counsel for the Agricultural Adjustment Administration and for the Nye Senate committee investigating the munitions industry; this had been followed by service with the State Department, beginning in 1936. Hiss had gone to the "Big Three" Yalta conference in 1945 as an adviser to President Franklin D. Roosevelt and had capped his government service by presiding over the founding session of the United Nations as its general secretary. Hiss appeared before HUAC at his own request and denied categorically the Chambers allegations. He denied having known anyone named Whittaker Chambers and he testified that he had never been a member or sympathizer of the CP. Shown a newspaper photo of his accuser, a man he was not alleged to have seen in more than a decade, Hiss requested a face-to-face confrontation. Richard M. Nixon, then a freshman Republican congressman, volunteered to chair a special subcommittee to follow through on the identification. Truman had already held a 5 August press conference in which he berated the HUAC hearings as a Republican Party election-year ploy and a "red herring" to distract the public's attention from the "do-nothing" record of the Republican-controlled Eightieth Congress.

Using leaks and statements to the press, Nixon quickly managed to make the dispute between Hiss, president of the nation's leading proponent for world peace, and Chambers, a senior editor of Time, the number-one news story of the day. When the confrontation requested by Hiss finally took place on 17 August, Hiss identified his accuser as a free-lance writer who had identified himself as George Crosley. Hiss stated that Crosley had said he was planning to write about the munitions-industry hearings and in 1935 had sublet an apartment from Hiss for six weeks.

The Nixon subcommittee's highly partisan activities relating to what it called a "spy" case investigation were published as Hearings regarding Communist Espionage in the United States. The Nixon report stated that the committee had secured from Chambers "testimony regarding Communist espionage activities within the Government" and that its "investigation of espionage" had been "hampered at every turn" by the Truman administration.

The Hiss-Chambers contradictions got into court following statements made by Chambers at the end of August on a Meet the Press network radio program. Chambers repeated the charge that he had worked with Hiss in a secret underground CP apparatus that had no espionage function. He said its purpose was to influence policy by getting Communists into key places in government. Unlike his HUAC testimony, these remarks did not enjoy congressional immunity. Hiss filed a $75,000 lawsuit for slander in a federal district court in Baltimore.

The pretrial sworn depositions of this libel suit (abandoned after Hiss was indicted for perjury) established as a sham every essential element in Chambers's accusations. Chambers was not even able to offer any proof that he had ever been a CP member, much less a full-time employee. For three of the thirteen years he claimed to have been a full-time Communist functionary, Chambers had been employed full-time as a twenty-dollar-a-week clerk in the New York Public Library (1924–1927), and for another two years he had been a salesclerk in secondhand bookstores. Another full year had been spent in bed! Chambers testified that the suicide of his younger brother had been so devastating that he had been totally immobilized for a full twelve months. Before being hired by Time in 1939, Chambers also had spent considerable time as a translator, beginning with his much-praised translation of Felix Salten's Bambi from German into English for Simon and Schuster in 1927. Books in Print lists fourteen full-length books translated by Chambers from French or German into English during the next decade—the very period he had testified before HUAC that his only employment was as a CP functionary.

Further complicating his testimony was the fact that Chambers had described himself as an “enemy” of the Party from 1929 to 1932 and an ally of its opponents. His only verifiable links to the Left were four short stories published in New Masses in 1931 and a twenty-line poem in the Sunday Worker in 1926. Other poems and short stories were published in the Nation, Poetry, Two Worlds, and small university magazines. In two days of pretrial dispositions, Chambers said he had been ordered into the CP underground after his short stories were published in New Masses. Except for Hiss and Max Bedacht, a longtime CP official whose expulsion from the Party had recently been reported, his only associates in the underground during his claimed five years of such service, 1932–1937, were unidentifiable fellow conspirators who had no last names.

At the end of two days of examination by Hiss's lawyer, Chambers was so overcome “with despair” that he contemplated killing himself by taking cyanide, a disclosure made in his 1952 autobiography, Witness. Equally depressing for Chambers and for Nixon, HUAC, the Republican Party, Time, and others who had championed and exploited his story was the upset victory of Harry Truman in the November elections. Within days there was an indictment on payroll charges of J. Parnell Thomas, chairman of HUAC. Two months later, Thomas was in a federal prison.

On 17 November, after a twelve-day recess in the libel suit, Chambers returned for more questioning. He now told a new tale. He produced sixty-five typewritten sheets, dated from January to April 1938, that he identified as copies of State Department documents that “I had forgotten I had.” He said they had been given to him by Alger Hiss to be handed over to a Russian agent. At Hiss's insistence all of this material was immediately turned over to the Justice Department. The attorney general asked both sides to say nothing for two weeks until the new development was investigated. One thing was now certain: Chambers had committed perjury. Either his HUAC testimony that he and Hiss had been part of a CP network that did not engage in espionage or his new testimony to the contrary must have been false.

The next public development was an announcement in December that created more headlines than anything HUAC had ever done in its ten-year history. On the evening of 2 December Whittaker Chambers had retrieved from a pumpkin patch on his farm in Westminster, Maryland, five rolls of microfilms (thereafter dubbed the “pumpkin papers”). These were described as “secret” State Department material handed over to Whittaker Chambers by a member of the CP underground. As far as the public could tell, the films verified the spy charges spearheaded by Congressman Nixon and hammered away at by the Republicans in the just-completed presidential campaign. Nixon appeared to be vacationing in the Caribbean. From shipboard he radiogrammed, “Will reopen hearings if necessary to prevent Justice Department coverup.” On 5 December, the front page of newspapers throughout the country showed a Navy seaplane picking up Nixon in the Caribbean and rushing him back to Washington, where, before examining any new evidence, he told the press that the new materials proved “once and for all that where you have a Communist you have an espionage agent.” What only became public after Hiss had gone to prison was that Nixon had visited Chambers in Westminster a number of times while Chambers was preparing his libel-suit defense. Nixon had also gone to see chambers at the farm the night before Chambers turned over the five rolls of film to HUAC investigators. Nixon had gone back to Washington, written out a subpoena, and then flown to Florida in order to be thousands of miles away on board a vacation ship when the “discovery” of the pumpkin papers was announced.

The Justice Department reconvened a grand jury in New York, but in Washington the Nixon subcommittee held its own hearings. In a two-week attack against the Truman Justice Department, Nixon charged the Democrats were planning to cover up what he called “the most serious series of treasonable activities . . . in the history of America." Front-page photos showed Nixon standing alongside a four-foot-high pile of documents processed from the Chambers films. Nixon would not allow the Justice Department personnel, grand jurors, a federal judge, the press, or anyone to examine this "shocking" evidence for themselves. A quarter of a century later when the films were obtained through the Freedom of Information Act, they were revealed to be information relating to Navy rafts, life preservers, and fire extinguishers. The films were of documents from the Bureau of Standards which had been available to the general public at its library.

On 15 December, following a steady barrage of Nixon-generated headlines about treason, the grand jury indicted Alger Hiss for perjury. The first trial lasted seven weeks, from May to July 1949, and ended in a mistrial. Immediately after the decision, Judge Samuel H. Kaufman, a Truman appointee, was subject to a week-long Nixon campaign berating him as "prejudiced for the defense." Nixon called for Kaufman's impeachment. The second trial would be presided over by a seventy-year-old judge who had been appointed by Calvin Coolidge.

Setting the stage for Senator Joseph McCarthy's hallmark cry "twenty years of treason" was the charge leveled by Nixon that the Democrats under the New Deal of Roosevelt and the Fair Deal of Truman were "soft" on Communism. Once the second Hiss trial returned a guilty verdict, there was no restraining the freshman congressman who had made these allegations when no evidentiary justification existed. On 26 January 1950, the day after Hiss was sentenced, Nixon delivered a four-hour House speech that he titled "Lessons of the Hiss Case." The high point of the address was his accusation that in September 1939 Chambers had gone to Washington and presented evidence of espionage and the government had done nothing. Nixon put it thus: ". . . concrete information concerning Communist espionage activities in this country was in the hands of both President Roosevelt and President Truman and still no action was taken." While not true, this was accepted without challenge in many quarters.

In the face of the supposedly proven Communist menace, the existence of treasonous activity, and government laxity in national security matters, Nixon proposed a five-point program. He asked for (1) new legislation to deal with internal security and new types of espionage, (2) unqualified support for the Federal Bureau of Investigation and its chief, J. Edgar Hoover, (3) total support, authority, and funds for congressional investigations of subversives, (4) complete overhaul of the loyalty program so that all doubts could be resolved in favor of the government, and (5) an educational effort to alert the American people to the dangers of the Communist conspiracy.

Nixon himself characterized this speech as the most important of his pre-White House career. The Republican Party published the full text of it in a booklet titled The Hiss Case, as the principal campaign document in Nixon's 1952 crusade for the vice presidency. Most significant of all, perhaps, is that the speech provided a point-by-point—and in many passages a word-for-word—agenda for Senator Joseph R. McCarthy, who began his overnight emergence just two weeks later, in a Lincoln Day speech at Wheeling, West Virginia. Forty years later documents presented in connection with Hiss's post-trial appeals have established Nixon's duplicity.

HISTORICAL MATERIALISM designates what Marx himself called the "guiding thread" of Marxist studies. Unlike most previous theories of society, this one considers the means of production to be the fundamental basis of society. It further postulates that the relationships and values generated by the production process condition the "social, political, and intellectual life process in general." Within the development of the forces of production—runs the theory—contradictions increasingly divide society at large into classes and prepare the conditions for the next phase. With capitalism, class society reaches its ultimate stage of development; the proletariat, carrying in itself the legacy of all human development, stands next in line to take control and, in so doing, abolish the tyranny of economics over common life.

While accepting the general outlines of this theory, different elements of the U.S. Left have emphasized its importance to a greater or lesser degree and one aspect over another. During the early era, roughly 1870 to 1890, eclecticism ran rampant. For approximately the next thirty years, the "scientific" materialism of the Second International blended comfortably with the crude materialism of grass-roots radicals. The "dialectical materialism" of Lenin and especially Stalin, superimposing upon the "copy theory" of reality a view of the "vanguard" at once predestined by cosmic forces and yet also guiding history, prevailed until the 1950s. The popular view of historical materialism, faced with the advance of nuclear weapons and with the twists and turns of unpredictable events, has never subsequently recovered. And yet from the standpoint of methodological sophistication of intellectual practice, historical materialism has retained and even expanded its value.

Much of the interpretation of historical materialism depended upon the central sources for inspiration. Among German Americans in the early days, Ferdinand Lassalle easily figured with Marx as a champion of labor vision, and the Vornärz poets' lyric idealism held no small influence. The Communist Manifesto, clarion call to revolution, had far more effect than Capital for some time to come. Native-born Americans of the "revolutionary socialist" faction most thoroughly dedicated to class struggle occasionally drew their inspiration directly from idealist sources. For instance, Burnette Haskell, U.S. formulator of anarcho-syndicalism and editor of the San Francisco-based newspaper the Truth, looked to the relentless dialectical development of history; his key collaborator, Joseph R. Buchanan, editor of the Denver Labor Enquirer, relied more characteristically upon the cruel realities of frontier labor and the degradation of the American republic to spell out an insurrectionary conclusion. Utopians of the Bellamy Nationalist and successive movements freely acknowledged Marx but in proposing a characteristically American-style voluntary escape from history made a decisive judgment upon the theory's efficacy. William Morris, more than Marx, gave them clues to overcoming the intrusion of capitalism upon humanity.

In the era to follow, popularization of doctrine predominated in virtually every quarter. The rise of American social science coincided with the translation of European socialist classics, above all the new Socialism, Utopian and Scientific from Engels's Anti-Dühring (1893). Engels's pamphlets, upheld by Daniel De Leon as the key source of "scientific socialism," provided an open sesame to popular explanation and also reduction. Among English-language socialists in particular, the local study class became a medium for teaching the "science of society," Lewis Henry Morgan to Karl Kautsky. Behind the study club stood the richly didactic, colloquial explanation of social exploitation and inevitable economic decline in the pages of the Appeal to Reason and its many less-popular counterparts. Heavily proletarian immigrant movements tended to emphasize the reality of the daily class struggle over the finer points of doctrine. Yet even here the goal of workers' education remained.

More detailed and controversial discussion of materialism failed to elicit wide interest. The International Socialist Review, founded in 1900 with social-science enthusiast A. M. Simons at its helm, brought the prestige of German theorists to Americans firsthand. There and in the pages of the Yiddish Zukunft the details of historical materialism received a most vigorous debate: Did the theory apply equally to all individuals or nations? Did it reconcile the question of European and American colonialism as the absorption of backward societies into more materially advanced ones? What application could be given to art and science? But such discussions appealed largely to intellectuals.

By the approach of the First World War, the theoretical solidity of Engelsian doctrine had been breached from several angles. Feminists and bohemians raised up idealist theorists and theories more akin to utopianism than to Marxism. Immigrants in particular faced the ambivalent possibilities of nationalism for their flocks, and the limits of generalized Marxism to interpret the danger of world powers dominating lesser peoples. The Russian Revolution at first glance seemed to deny the efficacy of historical materialism by projecting a backward nation into the first self-proclaimed socialist society.

Leninism affixed a patchwork solution to the theoretical dilemmas, never fully restoring the simple class content or teleology of the older model. Amended to encompass the struggle of the superexploited races and peoples, "dialectical materialism" (as it had been redesignated) no longer spoke consistently or convincingly of the "advanced" proletariat's central role in bringing world revolution. The Soviet Union, in theory now exempt from class conflicts if not historical materialism, nevertheless obviously underwent traumatic struggles to raise up its own forces of production by which, logically, its course should not be determined. Leninism's "vanguard party" concept and its affirmation of the Russian Revolution as the central event in modern history provided a solution so convincing to a generation of revolutionaries that every political alternative to the Communist Party ended with essentially the same philosophical propositions.

The unmatched example of the Russian Revolution, however constrained or corrupted (according to different theories), continued to rule triumphant in the Left so long as capitalism seemed on a downward economic spiral. The renewal of capitalism after World War II snapped the last barrier against the collapse of historical materialism as an all-sufficient explanation. Attempts to extend historical materialism into a true world-system, with the "proletariat" in effect the Third World population at large, brought Leninist theory to a conclusion but did nothing to restore expectations for the proletariat in the most highly mechanized nations. Substitutions of a revolutionary peasant army or peasantry at large (China and Vietnam, or Ghana) validated one aspect of the theory at the expense of other aspects.

The effect of these revolutionary developments, combined with the Khrushchev revelations of 1956 and the character of newer mass movements (above all civil rights) in the United States, all tended to discredit theoretical assumptions that had remained dominant in the American Left since 1917. Unlike such European heretics as Cornelius Castoriadis or Jürgen Habermas, Americans did not generally confuse historical materialism outright or seek to substitute technology for production. They simply abandoned the particulars of historical materialism.

By the later 1960s, discussions of contradictions centered in capitalism's "superstructure" drew alike upon Gramsci and Althusser for justification in setting aside traditional historical-materialist analyses, affirming a wider and more eclectic view of class, race, and gender exploitation in whatever studies were pursued. Culture and religion began therefore to be viewed as highly significant factors that could essentially be autonomous from economics. Not even the radical economists of New Left vintage looked to a definitive capitalist breakdown (whose last major theorist, as of the Labor Theory of Value, passed with Paul Mattick, Sr.) as the source for socialist transformation.

Not surprisingly, as the older socialist organizations rooted in traditional theory tended to diminish in importance, their own theorists tended to de-emphasize (without drawing broad, heretical conclusions) the old theories of historical materialism save in the most general sense of world-capitalist crisis. More generally, Left groups' concentration upon peasant-based revolutionary movements (or governments) abroad, and imperialism or racism and sexism and environmental degradation at home, precluded the older theoretical framework. While labor-oriented activities therefore continued, especially among sectors accessible to organization and reform, deeper theory became increasingly a minor concern.

Within the academic world, historical materialism remained alive as a conditioning factor for radical history, sociology, literary theory, and even psychology. Indeed, certain trends in the transition to poststructuralism and postmodernism raised up explicitly historical materialist readings of "culture" in the broadest anthropological (as well as the more customary) sense. Here and there, as in the writings of Michael Buroway, Marxist theory even enjoyed a measure of revival in something like its original form. For the most part, historical materialism served as a rallying point and an antidote (not to be taken whole) to the more extreme idealism of theory inspired by the apoliticized, French-oriented intellectual avant-garde. By the late 1990s the waning of the postmodern paradigm and the rapid growth of extreme class divisions across the globe returned Marxism to a measure of popularity. Marxist environmentalists, especially those of the journal CNS, edited by James O'Connor, found important new uses for Marxist intellectual traditions.

HITLER-STALIN PACT. Signed on 23 August 1939, The Hitler-Stalin Pact (also known as the Molotov-Ribbentrop Pact), announced a cessation of war preparations by each side against the other, and meant the division of Eastern Europe into two spheres of control. The pact came as a shock to almost everyone in the United States Left, but its impact varied greatly from sector to sector. From the mid-1930s onward, the Communist Party of the USA (CPUSA) had devoted a substantial amount of time and energy to the struggle against facism, internationally as well as against such domestic pro-Nazi organizations as the Silver Shirts, the Coughlinite Social Justice movement, and the Ku Klux Klan. Many American liberals had joined or allied themselves with the CPUSA largely because of its leadership in this struggle. The Soviet Union was generally accepted as Nazism's archenemy, if not as leader of international opposition to fascism. On the other side, Hitler's emphatic anticommunism was, explicitly or implicitly, accepted as sufficient reason for benevolent neutrality by more respectable rightist groups such as the Liberty League.

Most leftists had been well aware of the frustration the Soviet Union had met with in its repeated attempts to form alliances for collective security against the Nazis, and, likewise, of the Neville Chamberlain-led British government's refusal to give any serious consideration to Soviet proposals for a mutual-aid pact. There seemed, in short, to be a reasonable foundation for Soviet fears that Britain's rulers would welcome, or even actually support, a Nazi drive to the East.

The startled leadership of the CPUSA therefore accepted the strategic value of the amazing countermove Stalin had apparently engineered, and most U.S. Party members reluctantly endorsed the pact as being necessary to the defense of the Soviet Union, whose survival was considered the decisive priority.

The Party therefore suffered no substantial immediate loss of actual membership. But the sense of disorientation and of total CPUSA adherence to Russian leadership took a heavy toll in the long run.

For three feverish days, the Party leaders remained sharply divided as to their own propaganda line. General Secretary Earl Browder advocated continuation of anti-Nazi campaigns, presenting the pact as a tragic military necessity forced upon the Soviet Union by the Allied nations. A large section of the Party "old guard," never entirely comfortable with the Popular Front, insisted that primary emphasis be placed upon the imperialist nature and essential equivalency of the Wall Street-Downing Street axis and the Rome-Berlin-Tokyo axis, and called for a denunciation of the attempt of the Allies to repeat the fraudulent moral claims of World War I. It rapidly became clear that the Soviet Union had adopted the latter stand and expected its sister movements to follow.

The result would have been catastrophic in any case, but was made even more so by the ways in which Party members active in mass or liberal-Left movements found themselves directed to implement the new line. In many cases, as in the League of American Writers, they were instructed to introduce totally inappropriate motions on the pact or the nature of the impending war. Such motions generally passed by narrow majorities; these were Pyrrhic victories, however, for they were followed by the near-complete exodus of all those opposed. The work of years was thereby undone almost overnight.

The breakdown of such relations and its devastating results are well exemplified by the fortunes of the strongly antifascist faculty committee built up at the City College of New York. Here, as generally, the actual core of Party membership remained intact. But the shock and disillusionment precluded any united action, even in self-defense. When, in 1940, the Rapp-Coudert Committee initiated a political witch-hunt at City College, no organized faculty opposition emerged and no protest developed against the summary dismissal of many highly respected colleagues.

Despite a real period of effective united-front action and even Communist Party respectability (or popularity) during the war, a strong residue of distrust remained among the non-Communist Left and liberals, a sense of Party direction by outside forces and of Party members following a hidden agenda in mass organizations. The reservoir of suspicion was soon tapped and effectively exploited by Senator Joseph McCarthy and others in the domestic Cold War.

HOFFMAN, ABBIE (1936–1989). A cultural revolutionary who came to prominence in the 1960s, Abbie Hoffman once wrote that “a modern revolutionary heads for the television station, not for the factory.” Using ridicule and audacity as potent weapons against the political, military, and judicial systems that were helping to prosecute the Vietnam War, Hoffman worked to transform the antiauthoritarian sentiments of many young people of the sixties counterculture into political consciousness and a mentality of resistance. “Personally,” he wrote in his autobiographical Soon to Be a Major Motion Picture (1980). “I always held my flower in a clenched fist. A semi-structure freak among the love children, I was determined to bring the hippie movement into a broader protest.” This politicizing impact upon the drugs-and-rock ‘n’ roll counterculture significantly offset the polarizing or alienating aspects of his unruly anarchism, as beamed to mainstream America by the electronic media. His hilariously communicated revulsion at the corporate American culture, moreover, had deep impact upon the entire sixties generation.

Abbott Hoffman was born on 30 November 1936 in Worcester, Massachusetts, the oldest of three children of a Jewish family whose living derived from a family drugstore and then a medical supply company. Expelled from Classical High School after a fight with his English teacher, Hoffman finally graduated from a private academy and then attended Brandeis University, from which he graduated in 1959 with a B.A. in psychology. He became active in the civil rights movement and was arrested in Mississippi during Freedom Summer, 1964; in 1966 he founded Liberty House, a crafts store in New York City that sold the products of poor people’s co-ops in Mississippi. It was as an organizer against the Vietnam War, however, that Hoffman won media attention and found a constituency for his brand of protest.

In April 1967, Hoffman and cohorts threw dollar bills from the visitors’ gallery to the floor of the New York Stock Exchange, provoking chaos as traders scrambled for the money. His wedding to Anita Kushner (his second marriage) in Central Park that August attracted over three thousand people, as did the “be-ins” he helped organize in the park. During the anti-war demonstration of over fifty thousand in Washington, D.C., in October of that year, Hoffman led an “Exorcism of the Pentagon” (surrounding the Pentagon to levitate it by mental force). On New Year’s Day, 1968, Hoffman, Jerry Rubin, and other activists proclaimed themselves “Yippies,” and shortly thereafter founded the Youth International Party, a conceptual community that instigated many street demonstrations and media events. These culminated in the “Festival of Life” at the 1968 Democratic National Convention in Chicago, during which the Chicago police under Mayor Richard Daley indulged in what a government report called a “police riot.” Hoffman nominated a pig, “Pigasus,” for president and was arrested for having “Fuck” scrawled across his forehead.

The violence in Chicago’s streets led to the Chicago Eight conspiracy trial (eventually called the Chicago Seven trial, as Bobby Seale of the Black Panthers was bound, gagged, and railroaded separately to four years in prison for contempt of court). Hoffman’s talent for guerrilla theater gave rise to radical mockery of courtroom decorum (he claimed, among other things, to be trial judge Julius Hoffman’s illegitimate son). Dozens of well-known political and cultural figures testified on behalf of the defendants as the trial became a showcase for Left politics and the counterculture.

Hoffman spent the next years as a full-time agitator, speaker, and writer, logging dozens of arrests and facing serious harassment from police. In 1973 he was arrested for participating in the sale of cocaine to undercover agents. (He always maintained the anticipated profit from the sale had been earmarked to finance movement activities). Facing a mandatory life sentence with no possibility of parole before fifteen years, he vanished in February 1974 and spent more than six years underground. These years included plastic surgery, many aliases, a long companionship with a woman, Johanna Lawrenson, two nervous breakdowns, and some serious and very public environmental activism under the name "Barry Freed" in upstate New York near the Saint Lawrence River.

Hoffman emerged from hiding on national television on 3 September 1980. He served less than a year in prison after pleading guilty to a lesser charge, became a popular college campus speaker, was arrested (with former president Jimmy Carter's daughter, Amy) protesting Central Intelligence Agency recruitment at the University of Massachusetts (Amherst), and remained active, especially on environmental issues. His endurance as an organizer and his continued commitment to political causes well beyond the heyday of the 1960s and 1970s were inspiring to many of his contemporaries and instructive, especially, to college-age people of the 1980s.

His suicide on 12 April 1989 shocked most of his admirers and friends. At the time of his death he had been taking lithium and other prescribed drugs to deal with his manic-depressive cycles and injuries from a serious automobile accident of the previous year. The coroner's report of 18 April found cause of death to have been "massive doses" of phenobarbital and alcohol.

In classic anarchist tradition, Hoffman viewed his radicalism as a way of life and distrusted activists whose lifestyles did not, in his judgment, incarnate their ideologies. His ideas were most effectively presented in direct action, but he wrote a number of books, including Revolution for the Hell of It (1967), Woodstock Nation (1969), Steal This Book (1971), Vote! (1972), To America with Love: Letters from the Underground (1976), and Steal This Urine Test (1988).

and State Senator Jack Tenney's California Joint Fact-finding Committee on Un-American Activities. HUAC charged that Communists had established a significant base in the dominant medium of mass culture. Communists were said to be placing subversive messages into Hollywood films and discriminating against unsympathetic colleagues. A further concern was that Communists were in a position to place negative images of the United States in films that would have wide international distribution.

Totally ignored in the hysteria generated by HUAC were the realities of the Hollywood studio system of the 1930s and 1940s. That system's outstanding characteristic was the hands-on control by studio bosses who ran their business as a strictly entertainment industry and shared Sam Goldwyn's often-quoted sentiment: "If you want to send a message, use Western Union." When films did have a political edge, studio bosses were personally involved in every phase of production, including the vital final cut. This was decidedly the case with the most notoriously pro-Russian film ever made in Hollywood, Mission to Moscow (1943). The film, undertaken by Jack Warner at the request of the Roosevelt administration, combined an all-out assault on American isolationists with a complete acceptance of the Stalinist account of the Moscow purges. Warner considered his film to be a patriotic service to the New Deal in the war against fascism.

Evidence of leftist images and dialog in Hollywood films was extremely slim. HUAC had to resort to citing the smiling children in Song of Russia (1944) and noting that Russian workers shouted "tovarich" (comrade) as American merchant ships that had run the Nazi submarine blockade entered a Soviet port in Action in the North Atlantic (1943). Even committee members struggled to keep a straight face when Ginger Roger's mother complained that her daughter "had been forced" to speak the subversive line "share and share alike, that's democracy" in a 1943 film scripted by Dalton Trumbo.

Contrary to the HUAC contentions, Communist Party policy in Hollywood had been largely defensive. Film workers were instructed that their primary responsibility was to keep anti-Soviet and anti-Left sentiment out of films, a kind of esthetic Hippocratic oath to First, Do No Harm. On the positive side of the ledger, radicals were urged to advance a democratic and populist ethos that was totally in accord with the New Deal and popular culture. Melvyn

HOLLYWOOD BLACKLIST. The investigation of Hollywood radicals by the House Committee on Un-American Activities (HUAC) in 1947 and 1951 was a continuation of pressures first exerted in the late 1930s and early 1940s by the Dies Committee

Douglas, a leading Hollywood liberal, commented years later that the Communists had been fellow travelers of the liberals and not vice versa. Liberalism, not Communism, may, in fact, have been the true target of the HUAC investigators. The Right wished to discourage any Hollywood impulse to make films advocating social change at home or critical of foreign policy. The task of intimidation was focused on the role Communists played as screenwriters. Nearly sixty percent of all individuals called to testify and an equal percent of all those blacklisted were screenwriters. Only twenty percent of those called and twenty-five percent of those blacklisted were actors.

Communist involvement in Hollywood had not been superficial. Some nine hundred films were written, co-written, directed, or produced by individuals who participated in Communist-led movements or were actual Party members. Many of the films contained Popular Front elements. Disparaging comments on the rich and the capitalist economy, sympathy for the underdog (including the poor, women, and minorities), and romantic portrayals of dissenters were not unique to Hollywood leftists, but certainly characteristic of much of the work of future blacklisted. Across the spectrum of genres, from "B" comedies and westerns to social realist noirs, the influence of the Left was often impressive and enduring.

When the first subpoenas were issued the Hollywood impulse was to fight back. Defense committees were formed and efforts to purge various guilds defeated. Eric Johnston, president of the Motion Picture Association of America, pledged that he would "never be party to anything as un-American as a blacklist." The will to resist was put to the test when some of the first writers called refused to cooperate and tried to read statements condemning the committee in sessions that often turned into shouting matches. The result was bad press for Hollywood and a feeling by producers that their radical writers were vying with the committee for sensational headlines at the industry's expense. On 24 November 1947, Congress cited ten screenwriters for contempt. Producers meeting at the Waldorf Astoria hotel two days later signaled their capitulation to the investigators by announcing that "no Communists or other subversives will be knowingly employed by Hollywood." An appeal by the "Hollywood Ten" was turned down and by mid-1950 most of them had begun to serve one-year terms in prison.

HUAC returned for a second Hollywood round in 1951, but the proceedings were not true investigations. The political views of those called were already known and the people they were asked to name as comrades were also known. The hearings amounted to a kind of ideological exorcism. Witnesses were expected to state they had been misled or confused in the past and were now regretful. They could prove their sincerity by naming others who had been with them in Communist organizations or at Communist functions.

Response to the hearings took many forms. Most Party members and sympathizers had never hidden their views but did not accept the right of HUAC to question their right of political association. Civil libertarians could easily back this view on the basis of the First and Fifth amendments. Others like actor Zero Mostel said they would gladly discuss their own conduct but were prohibited by religious convictions from naming others. Individuals who had only been involved with antifascist front groups or had left the Party for ideological reasons did not wish to martyr themselves for a cause they had never embraced or had now renounced, but naming names seemed morally wrong. Other ex-Communists such as Budd Schulberg and Elia Kazan felt there was a Communist conspiracy and that it was proper, if not patriotic, to expose it.

Whatever one's convictions, there was little room for maneuvering once called, yet two out of three who testified were unfriendly or uncooperative. A few, like Lucille Ball, were allowed to pass with garbled and meaningless testimony, but most were pinned down. Fame was no protection. A lifelong non-Communist progressive like Sam Jaffe was blacklisted for refusal to cooperate. Jaffe, who had been nominated for an Oscar for The Asphalt Jungle (1950) and was famous for roles in Lost Horizon (1937) and Gunga Din (1939), was reduced to teaching high school math and living with his sisters. He would eventually make a comeback as Dr. Zorba on the successful Ben Casey television series. Lee Grant, nominated for an Oscar for her role in Detective Story (1951), was blacklisted for refusing to testify against her first husband, screenwriter Arnold Manoff. Grant would eventually return to Hollywood and win two Oscars, one for acting and another for directing a documentary.

The most defiant Hollywood actor was gravel-voiced Lionel Stander, who had been in comedies directed by Ben Hecht, Frank Capra, and Preston

Sturges. Active in the Salinas Valley lettuce strike, the Tom Mooney case, the Scottsboro defense, guild campaigns, antifascist work, and other left-wing causes, Stander said he had not joined the Communist Party because he was to the left of it. He said he had been blackballed for his politics for over twenty years and that the only "un-Americans" active in Hollywood that he knew of were members of the committee. Blacklisted anew, Stander became a successful Wall Street broker, later starred in European films, and still later returned to American prominence as the chauffeur in Hart to Hart, one of television's top twenty programs during the early 1980s.

Few of those blacklisted would prove as resilient as Stander, Grant, Jaffe, and Mostel. No more than ten percent would be able to return to careers in Hollywood. Even the biggest names were vulnerable. Larry Parks, fresh from triumphs in two films about Al Jolson, was banned for his brief membership in the Communist Party and did not appear onscreen again until getting a small role in Freud (1962). Charles Chaplin, the most famous face in the world, had remained a British citizen and a firm believer in the Popular Front. Although he had never been in the Communist Party, Chaplin was not allowed to reenter the United States following a trip to Europe. He did not return to the United States until 1972, when an apotheotic Hollywood honored him with a lifetime achievement award during the Oscar ceremonies. His A King in New York (1957) satirizes HUAC. In like manner, Bertolt Brecht, one of many anti-Nazi refugees working in Hollywood, had such a bad taste from his HUAC appearance that he repatriated to East Berlin to become an in-house critic of socialism.

Performers who had already established some kind of name might survive through work on the stage, but those at the beginning of their careers had few options. Technical workers faced an even more difficult time, as there was no alternative industry for them to turn to, and Roy Brewer, head of the Hollywood craft unions, remained fiercely anticommunist. Ronald Reagan, then head of the Screen Actors Guild, kept in touch with the Federal Bureau of Investigation about "disloyal" actors. Dozens of blacklistees lost spouses because of the hearings and even more suffered irreparable financial loss. Mental and physical distress was common. Clifford Odets never again wrote effectively, and the deaths of John Garfield, J. Edward Bromberg, Canada Lee, and half a dozen others are linked to their committee appearances.

The group that came to exemplify resistance was the Hollywood Ten and their writing colleagues, many of whom had been in the Party. The Ten consisted of Alvah Bessie, Herbert Biberman, Lester Cole, Edward Dmytryk, Ring Lardner, Jr., John Howard Lawson, Albert Maltz, Sam Ornitz, Robert Adrian Scott, and Dalton Trumbo. They had scripted or directed hundreds of Hollywood films. Trumbo was one of the highest-paid Hollywood writers and Lawson had been the first president of the Screen Writers Guild. Most of the Ten's best films had dealt with antifascist themes. These included Hotel Berlin (1945), The Master Race (1941), Crossfire (1947), Sahara (1943), Pride of the Marines (1945), Destination Tokyo (1944), and Thirty Seconds over Tokyo (1944). Lardner had scripted the Academy Award-winning Woman of the Year (1942), Maltz the well-received This Gun for Hire (1942), and Trumbo the Academy Award nominee Kitty Foyle (1940). The Ten also worked on genre film such as Lester Cole's script for The Invisible Man Returns (1940).

Scriptwriters had the most options to continue working during the blacklist period. Performers could not change their faces nor could directors wear masks, but writers could use pseudonyms. This proved a profitable strategy for many. Abraham Polonsky, Walter Bernstein, and Arnold Manoff wrote most of the You Are There segments, a series of historical events re-created for television with a strong focus on cultural martyrs such as Socrates, Galileo, Joan of Arc, and the Salem witches. Ring Lardner, Jr., and Ian McLellan Hunter wrote The Adventures of Robin Hood series. The phenomenon of using phony names and surrogates became the basis of The Front (1976), which starred Woody Allen. The film was written by blacklistee Walter Bernstein, produced and directed by blacklistee Martin Ritt, and featured blacklisted actors Zero Mostel, John Randolph, Lloyd Gough, Joshua Shelley, and Herschel Bernardi.

Other blacklisted writers found work in Mexico and Europe. Notable among these are Hugo Butler, who wrote scripts for Luis Buñuel in Mexico City, and Jules Dassin, who scored box-office hits with his French-made Rififi (1954) and the Greek-made Never on Sunday (1960). A few writers worked behind the scenes in Hollywood in an effort to wear down the blacklist. One of Trumbo's pseudonyms, Robert Rich, won an Academy Award for The Brave One (1956), and as the decade drew to an end Hollywood insiders became aware that Nathan E. Douglas, the Academy Award-winning writer of The Defiant Ones (1958), was really blacklisted Nedrick Young. In 1960 Otto Preminger officially broke the blacklist by crediting Trumbo for scripting Exodus. It was then revealed that Michael Wilson had written the blockbuster The Bridge on the River Kwai (1957) and had completed a script that would become Lawrence of Arabia (1962).

Another consequence of the investigations was a series of anticommunist films: The Red Menace (1949), I Married a Communist (1950), I Was a Communist for the FBI (1951), Walk East on Beacon (1952), My Son John (1952), Big Jim McClain (1952), and Trial (1955). A labor leader modeled on Harry Bridges was the main villain in I Married a Communist, Hawaiian Communists were exposed by a two-fisted John Wayne in Big Jim McClain, and Communist defense efforts for a Mexican American were depicted as insincere political and mercenary opportunism in Trial. All of the films took it as a given that Communists were de facto agents of the Soviet Union. On the Waterfront (1954) had no Communist characters but its emphasis on the need to testify before federal investigating committees was widely interpreted as a reference to HUAC. Scriptwriter Budd Schulberg has repeatedly denied that connection but director Elia Kazan has stated that for him the parallel was explicit. Kazan also directed Viva Zapata! (1952), in which the visionary revolutionary anarchist Zapata is favorably contrasted with a Communist-style bureaucratic revolutionary.

The Hollywood Left began to revive in the late 1960s and, unlike the student New Left, the new Hollywood rebels, although not connected with the Communist Party, felt warmly toward their predecessors and occasionally worked with them on joint projects. Films with radical bite began to appear with some regularity in the 1970s and 1980s. Ring Lardner, Jr., scripted *M*A*S*H** (1970), a satire on the Korean War that became the basis for one of the most popular of all television series. Labor themes were addressed in The Molly Maguires (1970), Norma Rae (1979), Silkwood (1983), and Matewan (1987). The Rosenberg case was reviewed in Daniel (1983) and John Reed celebrated in Reds (1982), a film that incorporated interviews with real-life radicals such as Scott Nearing. Nuclear power was attacked in The China Syndrome (1979) and the Vietnam War critiqued in Go Tell the Spartans (1978), Coming Home (1978), Apocalypse Now (1979), and Full Metal Jacket (1987). Capitalism itself was indicted in Wall Street (1987) and Latin American intervention assailed in Missing (1982), Under Fire (1983), Salvador (1986), and Latino (1985). The blacklist itself was the subject of The Way We Were (1973), which starred Barbra Streisand as a totally sympathetic Communist married to a liberal screenwriter.

The new Hollywood activists were not immune from career threats. Jane Fonda, famous for her opposition to the Vietnam War, was forced from some shooting locations by irate Vietnam veterans. Ed Asner, president of the Screen Actors Guild and a supporter of medical aid to left-wing rebels in El Salvador, had his Lou Grant television show canceled after an active protest campaign by right-wing groups. Vanessa Redgrave, a member of a Trotskyist group in England and a vocal opponent of Israel, had contracts aborted and projects threatened with boycotts by Zionist groups. Liberals Robert Redford, Jack Lemmon, and Gregory Peck were criticized for participation in film festivals held in Cuba. While such pressures were not nearly as destabilizing as the blacklist-period tensions had been, awareness of the dangers associated with political activism had its effect on how filmmakers addressed political issues, the kind of film projects undertaken for production, and the particular personnel chosen for given projects.

What the blacklist entailed and its effect on Hollywood has generated a large body of writing by those directly involved. Lillian Hellman's Scoundrel Time (1976) and Dalton Trumbo's The Time of the Toad (1949) are classics of this genre. Hellman and writers such as Lester Cole and Walter Bernstein have been unforgiving of those who cooperated. In similar fashion, Elia Kazan insists in his autobiography, A Life (1988), that he did no wrong in being a friendly witness even though he writes movingly about the traumatic effect the testimony had on his life and that of others who were called before HUAC. Individuals such as Albert Maltz and Jules Dassin have commented on the terrible cost of broken relationships and upended careers with varying degrees of forgiveness for the "friendlies." Dalton Trumbo has been the most generous in this regard by rendering his final judgment that "we were all victims."

HOLLYWOOD LEFT. The organized Left in the Hollywood motion picture industry enjoyed a brief existence (from 1936 to 1949) and a limited influence. It centered around the three hundred or so studio employees who belonged to the Communist Party.

Although many Communists were active in organizing guilds and unions, they were not the sole source of trade union militancy. The two most militant labor organizations, the Screen Writers Guild (SWG), organized in 1933, and the Conference of Studio Unions (CSU), established in 1941, were organized by non-Communists. However, a Communist, Jeff Kibre, did mastermind the ultimately unsuccessful effort to organize a Congress of Industrial Organizations-affiliated studio union movement between 1937 and 1939.

Militancy or activism began in Hollywood in 1933, coincident with the New Deal. The most militant talent guild, the SWG, was organized in February, and later that year Lou Goldblatt began to organize the Motion Picture Workers Industrial Union (Association of Motion Picture Employees), or MPWIU, under the auspices of the Communist Trade Union Unity League.

The MPWIU lasted one year, recruiting about one thousand members and issuing a publication, the Motion Picture Worker. In its second number, dated 1 August 1934, it called on studio workers to adopt industrial union tactics, form industrial unions, and take "control of their unions out of the hands of the misleading bureaucratic fakers and [place] it where it should be—with the 'rank and file' and rank-and-file committees." However, before the MPWIU had attracted enough members and strength to test the gangster-dominated, American Federation of Labor-affiliated International Association of Theatrical Stage Employees (IATSE) and the studios, the Trade Union Unity League was dissolved, in March 1935.

Meanwhile, Socialist Upton Sinclair's 1934 campaign for the governorship of California, the studios' refusal to recognize the SWG, the continued influx of writers from New York with backgrounds in guilds and left-wing theaters, and the arrival of refugees from Europe noticeably increased the radical temperament in Hollywood. The Communist Party's interest in writers, especially successful writers, had also heightened. In May 1935 a call for a national writers' congress was issued. Although only two screenwriters signed the call, early the following year the Communist Party's "cultural commissar," V. J. Jerome, and an experienced organizer, Stanley

From strike literature issued by the Screen Cartoonists Guild during the strike against the Disney Studio, c. 1940.

Lawrence, journeyed to Hollywood. They laid the foundations for the Hollywood pattern of organizing by talent branches (writers, directors, actors).

The Communist Party support for black rights, unskilled and semiskilled workers, and women, its antifascism, its connection with what seemed to be the one progressive country in a world saddled with a massive economic depression and collapsing democracies, and its disciplined organization convinced many screenwriters that Communism represented the best vehicle for defending democratic values in the United States. Party hierarchs believed that Hollywood offered skilled writers and speakers and money for party-backed causes.

Between 1936 and 1946, approximately three hundred movie studio employees joined the Communist Party (about one percent of the work force). They joined for various reasons and stayed for varying lengths of time. Screenwriters predominated (145); there were about sixty actors, twenty directors and producers, and somewhere between fifty and a hundred backlot, sound stage, or front-office workers.

Although they had little impact on the political content of movies, Communists contributed to the slight studio trend toward more realistic treatment of some topics. The main political influence of Hollywood Communists occurred in union and guild organizing, support for antifascism, and the election of progressive candidates to public office.

Communists were active in the fight to gain recognition for the SWG, they helped organize other guilds, they were the core elements in the struggle to supplant the gangsters who dominated the IATSE and restructure the federation on a democratic basis, they aided the effort to organize agricultural workers, and they helped the CSU in its major postwar strikes.

The single Communist-initiated trade union effort began in the spring of 1937. Jeff Kibre, a miniature-props worker, member of IATSE Local 37, and a Communist, with a small group of dissidents, launched a campaign to transform the IATSE. Kibre received advice and a meager amount of money from the leaders of the organizing effort of the Congress of Industrial Organizations in California (Harry Bridges, Goldblatt, and Philip Connelly), and the Communist Party made him a "protected member," freeing him from usual Party duties and attendance, but provided very little else.

Although Kibre would prove endlessly imaginative and undauntingly optimistic in his two-year effort, he failed to find a means to break through the craft consciousness of studio workers or counter the power and ruthlessness of the IATSE-studio combination. When his main weapon, an unfair labor practice complaint filed with the National Labor Relations Board, bogged down in the board's efforts to achieve a settlement, and the IATSE had brought the studio labor situation to the verge of chaos, Kibre filed for a representation election. The IATSE, with open studio backing and promises of a wage raise if it won, ran a vicious Red-baiting campaign, winning 4,460 to 1,967.

Kibre did not enjoy the support of Communists in other parts of the country or in Hollywood. The other movie-industry Communists were, for the most part, caught up in their own guild recognition battles, fighting, in the case of the screenwriters, a studio-created rival union and an industry blacklist. In addition, the Communist Party did not make an effort to unite its union-building forces in Hollywood or to mobilize its supporters in the projectionist branches of the IATSE. Communist leaders seemed content with the galaxy of names that could be mobilized behind Party-supported campaigns and the amount of dollars flowing from the movie industry to those campaigns. During the height of the Popular Front era, 1936–1939, the members of the Hollywood branches contributed more to (people's front) causes than any other geographical group.

A host of Popular Front organizations sprung up in Hollywood. The largest and most effective were the Hollywood Anti-Nazi League, the Motion Picture Artists Committee, and the Motion Picture Democratic Committee. Communists provided much of their organizational backbone. They did not dominate them, but they had a strong influence over them when, and only when, Communist and non-Communist policies coincided. When they did not, as happened in the wake of the non-aggression treaty signed by Germany and the Soviet Union in August 1939, the organizations splintered.

Although there was not a mass exodus from the Communist Party in September 1939, when the party line changed from antifascism to anti-imperialism and anti-war, Communists were isolated and their Popular Front groups became powerless rumps. The German invasion of the Soviet Union in June 1941 and the Japanese attack on Pearl Harbor in December 1941 altered the situation and a wartime popular front of left-wing forces was constructed. The Hollywood Left dove into the cause of victory, but not to the exclusion of its prewar beliefs. Communists were very active in the efforts to stanch the racism generated by the Sleepy Lagoon case and the Zoot Suit riots, both of which involved Mexican Americans. A small number wrote scripts for radio plays, critically examining the nature of the peace that was coming; a larger number became active in the various electoral organizations formed by "progressives" to continue the New Deal and block the conservative political trend building since the election of 1938; and almost all supported, in guild meetings and on the picket lines, the CSU strikes that erupted between 1945 and 1946.

The defeat of the CSU coincided with the onset of the domestic Cold War, which would strike Hollywood first and hardest. A coalition of the militant Right (the Motion Picture Alliance for the Preservation of American Ideals), the House Committee on Un-American Activities, the IATSE, and, after a short resistance, the producers' associations combined to destroy the organized Left in Hollywood. The Taft-Hartley Act and the blacklist effectively removed radicals from guild and union offices and isolated unions with militant leaders, thus eliminating the Left's main organizational base in Hollywood.

HOOK, SIDNEY (1902-1989). Born in New York City to Austrian-Jewish immigrants, Sidney Hook became a socialist at an early age. At Boys High in Brooklyn, he opposed American entry into the First World War and supported Morris Hillquit's Socialist mayoral campaign. Attending City College (B.A., 1924) and Columbia University (Ph.D., 1927), Hook retained his left-wing sympathies while becoming the favored pupil of his Columbia adviser, the pragmatist philosopher John Dewey.

In the late 1920s, Hook traveled to Germany to study post-Hegelian philosophy, spending an additional three months at the Marx-Engels Institute in Moscow. He returned to write two brilliant expositions of Marx, Towards the Understanding of Karl Marx (1933) and From Hegel to Marx (1936), which gave him the reputation, as Edmund Wilson wrote in the New Republic, of being "a professor with enough courage and independence to occupy himself openly with a subject outlawed by academic philosophy."

Hook publicly endorsed the 1932 Communist Party ticket, and his teaching post at New York University made him one of the few openly Marxist academics in the United States. In 1933, however, Hook's criticism of Communist sectarianism in Germany, which he believed had facilitated the Nazi triumph, in combination with crude attacks on Hook's philosophy in the Communist, led Hook to renounce the Communist Party and join the newly created American Workers Party. The Soviet Union, he argued, routinely violated the norms of workers' democracy. While he remained a revolutionary communist, he maintained that Marxism would be far more democratic and experimental if informed by pragmatism.

Hook helped the American Workers Party to merge with the Trotskyists (the Communist League of America), and a few years later he facilitated the Trotskyist entry into the Socialist Party. But during the fallout from the Moscow trials, Hook, like many others, began to back away from revolution and Marxism. In 1939, he formed the Committee for Cultural Freedom, which espoused an anticommunist liberalism shorn of the anticapitalism of his earlier anti-Stalinism. During the 1940s and 1950s, Hook became a major Cold War ideologue, organizing the American Committee for Cultural Freedom and arguing in Heresy, Yes—Conspiracy, No (1953) that Communist Party membership alone was sufficient grounds to fire a teacher. When a new student Left emerged in the 1960s, Hook opposed it, even though its celebration of "participatory democracy" was reminiscent of his own youthful politics. Although Hook called himself a social democrat until his death, his proven Cold War loyalties won him warm invitations to the Nixon and Reagan White Houses.

HORTON, MYLES (1905–1990). Little in Myles Horton's heritage suggested his subsequent lifetime of activism, either as an organizer or founder of Highlander Research and Education Center. He was born on 5 July 1905 in Savannah, Tennessee, the first of four children. At times, his father taught school, sold insurance, or was a county clerk. His mother taught school, too, before rearing children. The family was Cumberland Presbyterian, a restrained, virtuous faith with small-town, superficial concern for surrounding poverty but which ignored equally evident segregation or exploited labor. In 1928, as the South's economy was collapsing, Horton graduated from Cumberland Presbyterian College. He got work with the Young Men's Christian Association but soon enrolled at Union Theological Seminary in New York City.

As a seminarian, Horton encountered the ideas of Christian socialism and Marx, other equally serious southerners, the Danish Folk High School movement, and Dr. Harry F. Ward's unrelenting calls for ethical service and labor. Horton returned to Tennessee dedicated to teach a social gospel blending these influences. With other southerners, including Don West, James A. Dombrowski, and John Thompson, he founded Highlander Folk School in 1932 at Monteagle, Tennessee. His propelling impulse was a mixture of Christ's teachings with socialist theories.

Horton quickly became a controversial figure, first during a bloody miners' strike only weeks after Highlander opened, but subsequently as well, during the drive by the Congress of Industrial Organizations to organize the South, in the Southern Conference for Human Welfare, the McCarthyism of the 1950s, and the Eastland hearings into subversion and the civil rights movement. Often at odds with allies on the left, Horton, a radical individualist in spirit and deed, remained unswerving in his faith that collective action could, and did, issue from hard-pressed people learning from their daily struggles. This stubborn belief reinforced his reputation as a loner undisciplined by ideology.

By 1982, when Highlander celebrated its fiftieth anniversary, Horton had been arrested, beaten, smear as a Red, rebuked by union leaders and socialists, hated by segregationists, observed by government agents, and feared. He had seen the vision of interracial coalitions battered, if not set aside, and any hope of a thoroughgoing social reorganization postponed, if not daunted. Highlander had been firebombed, seized by the state of Tennessee, which sold the school and its possessions at public auction, and ousted by the city of Knoxville through a fraudulent urban renewal scheme. The school then moved to New Market, Tennessee.

Frustrated by biracial quiescence in the South, and labor's diminished role within Appalachia, Horton sought peripatetically to link Highlander with revolutionary struggles in Cuba, China, and Central and Latin America. During these travels, he won deserved recognition, chiefly within the field of adult education.

HOUSE COMMITTEE ON UN-AMERICAN ACTIVITIES.

The prototype of the inquisitorial committees that infested the legislative branches of national and state governments during the McCarthy era, the House Committee on Un-American Activities—often referred to as the House Un-American Activities Committee, or HUAC—provided a foretaste of the McCarthyite inquisitorial techniques immortalized by the query “Are you now, or have you ever been a Communist?,” and of methods such as Red-baiting, guilt by association, and the political smear as well. After uncertain beginnings as the Fish Committee (1930–1932) and the McCormack-Dickstein Committee (1934–1935), the renewed Committee on Un-American Activities hit its full stride under the flamboyant Texan Martin Dies in 1938. When the United States became a participant in World War II, as an ally of the Soviet Union against the Fascist Axis of Germany, Italy, and Japan, Dies' strident anti-communism and divisive attacks on the Roosevelt administration were out of step with the times.

The Cold War emerged before the end of World War II, reversing America's political direction. Erstwhile enemies became allies, and former allies, the Soviet Union and the emerging countries of the Third World, became the enemy. The chief threat facing the United States was the "worldwide international Communist conspiracy," the Internal Security Act of 1950 proclaimed as the finding of Congress. This and the Communist Control Act, an amendment to the Internal Security Act enacted in 1954, are the only significant pieces of legislation generated by HUAC in its thirty-year history.

With the changing political climate, HUAC became a permanent standing committee in 1946, mandated to investigate "subversive and un-American propaganda activities." Unlike other committees of the House, HUAC was not primarily concerned with the legislative purpose mandated by the Constitution but with the ideological mission of chilling dissent and inculcating anticommunism.

Orchestrated by HUAC and its counterpart committees in the Senate and state legislatures—with the covert assistance of the Federal Bureau of Investigation (FBI)—the surge of anticommunism engulfed the nation. Since guilt was ideological, it mattered little to the inquisitorial committees whether a person was an actual member of the Communist (or other Left) Party, or a "fellow traveler" who participated in a union affiliated with the Congress of Industrial Organizations or other progressive cause. Countless Americans found themselves enmeshed in the dragnets of the subversive-hunters.

HUAC was armed with the power to compel testimony anywhere in the United States under subpoena, and to enforce its rules with citations for contempt of Congress. In the classic confrontational hearings, witnesses summoned before it were of two classes, "friendly" and "unfriendly."

The "friendlies" were the informers who named names in well-rehearsed testimony. Most often these were paid FBI infiltrators; others were persons supportive of HUAC's aims and purposes who volunteered their cooperation, as did former Screen Actors Guild president Ronald Reagan (FBI code number T-10). Some were frightened individuals who gave reluctant testimony to escape being fired, blacklisted, or, in some cases, deported with their families. The "unfriendly" witnesses were pilloried in proceedings lacking every element of due process and fairness. To avoid being compelled to be a witness against themselves and others, they most often "took the Fifth Amendment," which provided the only sure means of avoiding a year in prison for contempt to those who refused to answer the committee's questions.

Until the mid-sixties, the news media usually played a supportive role, headlining HUAC charges and giving full and uncritical coverage to informer witnesses, while downplaying or ignoring the testimony of "unfriendly" witnesses.

The Los Angeles-Hollywood area was the movie capital of the world. During the Depression and war years, many progressive writers, actors, directors, and technicians won fame and fortune. In 1947 HUAC undertook to cleanse the industry of such "subversive" influences, to redirect the movie industry as a propaganda instrument for the Cold War.

A group of writers and directors (who would come to be known as the "Hollywood Ten") resisted, with the support of many celebrities, citing their First Amendment rights as grounds to refuse to answer the committee's questions. When the U.S. Supreme Court rejected their claim, and they were sentenced to prison, the "Hollywood blacklist" emerged to punish all who failed to answer the committee's questions. Resistance crumbled. HUAC went on to scour the nation, exposing "subversive" activities in unions, cultural groups, schools, orchestras, plays, organizations of the foreign born, and civil rights groups in hearing held throughout the nation.

In the late 1950s, the Los Angeles area again became the center of organized resistance to the committee, giving birth to the National Committee to Abolish HUAC. Community opposition was organized wherever HUAC hearings were held, and political pressures were transmitted to the House of Representatives. By 1969, HUAC was forced into a tactical retreat, adopted the sanitized name of "House Committee on Internal Security," and stopped issuing subpoenas to hostile witnesses. In 1975, as part of a structural reorganization of the House of Representatives, the committee was eliminated, and its files, including index cards on 750,000 "subversive" Americans, were consigned, under seal, to the National Archives.

When the Freedom of Information Act was amended in 1976 to permit a limited public access to FBI records, it revealed the full scope of the illicit partnership between HUAC and the FBI, which began in 1947 in conjunction with the HUAC's purge of the movie industry. Without this vast storehouse of political intelligence dating back to the early 1930s, HUAC would have been largely impotent. Thereafter, HUAC became an adjunct to the operations of FBI director J. Edgar Hoover.

Hoover needed HUAC as an instrument in his illegal "neutralization" programs, which were intended to destroy individuals and organizations that had been targeted by Hoover but against whom evidence was lacking for lawful prosecution. The notorious Counterintelligence Program brought to public attention in the 1970s by hearings of the Senate Select Committee on Intelligence headed by Senator Frank Church was only one of many neutralization programs. By placing FBI informer testimony in the public record, HUAC acted as the laundry transforming confidential data into "public source information," which the FBI could more safely leak to its favored news media contacts. By giving HUAC its lists of individuals to subpoena as its "unfriendly witnesses," the FBI could effectively damage those it sought to neutralize. Information covertly passed along to the HUAC staff director included informer-derived and wiretap information on the contemplated moves of congressional opponents of HUAC.

HOWE, IRVING (1920–1993). The most prestigious American socialist literary critic of the 1950s–1970s, Irving Howe long remained one of the most controversial figures on the Left. According to his supporters a defender of socialism's roots in liberal values, he was to others a foremost defender of a socially constructed "West" (principally the United States, Europe, and Israel) in the era of imperial decline and cultural decentering.

The child of an East Bronx Jewish proletarian family, Howe precociously joined the Young People's Socialist League and attended City College, where he became a Trotskyist student leader. Like most of the other Trotskyist "youth," he left the Socialist Workers Party in 1940 for the newly founded "Third Camp" Workers Party led by Max Shachtman. The next year Howe became editor of the weekly Labor Action, remaining until his departure for military service in 1941, and then again returning briefly in 1946. Soon Howe felt restless in the movement and began to ease out, turning his attention to mostly literary essays for liberal, anticommunist journals, and for Time magazine, where he wrote reviews from 1948 to 1952.

With McCarthyism and the disintegration of the American Left, most of Howe's intellectual milieu lost interest in socialism. Many, including some of Howe's protégés and closest allies, went on to careers as ideologues of neoconservatism. He separated himself from them politically, but continued to share much of their cultural bent. Therefore, he straddled literary-critical pursuits—taking up a wide range of subjects but concerned above all with the "modern," where aesthetics increasingly transported political judgment into the cultural realm—and political polemics, directed mostly against the surviving Communist Left, but also against the general backsliding of his own milieu. By 1953, Howe had come to support the United States in the Korean War, albeit critically, and had resigned from the fading Independent Socialist League. He attacked McCarthyism (although not with the vigor he continued to attack American Communists) and "conformism" while ridiculing the Beat Generation. He accepted a position at Brandeis in 1953, launching Dissent (with the permission of the college's conservative president) as a voice of liberal anticommunist, democratic socialism.

He continued with a variety of literary criticism, his political essays seeking to define democratic socialism (increasingly in later years, liberalism), and with several anthologies of basic socialist writings. In all this, his most distinctive work, in collaboration with editor-poet Eliezer Greenberg, was to help return Yiddish literature (even when regarded, as by Howe himself, as hopelessly vanishing in any live language sense) to dignity among educated Jews. As anthropologist and critic-historian, he thereby offered a popular paean to a socialistic past quickly vanishing.

Howe returned to New York in 1963 to teach at Hunter College. To his considerable surprise, much of his particular anticommunist style had become an intellectual vogue among an important stratum of liberals. He found himself reciprocally sympathetic, while correspondingly hostile toward the New Left as it increased in size and importance. Howe's support, until 1970, of the U.S. presence in Vietnam, his New York Times Magazine savaging of the anti-war movement, and his literary attacks on angry black and feminist writers, marked an almost complete break between himself and the New Left.

In subsequent years, through the Democratic Socialist Organizing Committee and its successor, Democratic Socialists of America, Howe and a section of New Left survivors effected an uneasy peace. Howe's versions of democratic socialism often shifting subtly during his career, remained unsettled. By virtue of intellectual alliances and personal ties, he appeared prominently identified with extreme rightward edge of liberalism in the pro-contra, Cold War hard-line position of the New Republic, owned and directed by Howe's former student Martin Peretz. Although the New Republic drifted steadily to the right and a large handful of Dissent contributors with it, Howe and Dissent's co-editor Michael Walzer continued to make the magazine their chief public outlet, casting themselves as the loyal opposition to neoliberalism. Howe declined to condemn Jesse Jackson's campaign for the Democratic presidential nomination in 1988, and he remained to the end of his life a respected figure within the pluralistic Democratic Socialists of America.

Howe's literary-critical status bore other contradictions. His methods were considered outdated by newer generations of Marxist, feminist, and Third World critics. Many turned instead to the works of Edward Said, Fredric Jameson, and Gayatri Chakravorty Spivak, among others, greatly increasing Howe's rage and resentment against the postmodern. Howe nevertheless retained extraordinary prestige in the New York Times, the New York Review of Books, and the New Republic, and attracted a wide (especially Jewish) audience outside the academy. This prestige gave him little solace in what he perceived as the collapse of the Marxist experience.

After Howe's death, some of his best-known devotees became advocates of military intervention abroad, neoconservative critics of multiculturalism, and supporters of Republican officials. His intellectual legacy, institutionally preserved through Dissent, remained uncertain.

HOWELLS, WILLIAM DEAN (1837–1920). Born on the frontier in Ohio, William Dean Howells was the son of a crusading abolitionist printer and newspaper editor. Young Howells picked up rough-and-ready radical politics even before his teens. By 1861 he had written a campaign biography of Lincoln and was rewarded with an appointment as U.S. consul in Venice. When he returned to the United States in 1865, still a radical Republican, he quickly landed on his feet as assistant editor of the prestigious Atlantic Monthly, where he remained until 1881, publishing well-received novels and critical essays, basking in the company of Boston Brahmins, and learning how to be genteel and politically orthodox. Even during his Boston years, Howells still used his position in the world of letters to champion unorthodox writers. His defense of the new realists, people like Rebecca Harding Davis, Hamlin Garland, and Ed Howe, reflected ambiguities within Howells. While he was proclaiming that "the smiling aspects of life are the more American," the writers he praised and published were dealing with the dark side of emerging industrial capitalism, with poverty, ignorance, and oppression in mills, in city slums, and on the farms. By 1885 Howells experienced savage attacks from critics in England and America for the realism he defended as well as the realism in his own novels. "Practical atheism" and "mental and moral pathology," one critic, Hamilton Wright Mabie, snarled about The Rise of Silas Lapham. One event in 1887 precipitated Howells again into the public world of radical politics. When seven Chicago anarchists were sentenced to death for the "Haymarket Affair" of 4 May 1886, Howells, alone among the established literary lights, defied his publishers, his fellow writers, the press, and his readers by speaking out in defense of the condemned men. On 6 November 1887, Howells wrote in the New York Tribune that the trial had not established the guilt of the defendants, and he urged the commutation of the sentences. On 12 November four of the condemned were hanged. Howells continued to agonize about the injustice: "It blackens my life," he wrote. "This free Republic has killed 5 men for their opinions." For his courageous action Howells had to endure a storm of criticism, but he stood his ground. From 1887 on, his writing assumed a darker tone, a recognition that something had gone deeply wrong with the system. His novels Annie Kilburn (1888), A Hazard of New Fortunes (1890), A Traveler from Altruria (1894), and Through the Eye of the Needle (1907) dealt with strikes, with class injustice, with socialism. Deeply influenced by Tolstoy and William Morris, Howells now began to commit himself more earnestly and publicly to radical writing and radical politics. He championed the black writers Paul Laurence Dunbar and Charles W. Chesnutt; recommended realistic novels about slum life, Stephen Crane's Maggie and Abraham Cahan's Yekl; spoke out for equality for blacks and suffrage for women. In 1898 he publicly opposed the Spanish-American War and became president of the Anti-Imperialist League. He called himself a socialist although he never joined any socialist groups.

In old age Howells became an odd mixture of radical and conservative. President Taft spoke at his seventy-fifth birthday fete about his lucid style and kindly humor, but W. E. B. Du Bois also praised the seventy-five-year-old writer for his humanity and justice: "When a band of earnest men" spoke for Negro emancipation, "William Dean Howells was among the first to sign the call. From this call came the National Association for the Advancement of Colored People." And at seventy-five Howells marched in a parade for woman suffrage. While remaining unrepentant for his stance on America's imperialist war in 1898, he became an enthusiastic supporter of the Allied cause in World War I.

HUDSON, HOSEA (1898-1989). Retired iron molder, Communist, and former official of the United Steel Workers of America (USW) in Birmingham, Alabama, Hosea Hudson represents the hundreds of working-class, urban black southerners who joined the Communist Party of the United States of America (CPUSA) between the two wars. A labor leader in the late 1930s and early 1940s and also a prominent local Communist, he belongs to the generation forced early in the Cold War to choose between the CPUSA and the labor movement. Hudson chose the CPUSA, although he continues to be active in organized labor through the Coalition of Black Trades Unionists.

Like many southerners in his generation, Hudson was born in a rural area (Wilkes County, Georgia) and left sharecropping in 1923 for wage work after the boll weevil and a family crisis aggravated the oppressive social and economic system that he had long resented. In Atlanta he worked as a laborer at a railroad roundhouse, in the hazardous working conditions common at the time. He and his family moved to Birmingham in 1924, attracted by the prospect of high wages.

In Birmingham, Hudson became a skilled iron molder and continued with his passion for singing in quartets, distinguishing himself in both roles and hoping that his vocal talent would lead to a singing career on the radio. In early 1931, however, the Scottsboro case attracted his attention. Hudson saw this as another barely legal lynching that blacks were afraid to protest. The CPUSA's civil rights division, the International Labor Defense, defended the "Scottsboro Boys," kept them from being executed, made the case internationally known, and brought many American blacks like Hudson into the Party. After Al Murphy, a fellow black ironworker, invited him to a Party meeting in 1931, Hudson joined immediately. Until he encountered the CPUSA, Hudson had angrily questioned the southern status quo—economic and racial—without discovering any remedies available to working-class blacks who felt uncomfortable in the Interracial Commission or the National Association for the Advancement of Colored People.

One of Hudson's activities as a Communist entailed organizing the Right to Vote Club in 1938 that attempted to teach literate blacks how to qualify to register to vote. Hudson himself had only recently learned to read at a CPUSA National Training School near Ossining, New York. Between 1938 and 1940 Hudson worked in the Works Progress Administration (WPA) serving as vice president of the Birmingham and Jefferson County locals of the Workers Alliance, the WPA workers' union that was heavily Communist Party-influenced.

When the need for war matériel brought him back into iron molding, Hudson became active in the USW, serving first as recording secretary of Local 1489 and then as founder and president of Local 2815. He was also chairman of 2815's grievance committee and delegate to the Birmingham Industrial Union Council. During 1944–1945, while the CPUSA was reorganized nationally as the Communist Political Association, Hudson was vice president of the Alabama section, known as the Alabama People's Educational Association.

The Cold War years inflicted a series of injuries on Hudson from which he never completely recovered. Weakened by his immersion in the Party and many absences from home, his marriage of thirty years ended in 1946. In 1947 he was expelled from the Birmingham Industrial Union Council, fired from his job, stripped of his offices in Local 2815, and black-listed for being a Communist. In 1950 he went underground and worked for the CPUSA as a southern liaison until he moved to New York City in 1954. He remained in the North, working on two autobiographies, and moved to Gainesville, Florida, in 1985.

He sees recognition by the city of Birmingham as vindication; Mayor Richard Arrington proclaimed 26 February 1980 as Hosea Hudson Day, honoring Hudson as a civil rights pioneer and founder of the Right to Vote Club.

HUGHAN, JESSIE WALLACE (1875–1955). A pacifist proponent of nonviolent noncooperation, a socialist, and a feminist, Jessie Wallace Hughan was born in Brooklyn, New York, of nonconformist parents who were devoted to the single-tax and suffrage movements. Hughan attended Northfield Seminary in Northfield, Massachusetts, the school founded by Dwight L. Moody and famous as one of the first girls' boarding schools in the country. She received her B.A. from Barnard College in 1898 and earned an M.A. and Ph.D. at Columbia University.

While researching her dissertation on American socialism (published in 1911 as American Socialism of the Present Day), Hughan became a socialist herself. Because of her socialist activism before and during World War I, Hughan was barred from university teaching and became instead a New York public school teacher and administrator. Hughan was an absolute pacifist by 1914. Acting upon her principles, she became a charter member of the Christian pacifist Fellowship of Reconciliation, served on the executive committee of the New York City branch of the Woman's Peace Party, and organized the Anti-Enlistment League (1915–1917) to enroll men and women who opposed enlistment in or support of any international war. During this period, Hughan also worked for woman suffrage under the aegis of the Woman Suffrage Party and ran on the Socialist ticket for the offices of lieutenant governor, member of Congress, and U.S. senator (New York State).

After the war, with the cooperation of the Fellowship of Reconciliation, the Women's Peace Society (in which she was active), and the Women's Peace Union, she founded the War Resisters League, which had as its object the enrollment of men and women "who for any reason whatsoever are uncompromisingly opposed to all war" and "have determined to give no support to any war." In the 1920s Hughan, as executive secretary, worked hard to build up the League, and in the 1930s it participated effectively in activities cosponsored by the Emergency Peace Campaign, the National Peace Conference, and the Keep America Out of War Congress. The League played an important part in the formation of the Communist-front American League against War and Fascism. During World War II, Hughan and the League helped to ensure that conscientious objectors serving in Civilian Public Service Camps were permitted to choose between service in private, church-administered camps or government camps. Two years before the war's conclusion, Hughan spoke out vociferously for an early armistice to prevent the further destruction of Europe's Jewish population.

Hughan wrote extensively on pacifism, socialism, and world government, both as a scholar and theorist and as a poet. In addition to her published Ph.D. dissertation, her books and pamphlets include: The Facts of Socialism (1913), A Study of International Government (1923), The Challenge of Mars and Other Verse (1932), The Beginnings of War Resistance (1935), and Pacifism and Invasion (1941). Her writings on organized war resistance and nonviolent national defense constitute important contributions to pacifist theory.

HUGHES, LANGSTON (1902–1967). African American poet, playwright, novelist, and journalist, Langston Hughes was born in Joplin, Missouri, but grew up in Lawrence, Kansas, and Cleveland, Ohio, before settling later in Harlem. His dedication to the ideal of social justice was first developed by his maternal grandmother, Mary Langston, whose first husband had died at Harpers Ferry in John Brown's band, and whose second husband (Hughes's grandfather) had also been an ardent abolitionist. In Cleveland, Hughes was introduced to socialism by certain high school classmates, many of whom were the children of immigrants from Eastern Europe and Russia. As an emerging poet, he was shaped decisively by the democratic modernist Carl Sandburg but also found Claude McKay, then an associate of Max Eastman and other New York leftists, an ideal role model of the black writer committed at once to socialism, black progress, and literary excellence.

After a year at Columbia University (1921–1922), Hughes undertook a series of menial jobs that increased his ties to the black working class. A trip in 1923 down the west coast of Africa intensified his dislike of European colonialism, and on his return he began to publish in radical journals such as the Messenger, in addition to his usual showing in the magazines of the National Association for the Advancement of Colored People (NAACP) and the Urban League. Two books of verse, The Weary Blues (1926) and Fine Clothes to the Jew (1927), as well as the novel Not without Laughter (1930), established him as the major young writer of the Harlem Renaissance. But the onset of the Depression, the decline of the Renaissance, and a traumatic experience with a wealthy white patron drove him about 1930 to reassess his art and life.

Turning sharply leftward, in 1931 he visited Haiti and Cuba and denounced American imperialism there in the New Masses. Also visiting the "Scottsboro Boys" in prison in Alabama, he openly sided with their Communist lawyers in their controversy with the NAACP over the case. He spent a year (1932–1933) in the Soviet Union, to which he had gone to help make a film (soon abandoned) about American race relations. Warmly received, he wrote several radical poems, including "Good Morning Revolution" and "Goodbye Christ," as well as a short book, A Negro Looks at Soviet Central Asia (1934), in praise of the Soviet treatment of its darker peoples. In 1934 he wrote "One More 'S' in the U.S.A." (to make it Soviet) for a national Communist Party convention. The same year, he was elected president of the Communist-backed League of Struggle for Negro Rights. In 1938, after three months in Madrid as a war correspondent, he founded the Harlem Suitcase Theater, which staged his Don't You Want to Be Free? This play loosely combined some of his strongest poems about race with the music of the blues and exhortations about class consciousness and unity. The same year, he published a collection of radical verse, A New Song (1938), with an introduction by literary radical Mike Gold.

Such involvements made many people think of Hughes as a Communist, but he always denied Party membership. Although he lent his name to many organizations, his personal involvement, as in the case of the League, was usually token. With the Nazi-Soviet Pact taxing his socialist sympathies, World War II found Hughes in retreat from radicalism. An autobiography, The Big Sea (1940), contained virtually no reference to the Left. That year, after an attack by a right-wing group, he repudiated "Goodbye Christ" and declared his radicalism an error of his youth. Thereafter he published mainly in centrist journals, where he stressed the evils of Jim Crow. Late in the decade he published his first purely "lyrical" or non-political volume of verse, Fields of Wonder (1947), and sounded few pro-Marxist notes in his later volumes One-Way Ticket (1949), Montage of a Dream Deferred (1951), Ask Your Mama (1961), and The Panther and the Lash (1967). However, in certain poems during the war, such as "Good Morning Stalingrad," about Soviet heroism, he showed deep admiration of the Soviet people, and now and then he defended the American Left in his weekly column in the Chicago Defender. In 1948 he publicly endorsed Progressive Party candidate Henry Wallace for president, and in 1949 Hughes so vividly condemned the prosecution in New York of twelve Communist leaders that the regional Communist Party asked (and received) his permission to reprint the essay.

Toward the end of the 1940s, as his prestige rose with the success of efforts such as the musical play Street Scene (1947) with Kurt Weill and Elmer Rice, right-wing harassment at his many public readings increased. He came under closer scrutiny by the Federal Bureau of Investigation. In March 1953 a subpoena brought him before Senator Joseph McCarthy's investigating committee. Hughes named no names, but generally cooperated with McCarthy. Later in the fifties he further offended the Left by omitting leaders such as W. E. B. Du Bois and Paul Robeson, long known and admired by Hughes, from certain of his books for young persons in which they clearly belonged. At a public celebration of Robeson's sixtieth birthday, Du Bois rebuked Hughes for his treatment of Robeson.

To some extent, Hughes regretted his public break with the Left. But his main commitment from the start had been to black Americans as an embattled group, and his unprecedented career as a black writer living only by his pen depended on his close relationship to local black communities. Psychologically, too, he seemed incapable of enduring the ostracism and isolation visited on leaders like Du Bois and Robeson. Instead, he chose to safeguard his position as the most representative and most beloved of black writers.

HUMOR. In written and graphic forms, humor has played a great role in the U.S. Left, although one scarcely recognized in strategic, tactical, or theoretical discourse. Humorists have for the most part warmed up audiences, or filled the back pages of Left publications—the one exception to this rule being the cartoonist's front-page status in some Left papers. These humor workers have, nevertheless, been among the most beloved figures in the Left movements, warmly embraced by the rank-and-file radical.

Left literary humor dates to well before 1870. James Russell Lowell's Bigelow Papers savagely criticized the Mexican War. David Ross Locke, whose "Petroleum V. Nasby" protagonist epitomized the reactionary stupidity of Confederate sympathizers in the Union states, was considered required reading at Lincoln's White House. Russell B. Nye, writer of comic histories of the United States (and a good personal friend of Eugene Debs) could be racist, but was also militantly anti-war and enormously skeptical about patriotic claims in general. In the final decades of the nineteenth century, Marietta Holley added many volumes of proto-feminist satire, skewering male and female resistance to woman's rights. Mark Twain, the greatest of American humorists (and in old age an avowed socialist) labeled the "Gilded Age" and captured the banality of a feckless materialism.

Building upon these traditions, hayseed socialist commentators beginning in the 1890s press wrote affable jests at American resistance to socialist ideas. The best of the writers, editor J. A. Wayland, had special fun assailing the aristocratic pretensions of the American new rich, and the vacuousness of continued public democratic rhetoric. Oscar Ameringer swiftly emerged as the stage comic and literary comedian par excellence. In a long career spanning the early years of the century to the verge of U.S. entry into World War II, "the Mark Twain of American Socialism" wrote monologues for many publications (mostly those edited by himself), important humor agitation pamphlets, and one vastly popular comic history, The Life and Deeds of Uncle Sam.

Ameringer had many imitators during the "golden age" of native-born socialism, 1900–1915, perhaps the best known being Henry M. Tichenor, columnist for the National Rip-Saw and editor of his own satirical free-thought journal from Saint Louis, the Melting Pot. The lyrical counterpart to this literary comedy from the Industrial Workers of the World (IWW) satirical Wobbly songs in The Little Red Songbook reached as many listeners as any document in American radical history. Humorous Wobbly soapboxes also abounded, and a few (notably, T-Bone Slim) became famous for their newspaper or magazine columns.

Cartoonists drew more broadly, it is fair to say, upon international traditions, but by no means entirely so. Although little cartoon work of note appeared in the nineteenth-century socialist papers, the traditions of Bruegel, Hogarth, Daumier, Goya, and the contemporary artists of the popular German Simplicissimus and its socialistic sister publication, Die Wahre Jacob, had an impact in creating an artistic climate of wide commercial work for cartoonists.

Art Young, the most renowned of the old-style newspaper illustrators, had made a name for himself in the commercial press before shifting his activities full-time to socialism around 1910. He went on, after the decline of the socialist movement, to found a short-lived comic weekly, Good Morning (1921–1922), and to draw occasionally for the New Masses while preparing his own book-length Dantesque version of hellish modern civilization. His mostly younger colleagues at the Masses magazine, including Kenneth Chamberlain, Stuart Davis, Henry Glintenkamp, Boardman Robinson, and Robert Minor, fairly invented the "artistic" cartoon later adopted by the New Yorker among other publications, of crayon-style sketch and spare (often wry and unconsciously self-satirical) dialogue. Most devoted themselves to artistic work after 1920 (later becoming leading figures in the American Artists Congress), while the volatile Robert Minor evolved from militant anarchism to Communism and to functionary status within the Communist Party of the United States.

Within the Socialist Party and IWW press, styles evolved closer to the commercial daily comics, albeit oriented toward class consciousness and working-class enlightenment generally. Ryan Walker, publisher for a short time of the Michigan monthly the Billygoat (retitled Prophet and the Ass), became a staff cartoonist on the daily New York Call, and a frequent contributor to the National Rip-Saw among other publications. His notable inventions, The Rip-Saw Mother Goose (bound separately, and widely distributed) and the un-class-conscious worker "Henry Dubb" (many strips would end with the painful admission, "I'm the Henry Dubb!"), had a considerable following. The IWW cartoonists, drawing for a semiliterate audience often on the move, dedicated themselves to ridiculing capitalism as an economic and moral system, including within its appendages the "American Separation of Labor." Unlike the socialists, whose cartoon talent largely dissipated after 1920, the IWW had a wealth of mostly self-taught artists whose work continued for decades after.

Immigrant humor followed an almost entirely different path, with only an exceptional crossover (such as German-American Oscar Ameringer). From the 1870s, popular German-American theater included socialistic farces, almost invariably set in the old country but sometimes dealing with issues of immigrant life. A number of outstanding poets and journalists of the movement wrote and occasionally played in these dramas, which were enthusiastically received by local working-class audiences. Johann Most, who had abandoned an early thespian career after contracting a disfiguring jaw disease, was undoubtedly the most noted stage raconteur of radical "dirty jokes." (One survives: the difference between a toilet and a stock market crash is that in the the stock market, the paper falls before the crash.) After the turn of the century a variety of new immigrant groups, reputedly among the most enthusiastic the small Bulgarian following, ventured into satirical theater aimed at neighborhood audiences. Finnish theater, the most avowedly "workerist," carried comical antibourgeois dramas into many fraternal halls of the copper-mining districts. New York-based Yiddish theater, vastly popular and tinged with Left views, emphasized mainly social melodrama with only a light sprinkling of radical farce.

A portion of this comedy reached the immigrant socialist press, along with translations from Mark Twain and other capitalism-jibing authors. Morris Winchevsky, the founder of the Yiddish socialist press, contributed the most popular single column, "Di Meshugina Filosofer" (The Crazy Philosopher), writing on the foolishness of capitalism and its willing wage slaves. Immigrant radicals attained their earliest satirical publication in Der Tramp (1879), satirizing the newly rich German immigrant. The next and most important of all distinctly radical immigrant humor magazines, the Groysser Kundes (1909–1927), held the Lower East Side in rapt attention, while providing literary work for many young radicals. When after World War I the Kundes turned against the Russian Revolution, one of the more promising young writers, Sam Liptzin, founded and edited the short-lived Der Humorist (1921–1922) en route to becoming the staff humorist of the Yiddish Freiheit and author of nearly thirty Yiddish volumes of folksy humoristic commentary. The most long-lived immigrant humor publications, the Finnish weeklies Punikki, later Lap- atossu, made the transition from socialist to communist and lasted into later 1930s. Italian antifascists aimed several ephemeral 1920s publications at ridiculing Mussolini and his American supporters.

Other radical humor made a troubled but at first generally successful transition to the newly ascendant Communist movement of the 1920s. Communist literary comics and cartoonists, such as Fred Ellis, tended to be less humorous and rather more heavy-handed than socialists or Wobblies in their class-struggle treatments. But in the Yiddish press especially, the burst of creative enthusiasm inspired by the appearance of the Freiheit helped put a younger generation's talents to work. Moshe Nadir, after Shalom Aleichem the greatest comic writer in Yiddish, gave his full talents to the Freiheit during the 1920s and 1930s, with feuilletons, literary sketches, and poems. Nadir and a younger contemporary, Chaver Paver, also created popular children's books in Yiddish with humor and political pathos mixed. Cartoonist William Gropper, who also drew frequently for the Daily Worker, gained wide reputation (or notoriety) for his puncturing of Jewish socialist moderates' labor misleadership in the needle trades.

The appearance of the Popular Front created a rallying point for talented artists and literary comics, most especially but not only in the New Masses. Robert Forsythe's weekly columns (collected in the 1935 volume Redder Than the Rose) imitated the New Yorker style (or that of Canadian left-leaning Stephen Leacock, popular in the Soviet Union), sophisticated and light-handed. At the New Yorker, on the distant liberal end of the Popular Front, Robert Benchley lent his talents to the Spanish Civil War, and the darkly ironic Dorothy Parker became a longtime supporter of Left causes (well into the McCarthy era), especially in defense of legal victims. When Forsythe took a leave from his New Masses columns, William Saroyan or S. J. Perelman—best known for his screenwriting of several Marx Brothers films—occasionally spelled the regular columnist. In Hollywood, comedy screenwriter Donald Ogden Stewart became one of the film industry's most important intellectual-activists.

The New Masses, like the Masses, possessed a special attraction for artists only peripherally involved with politics as such. A wide proliferation of styles and themes, abstract or didactic, worldly, near-cynical, and evangelistic by turns, became a principal feature of the weekly. Few noted artists remained after the Hitler-Stalin Pact and the subsequent decline of the magazine. In these days, however, even the Daily Worker acquired staff comic artists, the most talented of whom, Louie Furstadt, produced Little Lefty, a popularly followed children's strip.

For the smaller Left movements with their weekly papers, an individual cartoonist often gained almost an especially exalted stature. These artists took special pleasure in skewering the Communist movement and the Soviet Union (Stalin in particular) for betraying the cause of the Left. Thus Jesse Cohen, pen-named "Carlo" in the Trotskyist movement's Labor Action, not only concentrated the political message of the paper into one terse line-drawing, but reputedly also served as a teller of difficult truths in party ranks through his verbal repartee. Laura Gray, drawing for the orthodox Trotskyist Militant, reached the rare status of a leading woman humor artist. Only perhaps the eldest groups, the Socialist Labor Party with Walter Steinhilber and the IWW with a number of artists, continued to cling to the historical themes such as capital stealing from the workers' pockets.

Hollywood, with all of its prohibitions and political-artistic limitations, gave left-wing humorists their widest audience. Charlie Chaplin, a left-wing sympathizer, had thrilled audiences of the silent years and added his anti-Hitler classic for the intellectual crowd. During the 1930s young writers who shaped various genres, including some of the most prestigious "women's films," also delivered outstanding screwball comedies. Donald Ogden Stewart's scripts for Katharine Hepburn were marked by gender-conscious humor, and Ring Lardner, Jr., would author her role in Woman of the Year (1943). Communist activists Robert Lees and Fred Rinaldo, writers of award-winning shorts in the 1930s, became Abbott and Costello's leading writers in the following decades. At less prestigious slots, left-wing formula screenwriters treating picaresque gangster themes, proletarian romance, war comedy, or even Blondie and Dagwood and "B" westerns found ways to ridicule bourgeois pretensions. Silenced by the Blacklist, these writers often reemerged under pseudonyms in television, authoring episodes of Hogan's Heroes, some of Norman Lear's productions, The Danny Thomas Show, The Dick Van Dyke Show, The Donna Reed Show, and Bachelor Father.

Meanwhile, the vanishing theatrical farce took a new form in folk music. Woody Guthrie, the most creative and popular of the artists, wrote a folksy humor column in the Daily Worker and loaded up his often woeful lyrics with wry asides about bourgeois politics and technological fantasy. Burl Ives, Pete Seeger, the Weavers, and others reproducing rural songs and adding to them a revived genre of labor tunes, wove humor into generally serious themes, while widely entertaining the children of the Left.

The Cold War and McCarthyism made radical humor difficult to perform safely. Talented humorists lost their radical connections, or were badly isolated. Ventriloquist Paul Winchell (whose dummy, Jerry Mahoney, was named after a Tammany politician) went from public appearances for Vito Marcantonio to other things. Zero Mostel suffered a prolonged blacklisting for his refusal to appear as a "friendly witness," and sitcom actor Philip Loeb, at the peak of his fame as a co-starring member of The Goldbergs, was driven from television and committed suicide several years later. "Professor" Irwin Corey, later a performer at Jewish Currents events, held fast to Jewish progressivism. Numerous other radical-minded humor writers and actors in Hollywood and elsewhere, simply languished in their careers or steered clear of all political commitments.

With the rest of the Left, radical humor went into hiding. Mad Comics, which developed the technique of satirizing commercial mass culture through a close examination of its details, was developed by Harvey Kurtzman, child of the Yiddish Left and teenage assistant to the Daily Worker's Louie Furstadt. After an unsuccessful effort to create a cartoonists' union, several artists came together in Mad magazine, which shunned most political issues as such, but flayed Joseph McCarthy. Paul Krassner, close friend of the Mad staff, began a nightclub stand-up act and launched the Realist in 1957. His determinedly tasteless and vulgar approach to contemporary political-cultural hypocrisy would be followed, some years later, by the Lower East Side musical group the Fugs, whose lyricist, Tuli Kupferberg, had wide political connections. Tom Lehrer, a Yale mathematics instructor whose concerts and records mocked 1950s bomb-culture, racism, and consumerism, had a largely campus following. But perhaps Jules Feiffer, more civil libertarian than radical, made the most popular dissenting statements, generally about the status of artist or intellectual under capitalism run rampant.

Some of the same took place among the small number of African-American Left humorists. Langston Hughes, whose "Semple" series of barroom dialogues on social topics circulated widely in the black press, received little recognition in the mainstream for his biting humor, and himself eased away from open Left involvements. Ollie Harrington, whose radical-humorous Bootsie ran for many years in the Pittsburgh Courier, moved to East Germany and began decades of drawing mostly bitter issues-oriented cartoons for the American Communist press.

Kurtzman's Help! magazine of the early 1960s (staffed for a time by a young Gloria Steinem) introduced to a wider public two of the most famed dissident cartoonists of the New Left days. Gilbert Shelton and R. Crumb. Shelton, a former history graduate student at the University of Texas, had first gained wide recognition drawing for the Rag, one of the earliest and most political-minded underground newspapers. Shelton moved between political-cultural satire and a celebration of the hippie lifestyle. Crumb, obsessed with many subjects (especially sexuality), made extended commentaries on social pathology, and nurtured a mostly hidden socialistic sympathy. Along with many of the other underground cartoonists, the two provided the alternative press a staple attraction, and created a new genre of mostly satirical, sometimes broadly political, often ecologically minded, occasionally feminist-inclined comic books. The earliest outright political venture, Radical America Komiks (1969), edited by Gilbert Shelton, appeared as an issue of the informal journal of Students for a Democratic Society. Of more straightforward cartoon work in the underground press, Ron Cobb's mordant commentaries on self-destructive technowar culture became a signature of the times.

Leftish comedy found its way to performance more difficult, but not impossible. Barbara Garson's MacBird! traveled to dozens of campuses and community performances, with most impact before the close of Lyndon Johnson's presidential administration. The San Francisco Mime Troupe put on a larger and more sustained road show, during the time of Vietnam especially anti-war in emphasis. In later years, a series of avowedly radical-political performers who toured many localities with leftish raps included Flo Kennedy and lesbian Robin Tyler (herself briefly a major television performer). A "First Radical Humor Festival" at New York University, in 1982, sought—sometimes successfully—to combine performers, artists, and audience in a mix of generations and styles.

Somewhat closer to the mainstream, the albums of the Firesign Theatre reflected anti-war, anti-establishment values. Among the mainstream radical-minded comic performers from the later 1960s to the early 1970s, one could include the Smothers Brothers (one of them of a particularly socialistic sympathy) and Dick Gregory. In television, the tastes of the sixties-style baby boomers had become the mainstream, so that an anti-war or anti-racist message could be delivered within existing comedy-drama formats. Hollywood Blacklist victim Ring Lardner, Jr., thus proved instrumental in a critical turn of the media via Larry Gelbart's adaptation of Lardner's *M*A*S*H* film to anti-war progressive Alan Alda's talents. Later, Robin Williams and Richard Dreyfuss made comedy statements in a variety of films considerably to the left.

By the 1980s, Left humor had already taken on an emphatically postmodern edge. Processed World, a Bay Area quarterly, characteristically drew upon Situationist styles (which had barely made an appearance in the 1960s) to describe and satirize the world of new-age office work under high-tech conditions. Avant-garde and sometimes leftist "punkzines" with circulations from a few hundred to a few thousand assumed the post-industrial, catastrophic reality as fixed and sought to locate a space for humor within it. The newest breed of dissenting comic artists to have their work printed in the radical and liberal as well as mainstream press—Nicole Hollander, Matt Groening, Berke Breathed, and Bill Griffith among them—focused on the layered world of images and the surreality of the little, good or bad, that had not become swallowed up by an image-world now patently out of control. Later developments such as the emergence of Groening with The Simpsons only reinforced this sensibility of status. While a small handful of comedy actors identified with left-wing or feminist causes, most of Hollywood's laugh machine went politically silent, as if waiting to refocus on the familiar targets of class privilege and bourgeois banality.

HUNGARIAN AMERICANS. The origins of Hungarian radicalism can be traced back to the failed revolution of 1848 and the flight of Lajos Kossuth and others who found asylum in the United States. But for the most part this immigration followed the general pattern of other eastern and southern Europeans. About 1.7 million Hungarians emigrated from the Austro-Hungarian Empire before World War I and between one-third and one-half of these were Hungarian-speaking Magyars. Most were peasants, but a third were industrial and/or itinerant workers, whose acquaintance with socialism and unions in Budapest and other Hungarian cities laid the basis for the development of the Hungarian American Left.

The Hungarians concentrated in New York, Newark, Philadelphia, Pittsburgh, Cleveland, Hartford, Chicago, and other large eastern and midwestern cities, working primarily in mining and heavy industry, especially coal, stockyards, iron, steel, and in the 1930s rubber and automobiles. Within these industries Hungarians were frequently given the most dangerous jobs, with resultant high accident rates. In New York, Chicago, Cleveland, and the smaller cities of New Jersey, skilled workers congregated and worked in trades such as printing, cabinetmaking, and painting.

Although there were at least four Hungarian locals of the American Federation of Labor (AFL) among the printers, carpenters, furniture workers (Wurlitzer piano makers), and miners, the AFL had little impact among Hungarians because the vast majority of Hungarians were unskilled. Many of the unskilled were used as strikebreakers, but some were active in the Industrial Workers of the World and published a Hungarian-language paper in Chicago, Bermunkas (Wage Worker). In the 1920s Hungarians played a prominent role in the Passaic, New Jersey, textile strike, providing organizers such as James Lustig with more than $15,000 in cash. Since most Hungarian workers were concentrated in the mass-production industries, they also played a role in organizing the most important of the unions affiliated with the Congress of Industrial Organizations: the United Automobile Workers, United Steel Workers, International Fur and Leather Workers, and the United Electrical Workers (especially Julius Emspack), in the United Mine Workers, the Painters Union (especially Louis Weinstock), and the Carpenters Union.

Because most Hungarian American radicals integrated themselves into the union movement, the Socialist Party, the Socialist Labor Party, and the Communist Party, it is difficult to trace their particular ethnic contribution. But involvement in the Left grew out of, and drew strength from, Hungarian sick and benevolent societies (e.g., Altalanos Magyar Munkas Betegseglyz, Hungarian Workers Benefit Association), and especially from the Hungarian Left press that developed at the turn of the century.

In 1905 the Socialist Party founded its own paper, Előre (Forward), which has continued under various names and radical sponsorships until the present day. From period to period, as the economic or political situation permitted, it came out as a weekly, a bi-weekly, and a daily. During World War I it became very attentive to American and international issues, with less emphasis on Hungarian nationalist concerns. It also took a strong anti-war and anti-imperialist position and as a result the Wilson government took away its mailing rights and investigated and arrested a number of its editors and supporters. Hungarian American radicals fought against the restrictions against Előre by delivering the paper by hand and by mailing it to subscribers in other packages.

The postwar repression and Red Scare was more than offset by the excitement generated by the Hungarian Revolution in 1918–1919. Readership increased greatly as radicalism and nationalism were joined. The Hungarian Left in America was further strengthened when, after the failure of the revolution, a coterie of intellectuals, artists, writers, and left-wing leaders migrated to the United States. At the same time the Socialists split, the Communist Party was founded. Many of the leaders of the Hungarian American Left followed the leadership of the Communist Party, including the editors of Előre, which was renamed Uj Előre (New Forward) on 5 November 1921. The paper was published in Chicago, New York, Cleveland, and finally back in New York again in 1937.

During the 1920s and 1930s the press and sick and benevolent associations such as Rakoczi (named for the leader of the 1903–1911 revolution) and certain branches of Verhobay helped sustain a sense of community with educational meetings, picnics, and banquets. But the most important unifying force was opposition to the fascist regime of Miklos Horthy that ruled Hungary from 1919 through World War II. The post-World War I period saw a flowering of cultural and political activity. There were about forty weekly papers supported by Hungarian Workers Clubs in dozens of cities from Akron to Hartford to Newark to Elizabeth. In 1927 the Anti-Fascist League in the United States was formed by groups associated with the Communist Party, and in 1937 it met in Buffalo and reorganized as a Popular Front organization, the Hungarian Democratic Federation, which attracted prominent Hungarian American liberals such as the actor Bela Lugosi, who served as its president, as well as Communists such as the artist Hugo Gellert.

With the war over and the establishment of the Hungarian People's Republic, there was a major split in the Hungarian community. One group supported Hungary's ties with the Eastern bloc and the others were very opposed. In the early 1950s, Uj Előre, which had been renamed in 1938 to support the Popular Front, became the weekly Magyar Szo (Magyar Voice), which openly supported the Communist regime.

The Hungarian American community suffered a major jolt with the brutal Soviet repression of a popular uprising in 1956. The Magyar Szo remained supportive of the Communist government and because of its point of view lost a good deal of its readership. But in addition to this political difficulty, there was a natural attrition of the older Hungarian readership, who died or moved to California or Florida. The Magyar Szo continued into the late 1980s as a weekly, although in reduced form.

HUTCHINS, GRACE (1885–1969). Born in August 1885 into a privileged Boston family, Grace Hutchins went on to become one of the principal writers on wage-earning women for the Communist Party, USA. Throughout her life, Hutchins researched and wrote on labor, women, and children's issues. Being especially concerned with the working lives of women in both industry and agriculture, she was committed to the Communist Party as the solution for women's oppression and the strategy for their emancipation.

After graduating from Bryn Mawr in 1907 and working in local Boston women's and social service organizations, Hutchins left for China to become a missionary. Here she worked as a teacher and principal at Saint Hilda's School for Girls in Wuchang from 1912 to 1916. On her return she was employed briefly as a teacher of social work, joined the Socialist Party and actively campaigned against U.S. involvement in World War I. Hutchins took classes at Columbia University Teacher's College and at the New York School of Social Work, specializing in labor problems, and served on the Labor Research Committee for the Rand School of Social Science. During this period she was committed to Christian Socialism and believed in the potentially emancipatory rhetoric of Christianity. These ideas were presented in the book Jesus Christ and the World Today, co-authored with her life-partner and colleague Anna Rochester, and published by E. P. Dutton in 1922. This text encouraged Christians to deal with social issues and explored Jesus' teachings in light of modern theories of society. Both Hutchins and Rochester were actively involved with the Fellowship of Reconciliation, a Christian pacifist organization, and Hutchins worked as secretary with Devere Allen from 1922 to 1924. She also served from 1924 to 1926 on the staff of the Fellowship's widely circulated monthly publication the World Tomorrow.

In 1926 Hutchins and Rochester traveled abroad and visited, among other places, Japan, China, and the Soviet Union. Hutchins wrote numerous articles during her travels that were published in such magazines as the Survey and the World Tomorrow. It was this time spent in the Soviet Union that helped cement their newfound faith in Communism, and, returning in 1927, they joined the Communist Party and broke formal ties with the Fellowship of Reconciliation. Hutchins then spent several months in a civil service position with the Bureau of Women in Industry of the New York State Department of Labor. That same year, Hutchins and Rochester were among those arrested on the picket lines protesting the judicial murders of Sacco and Vanzetti. From 1928 to 1929 Hutchins worked on the staff of the Eastern Bureau of the Federated Press, a left-leaning, progressive news-media organization. It was during this period that Hutchins co-founded the Labor Research Association (LRA), an organization devoted to providing information—reports, statistics, pamphlets, and books—for labor unions. Her colleagues involved in this enterprise were Anna Rochester and Robert Dunn. Along with her prolific writings for the LRA, Hutchins also wrote Labor and Silk in 1929. This text focused on conditions in the textile industries and was in part motivated by her experiences with these industries in Japan and China. Included among the LRA pamphlets she wrote were: Women Who Work (1932), Youth in Industry (1932), Children under Capitalism (1933), What Every Woman Wants (1936), and The Truth about the American Liberty League (1936). She edited LRA's Railroad Notes from 1937 to 1962 and was joint editor of the seventeen issues of the biennial Labor Fact Book. All her publications were under the auspices of International Publishers.

Hutchins's most famous book, Women Who Work (1934)—an expanded version of the LRA pamphlet—became a representative work of the Communist Party's Third Period. In this text she analyzed the situation of working-class women by presenting a brief history of their place in the work force and their "double burden" as household- and wage-workers. She chided such strategies as the Equal Rights Amendment that would overturn protective legislation for women and considered the National Woman's Party an organization of bourgeois, middle-class women, interested mainly in securing professional recognition and equality with men for women of their own class. Instead Hutchins gave a solid class analysis, arguing that women could achieve emancipation only through their participation in social production. Comparing the situation of women in such capitalist countries as the United States with the situation of working women in the Soviet Union, she concluded, "Equality of men and women workers is maintained in every phase of life in the land where workers rule." In 1952, Hutchins updated her argument in a shorter edition that reflected the Party's changing position vis-à-vis reformist women's organizations.

During the 1930s Hutchins also ran unsuccessfully for political office in New York on the Communist ticket, and from 1940 to 1967 she co-owned the Daily Worker newspaper. She was an officer of the International Labor Defense and active in the bail fund of the Civil Rights Congress. In the 1950s she helped raise large funds (among which were her own personal inheritances) to support the Smith Act defendants. Hutchins was listed in government publications during the 1950s as a sponsor of Communist-front organizations and was named during the course of Whittaker Chambers's appearance before the House Un-American Activities Committee. During these later years she was a sponsor of the Citizens Committee for Constitutional Liberties and a strong supporter of the American Committee for Protection of Foreign Born. She died in 1969, three years after her life-partner Anna Rochester. The couple had lived together for more than forty years, sharing an apartment in Greenwich Village and a cottage in Croton-on-Hudson, New York.

ICOR. Founded in 1924 in New York, the Organization for Jewish Colonization in Russia, or Yidishe Kolonizatsye Organizatsye in Rusland—known by the transliterated acronym ICOR—was active for a quarter-century among Yiddish-speaking working-class Jews. Along with a sister movement, Ambijan, founded in 1935, its main aim was to provide support for the establishment of a Jewish socialist republic in Birobidzhan in the Soviet far east. The ICOR's politics also revolved around the defense of the Soviet Union, which, it maintained, was eliminating anti-Semitism; the struggle against fascism (especially, after 1933, Nazi Germany); and opposition to Zionism, an ideology deemed inimical to the Jewish working class.

Closely tied to the Communist Party, USA, by the mid-1930s the ICOR claimed a membership of eleven thousand, spread out over 165 branches in twenty-five states and four Canadian provinces. Included were eleven women's branches and thirteen exclusively for youth, as well as occupationally-based groups, such as the Amalgamated ICOR, for tailors in the garment industry. New York State, with thirty branches, led the list; the Workers Cooperative Colony in the Bronx had its own special section, alone numbering 228 people. California and Illinois each had seventeen branches, and Los Angeles had the second-largest overall number of members after New York City. Large ICOR branches could be found in Baltimore, Boston, Cincinnati, Cleveland, Detroit, Kansas City, Minneapolis, Newark, Pittsburgh, and Philadelphia.

Charles Kuntz, the president, was a non-Communist; Sol Almazov and Abe Epstein, both members of the Communist Party, were secretary and national organizer, respectively. The national executive included the Communists J. M. Budish, Melech Epstein, Louis Hyman, Kalmen Marmor, Gina Medem, Paul Novick, Joseph Sultan, and Leon Talmy. Almazov edited the bilingual English-Yiddish monthly ICOR, later renamed Nailebn—New Life, which occasionally attained a circulation of fifty thousand. The ICOR also published numerous books and pamphlets.

In 1929, the ICOR sent a commission of experts to Birobidzhan to study its economic potential, and it later furnished financial assistance and even some colonists to the region. In the United States, it sponsored reading tours, lectures, banquets, and mass rallies, such as those held all over the country in 1937 to celebrate the twentieth anniversary of the Bolshevik Revolution.

The anti-Communist climate after World War II proved destructive to the ICOR and Ambijan. The remaining fifteen hundred members of the two groups merged and held their final national conference in New York in 1949, their last honorary president none other than Albert Einstein; they ceased operations in 1950.

ILLINOIS WOMAN'S ALLIANCE. Culminating the landmark Illinois Factory Inspection Act of 1893, the work of the Illinois Woman's Alliance, or IWA (1888–1894), stands as an early and successful example of a united front. Although delegates from each of thirty organizations in Chicago participated in its governance, socialist and labor activists led its most vital campaigns.

In 1888 the Chicago Times published a series of articles, "City Slave Girls," that described the miserable conditions in factories and sweatshops employing women and children. In response, Elizabeth Chambers Morgan, a local socialist and founder of the Ladies' Federal Labor Union 2703, a mixed union of women workers affiliated with the American Federation of Labor, formed a committee to verify the Times's report. Convinced of its accuracy, the committee called upon a number of women's organizations to form a coalition "to prevent the moral, mental, and physical degradation of women and children as wage-workers."

The IWA, formed in November 1888, waged a major campaign for investigation of factory conditions and for compulsory-education legislation. In Chicago the IWA worked to improve working-class neighborhoods by demanding more and better schools and by calling for the construction of public bathhouses. In cooperation with the Chicago Trades and Labor Assembly and Jane Addams's Hull House, the IWA sponsored a successful legislative bill prohibiting the employment of children younger than fourteen and promoting the appointment of women factory inspectors. The IWA also campaigned against police harassment of prostitutes.

For its brief life, the IWA stood as a model cross-class coalition. Joining prominent members from the Chicago Women's Club as well as medical, temperance, and charitable societies, the IWA sponsored some of the era's most important political campaigns on behalf of the state's working women and children and the Chicago working-class community. The depression of 1893 and the Pullman strike of the following year exacerbated class tensions and pulled apart members of the coalition, and the IWA collapsed under the pressure.

INDEPENDENT SOCIALIST CLUBS/INTERNATIONAL SOCIALISTS. The tradition of dissident revolutionary socialism associated with the Workers Party in the 1940s and carried on by the Independent Socialist League in the 1950s was revived in the early 1960s by Hal Draper and an energetic cohort of young recruits in Berkeley, California. Although the movement's revolutionary expectations failed to materialize in the 1970s, Third Camp socialists helped build major rank-and-file movements in the trade unions and upheld a serious intellectual alternative to social democracy in a period of wholesale retreat from revolutionary politics.

The first Independent Socialist Club (ISC) was formed in Berkeley in September 1964 by Draper, Joel Geier (leader of the Young People's Socialist League), and other left-wing dissidents from the Socialist Party milieu. The ISC played a catalytic role in the development of radicalism on the Berkeley campus, influencing the free speech movement and aiding the creation of union locals among faculty and teaching assistants. Although its opposition to the authoritarian features of Castroism, Maoism, and the Vietnamese National Liberation Front (NLF) placed limits on the group's capacity to grow at a time when much of the student Left was increasingly enthralled with Third Worldism, the ISC's analytical sophistication and revolutionary politics enabled it to recruit many high-quality activists. It supported black power, aided California farm workers' struggles, and spearheaded the ballot drive of the Peace and Freedom Party, a Left alternative to the Democratic Party, in 1967–1968.

As additional ISCs sprang up, a loose national federation headquartered in New York coalesced in 1967 and began publishing a quarterly, Independent Socialist (1967–1969), from Berkeley. By recruiting some prominent student radicals—including Jack Weinberg, whose arrest for civil rights activism sparked the free speech movement—the Independent Socialist Clubs of America could boast a modest growth. In September 1969, with 180 members in ten clubs, the group voted to become the International Socialists (IS). The new name signified the group's alliance with a larger, dynamic British organization of the same name led by Tony Cliff, as well as its intention to construct a more coherent, active organization. After Students for a Democratic Society imploded (a self-destruction that IS tried to prevent) IS attracted several new clusters of student radicals. By 1970, the group had 275 members. Half resided in the Bay Area.

IS called for unconditional U.S. withdrawal from Vietnam. While politically opposing what it considered the NLF's Stalinism, IS supported military victory for the NLF on the grounds that all popular Vietnamese sentiment against imperialism and Saigon had been channeled into the NLF. IS argued that North Vietnam and all comparable regimes, including the Soviet Union, represented a new type of class system. Most members viewed the Communist regimes as "bureaucratic collectivist," but some called them "state capitalist." All agreed that revolution from below would be necessary to replace the new forces of class rule with workers' democracy.

The creation of IS marked a conscious turn of what was mostly a student group, albeit with working-class politics, toward concerted activity within the American working class. In 1970, the national office was moved to Detroit, International Socialist was replaced by a more frequently published tabloid, Workers' Power (1970–1979), and Geier became national secretary. The group began to "industrialize"—which it defined as IS members' taking jobs in strategic industries in order to help organize worker opposition to both the corporations and bureaucratic union leadership. An early strategy of supporting "struggle groups" independent of the unions and modeled on black revolutionary workers' organizations rapidly gave way within a year to the labor strategy that IS would pursue throughout the 1970s: building and supporting rank-and-file opposition caucuses within existing trade unions. As a resolution adopted at the 1972 convention put it, "We proceed from the class struggle as it really is today, and not as we wish it. We propose directions for the growing rank and file movement without making sectarian demands on that movement."

This approach to the labor movement distinguished IS from much of the New Left, which wrote off the unions as hopelessly privileged and conservative. IS upheld the classical Marxist position that labor was revolutionary in potential and that workers comprised the only class capable of overturning capitalism. Against social democrats and Communists who sought leadership influence, IS dedicated itself to the union ranks and to uncompromising "class struggle unionism." Unlike organizations which interpreted Leninism as a license to constitute small, self-declared "vanguards" and instruct the masses by socialist evangelicalism—an approach that tended "to increase the number of socialist organizations rather than the number of socialist workers," as Kim Moody put it—IS sought to enter into the ranks of the industrial working class and connect workers' concerns to socialism in a direct and unmanipulative fashion.

In the early 1970s, however, IS suffered some important losses, including the resignation in January 1971 of Hal Draper and others in Berkeley over trade union policy. The largest split was the 1973 expulsion of the Revolutionary Tendency. Led by Chris Hobson, Ron Tabor, and Sy Landy, the Revolutionary Tendency—which had one third of the 350 IS members and temporarily led a majority bloc in 1972–1973—came to advocate a more orthodox Trotskyist approach, including use of the transitional program. After the expulsion, the tendency created its own organization, the Revolutionary Socialist League, which suffered many splits of its own and eventually dissolved into the anarchist Love and Rage milieu.

IS supported gay liberation and feminism, and it maintained a youth group, Red Tide. But it focused primarily on labor. During the 1974–1975 downturn, the first significant American economic stagnation in decades, IS turned leftward under the expectation that the labor bureaucracy would be unable in a period of economic decline to satisfy the needs of rank-and-file workers. IS leaders predicted that the resulting crisis within the labor movement would present an enormous new opportunity for a class-conscious rank-and-file upsurge, and they considered the development of a "workers' combat organization" a real possibility. Accordingly, IS turned toward a highly disciplined organizational model, centralizing power in the executive committee, using Workers' Power as both an agitational paper and organizer of the group's work, and appointing Glenn Wolfe, a transplanted British IS dissident, to the position of national secretary in 1975 with the aim of "Bolshevizing" the organization. Membership, however, peaked at five hundred in late 1975 and fell from then on. Voluntarism chiefly produced factionalism and burnout. At the 1978 convention, therefore, IS voted to drop its party-building and centralism (a policy that in practice had been abandoned by late 1976).

Despite these organizational difficulties, the rank-and-file labor approach pursued diligently by the members of IS throughout the 1970s and 1980s produced many constructive, long-lasting institutions that promoted rank-and-file interests in an unfavorable period. In 1976, such IS members as Ken Pfaff were pivotal in the creation of Teamsters for a Democratic Union, an amalgamation of earlier reform efforts among truckers. Teamsters for a Democratic Union eventually recruited ten thousand rank-and-file Teamsters, helped to upend the mob-influenced bureaucracy, created a new atmosphere of militancy and fightback in the ranks, and spearheaded the 1991 election of outsider Ron Carey as Teamster president. Similar rank-and-file initiatives in the automobile and steel industries, while not as spectacular, were aided and influenced by IS. In 1979, Kim Moody, Jane Slaughter, and Mike Parker, IS members, helped found Labor Notes, which through numerous books, semiannual conferences, and the monthly paper itself became a powerful magnet for reform tendencies in the trade union movement.

The fallout from the overblown expectations of the mid-1970s, however, resulted in two damaging end-of-decade splits. The first took place after Cleveland staffers Barbara and Cal Winslow organized a secret faction at the instigation of the IS's British sister organization. Tensions had emerged between the U.S. and British leadership, in part because of differences over Portugal, where a Proletarian Revolutionary Party nearly led a Portuguese revolution in 1974–1975. The American IS supported the party, but the British leadership came to consider it inadequately committed to mass party-building. Debate within the IS, however, centered primarily on labor policy, especially the validity of industrializing middle-class students. IS voted at its 1977 convention to expel the minority faction, which formed the International Socialist Organization (ISO), remained loyal to the British Socialist Workers Party (as the British IS had redesignated itself), and published Socialist Worker. While the Winslows were forced out in the early 1980s, several other IS veterans—including Peter Camarata and Geier—joined the ISO.

Meanwhile, an IS minority which had resisted the expulsion of the ISO nucleus began to criticize what it viewed as an increasing leadership accommodation of left-leaning officials and union opposition campaigns unconnected to rank-and-file movements. In 1979, cumulative frustrations finally led this tendency, which included Steve Zeluck, Robert Brenner, Johanna Brenner, and Joel Jordan, to resign from IS and form a new group, Workers Power. Workers Power launched the magazine Against the Current (1980–1985), which sought to address the challenge that American history and conditions pose to socialist theory.

Both Workers Power, with about fifty members, and the IS, with 150, faced difficult conditions: economic hard times, the near-collapse of the Left, and the rightward turn of bourgeois politics. Some, including Wolfe and Weinberg, dropped out of organized socialist politics. IS found it hard to maintain industrial concentration, although both Labor Notes and Teamsters for a Democratic Union provided homes for broad collaboration on the labor Left. In its activism and magazine Changes (1979–1985), IS supported the Polish trade union movement Solidarność and the Sandinista revolution in Nicaragua. From 1979 on, IS tried to initiate “regroupment” discussions within the broader revolutionary Left, but the desired unity, especially with Maoists beginning to accept work within the Democratic Party, remained elusive. (IS, Workers Power, and the ISO all continued to insist upon the need for a labor party independent of the Democrats). In 1986, regroupment did meet with success when IS recombined with Workers Power as well as Socialist Unity—formed in 1984 by a group of revolutionaries expelled from the U.S. Socialist Workers Party and sympathetic to Ernest Mandel's neo-Trotskyism—to create a new, multi-tendency revolutionary socialist organization: Solidarity.

Solidarity, with former Socialist Unity leader Joanna Misnik its main organizer for its first ten years, declared in its founding statement that it had no pretense to being “the vanguard” but that it hoped through experimental activism to contribute to the rebirth of revolutionary democratic socialism in the United States. Beginning in 1986, it sponsored a new series of Against the Current, a freewheeling forum for Left analysis and debate, edited primarily by David Finkel, Dianne Feeley, Alan Wald, Robert Brenner, Sam Farber, and Susan Weissman, the last two of whom did not belong to the sponsoring organization. Solidarity recruited many young activists, published a youth magazine, left turn (1986–1993), and absorbed several smaller groups emanating from the Socialist Workers Party, including the Fourth International Tendency and Activists for Independent Socialist Politics. By the mid-1990s, Solidarity had 350 members. In 1994, it began to publish Independent Politics as an additional organizational voice.

INDIANS. Asian Indians in the United States boast a long history of radicalism that is often obscured by dominant perceptions of Asian Americans as passive and conservative. Between 1907 and 1914, some six thousand Indians, mostly Sikhs, immigrated to the United States from India, the Philippines, and Canada. Most were Punjabi farmers; others were veterans of the British forces that had suppressed the Boxer Rebellion in China in 1900. The tide of Indian immigration was curbed almost immediately as xenophobic sentiments rose sharply in the United States, and Indians were expelled from communities along the West Coast in 1907–1908. By 1917 the U.S. government established a total ban on Indian immigration.

The Indian diaspora was largely produced by turn-of-the-century British colonial policies, including drastic land-tenure reforms; and these reforms in combination with a devastating famine impelled many Indians to seek work abroad. Upon reaching North America, Indian migrants encountered racist policies and violent attacks that were exacerbated by the British government's unwillingness to intervene on their subjects' behalf. These abuses conspired to create a strong anticolonialist, nationalist sentiment among Indian migrants whose support for an independent nation-state did not evidence nostalgia but a strong commitment to the improvement of working and living conditions of Indian laborers. The establishment of these anti-imperial groups depended upon the collaboration of workers and student-intellectuals. A small percentage of Indian migrants were students, mainly Bengali, many of whom had already become involved in the nationalist movement. The British partition of Bengal and its mishandling of the plague in the Punjab fueled nationalist anger and generated protests. The British responded to this up-surge of political activism in Indian colleges and universities by expelling student activists, whereupon hundreds of young nationalists sought refuge in universities in Japan, Europe, and the United States. Despite the well-known racial prejudice against Asians that often frustrated interracial labor coalitions, Indian radicals found sympathy for their anticolonial struggle since British colonialism was decried by many Americans, including anti-imperialist liberals and Irish immigrant activists fighting for Ireland's independence. The expanding Socialist Labor Party (SLP) and the newly founded (1905) Industrial Workers of the World (IWW) both actively welcomed Asian immigrants as members, opening up new political space for Asian American radicalism.

The Indian nationalist movement in the United States coalesced around the Ghadar Party, which was established in 1913 by two young Indian activists, Taraknath Das and Har Dayal. A former college student, Das became a political agitator in 1905. Fleeing arrest in India, he spent a short time in Tokyo before coming to the United States in 1906. In 1907 Das was denied U.S. citizenship, but he became a translator for the U.S. Immigration Service in Vancouver, British Columbia, where he began to publish the Free Hindustan, a nationalist newspaper. Das was fired for refusing to stop publishing his paper and relocated to Seattle, where he continued to publish the Free Hindustan with the help of local socialists and Indian students. In 1909 he enrolled in Norwich University, a well-known military college in Vermont. Advocating Indian independence, he persuaded several Indian students to enroll before he himself was expelled for his political activities.

Har Dayal went to California in 1911. Unlike Das, who had come from a poor background, Dayal was from a wealthy high-caste family. Dayal taught Indian philosophy at Stanford University without pay but spent most of his time in political activity. He read Marx, Bakunin, and Kropotkin, became secretary of the Radical Socialist Club in San Francisco, and founded the anarchist Bakunin Club.

Das and Dayal organized the Ghadar Party under the auspices of the Hindu Association of the Pacific Coast and the Sikh Kalhsa Diwan, the major Sikh organization in California. The party brought together the two streams of Indian immigrants in America: Bengali Hindus, who were primarily students and intellectuals, and Punjabi Sikhs, who worked as agriculturists and lumbermen. Dayal became the first editor of the party's newspaper, Ghadar (Urdu for revolution), which was published in Seattle and Oakland and circulated in India as well as throughout the Indian diaspora in Southern and East Africa, the Caribbean, and Central America. The newspaper linked the nationalist movement to issues of racial discrimination and mistreatment in the United States and created a transnational community of radicals, as the mobilization of Indian patriots on four continents following the Komagata Maru Incident would later demonstrate. Apart from independence from Britain, the party had broad if vaguely articulated revolutionary goals. Supported by the IWW, the SLP, and Irish American nationalists, the Ghadar Party advocated a strategy of direct action and immediate agitation similar to the strategies adopted by the IWW. The anarchist influence on Dayal could be seen in the party's faith in spontaneous mass uprisings.

Indians everywhere were galvanized by the Komagata Maru Incident of May 1914. When hundreds of Indians aboard a chartered Japanese freighter, the Komagata Maru, attempted to land at Vancouver, they were denied entry by Canadian officials according to laws that had been enacted to curb nonwhite immigration. The standoff lasted two months, during which time nearly the entire Asian Indian population of the West Coast was mobilized in support of the would-be immigrants. After the Indian appeal to the British crown went unheeded and supplies petered out, the Komagata Maru returned to Yokohama. The incident had underscored the helplessness of the Indian community in the Americas while strengthening the appeal of the Ghadar call for revolution.

With the outbreak of World War I, more than a thousand members of Ghadar returned to India to attempt to foment a popular anti-British uprising. The British government had long since infiltrated the party, however, and upon their arrival the Ghadarites were immediately arrested; hundreds were imprisoned and dozens executed. After the United States' entry into the war, Das and other leaders of the Ghadar Party were arrested and threatened with deportation for their anti-imperial activities. Defending the Ghadarites still in the United States from deportation became a civil rights issue for anti-imperialists and the Left in general. The IWW, the Socialist Party, and an assortment of liberals united to organize the Friends of Freedom for India. Its lobbying efforts failed to prevent the passage of a bill in 1914 whereby aliens who advocated political change in any country were subject to deportation. Dayal was arrested soon after and deported as an anarchist. He fled to Switzerland, and Ram Chandra, a co-founder of the Party, replaced him as head of the movement and editor of Ghadar, which continued to be distributed throughout the Indian global diaspora. The Ghadar Party, its hopes for a popular uprising smashed, its leadership dispersed and relentlessly persecuted, and its organization infiltrated, collapsed as a revolutionary threat to British rule in India after Ram Chandra was assassinated in 1918.

INDUSTRIAL ARMIES. During March and April 1894 America's unemployed organized several "industrial armies" in response to the depression that had begun the previous June. By massing on Capitol Hill they hoped to pressure Congress into enacting public-works measures designed to provide temporary jobs.

Jacob Coxey (1854–1951), a wealthy quarry owner from Massillon, Ohio, led the most publicized contingent and thereby gave his name to a movement that at its peak numbered a dozen major "armies" and twice as many smaller ones. Although only three hundred marchers actually massed on Capitol Hill on May Day, the movement may have enrolled as many as six thousand members and many times that number of sympathizers.

An estimated thirty thousand people gathered to watch Coxey's band march down Pennsylvania Avenue. Several sympathizers clashed with police when they prevented Coxey from speaking on the Capitol steps. Police later arrested Coxey, his associate Carl Browne, and Christopher Columbus Jones, leader of the Philadelphia contingent, and charged them with carrying banners on the Capitol grounds in violation of an act of Congress. They each spent twenty days in jail. The "petition in boots" failed to move Congress, but because of extensive press coverage the industrial army movement dramatized the plight of America's jobless as nothing before had done.

In 1891 Coxey had conceived a program of hiring the unemployed to improve the nation's roads. The American Federation of Labor endorsed the plan at its 1893 convention. The idea of marching the jobless to Capitol Hill to dramatize Coxey's program originated with Carl Browne, a Californian who met Coxey at a reform congress in Chicago during the summer of 1893. Coxey and Browne spent the following winter in Massillon planning the march. During that time Coxey proposed that Congress issue non-interest-bearing bonds to finance his public-works program.

The novelty of the crusade attracted a phenomenal amount of press coverage. More reporters traveled to Massillon for the start of Coxey's march than covered major party political conventions. Before the protesters reached Washington some major dailies devoted six of their seven front-page columns to the march. Some reporters called it the biggest story since the Civil War. Without question the press manipulated news of the march to create a maximum amount of entertainment and suspense. This was not yet yellow journalism, but in its tendency to sensationalize the march, press coverage revealed a distinct yellowish tinge.

News of Coxey's crusade gave rise to numerous imitators among the jobless of the Midwest and Far West, where the largest contingents formed. Armies numbering from five hundred to a thousand men arose spontaneously in Los Angeles, San Francisco, Portland, Tacoma, Seattle, Spokane, Salt Lake City, and Denver. Smaller contingents from places like Reno, Butte, and Omaha joined forces with West Coast armies as they made their way east.

Marchers from the Far West expected to obtain cheap or free rail transportation to Capitol Hill. Failing that, they simply took and operated the trains themselves. Some fifty major and minor incidents of train stealing took place. Sensational chases occurred in Montana, Oregon, Idaho, and California when federal marshals and the U.S. Army sought to recapture trains stolen by industrial armies. U.S. attorney general Richard Olney worked closely with railroad and state officials to crush the movement throughout the West. In Idaho, for example, federal officials constructed a special prison camp to deter armies traveling east from Oregon and Washington. Such deterrents, together with declining press coverage after May Day and growing interest in the Pullman strike, ended the industrial army movement.

The press labeled the protesters "industrials," "Coxeyites," and "Commonwealers," the latter name deriving from Carl Browne's official title for the movement: "The Commonweal of Christ." Reporters also portrayed the protest in military terms. They invariably described marchers as belonging to armies and regiments and bestowed on Coxey the rank of general, although he originally avoided martial terminology.

Almost all marchers were men, but in several places women formed auxiliary units and at least two women served as "generals." These were Carlotta Cantwell, who led the combined Tacoma-Spokane army after her husband abandoned the men in Montana, and Anna Smith, who headed an army of California marchers.

One of those who joined the movement was Jack London, who accompanied a California contingent from Reno to the Mississippi River and recorded his experiences in a diary. Mother Jones encouraged marchers in the Kansas City area.

Upon his release from prison, Coxey returned to Ohio. He campaigned for public office often—distinguishing himself primarily as an indefatigable monetary reformer—and lost, with the exception of being elected mayor of Massillon in 1931. He repeated his march on Washington in 1914, and this time spoke legally from the Capitol steps. On 1 May, 1944, on the occasion of the fiftieth anniversary of the great march, he again mounted the steps of the Capitol and with the permission of Speaker Sam Rayburn and Vice President Henry Wallace completed the protest speech he had attempted to give there in 1894. It was a measure of how times had changed that after the New Deal, his speech hardly seemed radical.

INDUSTRIAL UNIONISM. The struggle for industrial unionism has been a central theme in American labor history since the late nineteenth century. Efforts to organize unskilled workers and to confront major corporations have often faced fierce opposition from employers and the state. Not surprisingly, these efforts have often brought the Left into a prominent role within the labor movement, while they have more often than not been opposed by the official leadership of the organized labor movement. Into the 1980s, the struggle for industrial unionism has continued to be a magnet for militancy and radicalism within the labor movement.

Coal miners and rail workers, employed by America's largest industrial corporations in the late nineteenth century, were the first to try to develop industrial unions. In the early twentieth century, labor activists and radicals attempted to spread industrial unionism throughout America. They argued that organizational and technological changes were destroying the bases for craft unionism. They pointed to the Homestead, Pennsylvania, strike of 1892. There, a strong craft union and a unified community were defeated by their employer's ability to transfer production to other plants and to replace skilled workers with the new technology of the Bessemer furnace. Activists likewise pointed to the hundreds of thousands of new immigrants arriving each year, taking unskilled jobs in the new, expanding industries owned by gigantic, impersonal corporations. A new approach was needed to reach these new workers, the militants argued, as well as to deal with the new corporations and their new technologies.

Experienced unionists, Socialist Labor Party veterans, socialists, anarchists, and labor radicals joined to establish the Industrial Workers of the World (IWW) in 1905. Their approach—revolutionary industrial unionism, prepared to cripple the American economy through a general strike—was opposed to the conservative craft unionism of the “American Separation of Labor.” Leaders of the American Federation of Labor (AFL) in turn condemned the new organization. Their opposition helped corporations and the state destroy the IWW during World War I and thereby derail the struggle for industrial unionism.

Labor radicals in organizations of all sorts kept alive the idea of industrial unionism during the 1920s and early 1930s. Welfare capitalism, company unionism, and the open shop combined with new technologies and new investment patterns to decimate the organized labor movement. Yet small, committed organizations like the Trade Union Unity League, the Communist Party, Trotskyists, and even remnants of the IWW and the old Socialist party continued to put forward the struggle for industrial unionism, particularly among unskilled workers. Here and there, skilled workers experimented with “amalgamation movements,” linking up different groups of skilled workers employed by the same corporation and moving toward collective action and broader-based organization.

During the 1930s, conditions—wage cuts, speed-ups, deteriorating working conditions, management capriciousness in layoffs and recalls—combined with the more long-term industrial trends we have already noted—technology, managerial reorganization, the emergence of multiplant corporations—made industrial unionism the necessary first step for a labor revival. At the base, the new unions were built by experienced unionists and committed radicals, many of whom had participated in the efforts to keep industrial unionism alive in the 1920s and early 1930s. John L. Lewis of the United Mine Workers was the symbolic figurehead and the ultimate leader of the Congress of Industrial Organizations (CIO). Together with union leaders from clothing, steel, rubber, printing, auto, electrical products, and meatpacking, Lewis spurred the greatest union organizing drive in American history. In campaign after campaign, the Left provided organizers, leaflet writers, newspaper editors, resources, and communication networks.

In the aftermath of World War II, the Left was largely exorcised from the CIO, and the CIO unions were gradually incorporated into, first, the systems of collective bargaining and business unionism, and then back into the arms of the AFL. The two labor federations merged in the mid-1950s. As part of the “social contract” in Keynesian and Cold War America, industrial unionism lost much of its historic thrust.

In the 1980s, changing conditions restored the struggle for industrial unionism at the heart of the labor movement. Corporations have diversified and gone multinational, thereby sapping America’s industrial base, undermining industrial unions, and confronting industrial workers with unprecedented demands for concessions. Faced with declining manufacturing membership, the AFL-CIO unions have resorted to mergers and amalgamations, and have taken in workers from industries not in the least related to their traditional bases. Industrial workers have found themselves a minority in their own unions, unable to control the decisions that will affect their lives. The Hormel struggle of 1985–1986 made this clear. Not surprisingly, this protracted conflict saw expressions of solidarity, militancy, and union democracy rarely seen in fifty years. It also saw a similar return of official union leadership opposition to the struggle for industrial unionism, as well as an opening for the Left.

INDUSTRIAL WORKERS OF THE WORLD.

Meeting in Chicago in 1905, more than two hundred socialists and trade unionists launched the Industrial Workers of the World (IWW), a union based on the principles of Marxist class conflict and the indigenous American philosophy of industrial unionism. Soon nicknamed the Wobblies, the IWW sought to recruit unskilled and exploited immigrants, non-whites, women, and migrant workers who were excluded from craft unions of skilled workers organized by the American Federation of Labor (AFL).

Industrial Workers of the World "silent agitator" sticker.

The IWW sought to create "one big union" through which workers would own the means of production and distribution. This transformation of society would stem from a process of nonpolitical revolution and on-the-job actions that would wage effective war on the great combinations of capital. The IWW opposed the conservative defense of exclusive craft interests and the AFL craft structure, which Wobblies claimed were frequently at the expense of unskilled or semiskilled workers.

Delegates to the founding convention included Bill Haywood, then secretary of the Western Federation of Miners; Eugene V. Debs, the leader of the American Socialist Party; Mother Jones, the legendary fighter for miners' and children's rights; Daniel De Leon, the leader of the Socialist Labor Party; A. M. Simons, editor of International Socialist Review; Charles O. Sherman, secretary of the United Metal Workers; William E. Trautmann, editor of the United Brewery Workers' German-language newspaper; Father Thomas J. Hagerty, editor of the American Labor Union's Voice of Labor; and Lucy Parsons, widow of one of the Haymarket martyrs. The struggle over issues of political action and administrative structure that began at the convention were not resolved until 1908. By that time, secretarian socialist feuds and organizational tensions had led to the defection of many groups and individuals. Among these were the Socialist Labor Party, which set up what it called the real IWW in Detroit (1905), and the Western Federation of Miners, which joined the AFL in 1911. Those who remained in the IWW now focused on "building a new society in the shell of the old" through industrial unions that would become the basis of the new "workers' commonwealth." The preamble to the IWW constitution, as amended in 1908, encapsulated the spirit and structure of the IWW in concise but dramatic language. The IWW perspective would not change in any significant fashion thereafter. As amended, it stated:

The working class and the employing class have nothing in common. There can be no peace so long as hunger and want are found among millions of working people, and the few, who make up the employing class, have all the good things of life.

Between these two classes a struggle must go on until the workers of the world organize as a class, take possession of the earth and the machinery of production, and abolish the wage system.

We find that the centering of the management of industries into fewer and fewer hands makes the trade unions unable to cope with the ever growing power of the employing class. The trade unions foster a state of affairs which allows one set of workers to be pitted against another set of workers in the same industry, thereby helping defeat one another in wage wars. Moreover, the trade unions aid the employing class to mislead the workers into the belief that the working class have interests in common with their employers.

These conditions can be changed and the interest of the working class upheld only by an organization formed in such a way that all its members in any one industry, or in all industries if necessary, cease to work whenever a strike or lockout is on in any department thereof, thus making an injury to one an injury to all.

Instead of the conservative motto, "A fair day's wage for a fair day's work," we must inscribe on our banner the revolutionary watchword, "Abolition of the wage system."

It is the historic mission of the working class to do away with capitalism. The army of production must be organized, not only for the everyday struggle with capitalists, but also to carry on production when capitalism shall have been overthrown. By organizing industrially we are forming the structure of the new society within the shell of the old.

The IWW soon became known for its revolutionary tactics of direct action, its dynamic leaders, and its inspiring songs and graphics. IWW membership rolls included workers of all occupations, skill levels, races, and national backgrounds. Immigrants with paid-up union cards in their native countries were eligible for immediate membership. Initiation fees and dues were extremely low so as not to be a barrier to poorly paid workers. As labor-management contracts were viewed as an interference with labor's unconditional right to strike, the IWW would not sign contracts, a controversial position it did not abandon until the 1930s. Strikes rather than contracts were the fuel for IWW militancy, for strikes built the experience and perspective needed for the general strike that Wobblies thought would overthrow the capitalist system. Militarism was condemned, and membership could be denied to anyone who joined a state militia or the police. Labor Day was celebrated on 1 May rather than during the first week in September, the choice of more conservative unions.

From 1905 to 1914, economic conditions in the United States aggravated labor discontent with rising prices, stationary or declining wages, a series of depressions, and widespread unemployment. The IWW became a militant expression of class war in the United States, directing or taking part in at least 150 strikes in the pre-World War I period. Among the most significant of these were the Goldfield, Nevada, Miners' strike (1906–1907), the Lawrence, Massachusetts, textile workers' strike (1912), the lumber workers' strikes in Louisiana and Arkansas (1912–1913), the Paterson, New Jersey, silk workers' strike (1913), and the Mesabi Range ironworkers' strike (1916). Important IWW units existed in lumbering, construction, agriculture, and dock work and marine transport. The organization was also briefly successful in numerous eastern textile towns, in Colorado's coal mines, in the copper mines of Arizona and Montana, and the oil fields of Oklahoma. Although the organization was criticized for not building stable unions and at its peak had only 100,000 dues-paying members, the IWW shook the nation with an impact disproportionate to its size.

Not least among its accomplishments was the erosion of sexual, racial, and ethnic divisions within the working class. The IWW local that controlled the Philadelphia docks, the IWW cigar-makers' locals in Pittsburgh, and the IWW lumber-workers' union in the South were racially integrated. Ben Fletcher, the African American who was the major leader in Philadelphia, was considered a national IWW leader as well. Women such as Elizabeth Gurley Flynn and Matilda Rabinowitz led not only women workers, but male workers as well. Flynn traveled throughout the nation and was known as "the Rebel Girl." Rabinowitz organized textile workers in New England, cigar makers in Pittsburgh, and auto workers in Detroit. Thousands of Spanish-speaking workers on the East Coast who had been denied AFL membership on the basis of their ethnic background became the backbone of the IWW mariners' unions. The IWW also had numerous Spanish-speaking members throughout the Southwest.

Widespread labor education was carried on through propaganda leagues, industrial educational clubs, events at ethnic halls, hundreds of thousands of leaflets, national circulation of newspapers (printed in fifteen languages), libraries in union halls, the Work Peoples College in Duluth, Minnesota, clubs and camps for "junior Wobblies," and "entertainments" that included debates, singing, lectures, and skits. Some of the most effective educational material was published in the IWW's Little Red Songbook, a major contribution to workers' culture in America. In addition to the prolific and legendary Joe Hill, IWW songwriters and poets included Richard Brazier, Ralph Chaplin, Covington Hall, Laura Payne Emerson, and T-Bone Slim. IWW songs were sung on picket lines, in hobo jungles, and at mass meetings. Chaplin's "Solidarity Forever" eventually became American labor's national anthem. IWW graphics and IWW cartoons set new standards of excellence and are admired by professional artists and art historians as well as the politically engaged.

When the IWW tried to recruit members in the "slave market" sections of cities where the unemployed gathered between jobs, it found itself drawn into fights to protect the rights of free speech and assembly. From 1907 to 1917, Wobblies conducted some thirty such struggles to protect their right to speak on street corners to fellow workers. During these dramatic confrontations, thousands of IWW members and sympathizers filled city jails. Many were seriously injured and a few killed before the organization generally reestablished the First Amendment rights to assemble peacefully, distribute publications, and address gatherings in public. Americans not otherwise attracted to the IWW philosophy took part in these struggles and respected the IWW's dedication to civil rights. Roger Baldwin, founder of the American Civil Liberties Union, considered the IWW contribution to civil liberties of paramount value.

Preceding and during World War I, the IWW retained its antimilitary stand and opposed U.S. involvement in the war. In contrast to the no-strike policy adopted by the AFL after the United States entered the conflict actively, the IWW continued to lead strikes. These wartime strikes gave employers and the government the opportunity to accuse the IWW of treason. In September 1917 U.S. Justice Department agents raided IWW offices throughout the nation with warrants branding the entire leadership—over two hundred men and women—as subversives. In the major trial in Chicago, nearly a hundred Wobblies, virtually the entire first and second tier of past and present leaders, were sentenced to federal prison terms of from ten to twenty years, with accompanying fines of $10,000–$20,000.

Little judicial effort went into protecting IWW members from community hysteria. Employer-funded vigilante groups and patriotic leagues were as likely as police units to raid IWW halls, homes, gatherings, and meetings with impunity. The persecution was soon intensified by criminal syndicalism laws passed in many states with the specific objective of destroying the IWW. Every form of intimidation was employed. An infamous incident that took place on Armistice Day, 1919, is indicative of the temper of the anti-IWW campaign. A group of American Legion members in Centralia, Washington, led an attack on the local IWW hall with the goal of destroying furniture and beating up members as had been done in past incidents. IWW Wesley Everest, a war veteran still wearing his uniform was castrated and lynched for resisting the assault. Seven other resisting IWW members were sentenced to jail terms of from twenty-five to forty years and most remained in prison until 1933.

Legal defense and amnesty campaigns began to sap the strength of the IWW, and controversy over what terms the jailed members should accept for amnesty racked the membership. Further internal discord arose concerning relations with the nascent American Communist movement. At first the IWW was sympathetic to the Bolshevik Revolution, and in 1920 the Bolsheviks asked the IWW to join the Communist International. Prominent Wobblies such as Bill Haywood, George Hardy, Elizabeth Gurley Flynn, and Charles Ashleigh were among those attracted to Soviet communism. The IWW per se, however, became increasingly critical of the Soviet system. Events such as the repression of the Kronstadt revolt of 1921 and the role of communists in the Italian factory crisis of 1920 fed an organizational alienation that became outright enmity by the end of the 1920s.

The IWW held to its belief in the gradual acquisition of control of industry by economic action on the job. This was in contrast to the Communist position that accepted industrial unionism but insisted that a "vanguard party" built on democratic centralism was necessary for the overthrow of capitalism. More than ever the IWW demanded democratic bottom-up control of organizations and it grew ever more skeptical of political solutions and the influence of outstanding individual leaders.

In the 1920s the IWW became a victim of changing industrial technology and changes in the labor force that sapped its areas of greatest strength. Other membership losses were suffered through ruthless employer suppression during the "open shop" campaigns of the period and by the appeal to some workers of the Communist Party. Despite these problems, the IWW continued to propagate widely the philosophy of industrial unions, the necessity of absolute solidarity, and the tactics of direct action. It retained an organizational presence at sea and among farm workers, and in 1928 it led an important strike in the Colorado mine fields.

During the Great Depression, the IWW joined with others to set up "unemployed unions" to provide housing and food for the jobless. In 1932–1933 the IWW unit in Detroit was active in the growing protests staged by auto workers. IWW members contributed their militancy and experience in the sit-down strikes and other activities that eventually led to formation of the United Automobile Workers. IWW members played similar roles in other industrial centers, but rarely ended as the union chosen by the workers. An exception took place in Cleveland, where the IWW gained representation of workers in a dozen or so plants, a representation it would retain until 1950.

Perhaps the IWW's greatest contribution was in laying the foundation for the tactics and philosophy that led to mass organization of the unskilled, foreign-born, nonwhite, and female workers in the unions affiliated with the AFL and the Congress of Industrial Organizations of the 1930s and 1940s. IWW strike techniques—the sitdowns pioneered in Schenectady (1906), the chain picketing in Lawrence, Massachusetts (1912), the car caravans in Colorado (1928), and other innovations—once considered revolutionary, became the practice of the labor movement in general.

The IWW also left a mark in the civil rights field, where it aroused liberals to form permanent defense organizations to protect the rights of dissenters. IWW agitation against “employment sharks” led to regulation of commercial employment agencies, and IWW agitation against notorious prison abuses helped bring about more humane prison conditions. The IWW also pioneered in the organization of migratory workers, particularly farm workers. The style and heroism of the IWWs was such that Wobblies have been honored in American literature in a manner unique for labor radicals. Among the many American writers who have written positively about the IWW are Upton Sinclair, John Dos Passos, Eugene O'Neill, B. Traven, and James Jones. Joe Hill has become a martyr for all of labor, and a song in his honor gained great popularity in the anti-war movement of the 1960s.

Membership has declined to under a thousand and only a few locals have on-the-job representation, but the IWW has retained a vigorous press. Since the 1960s there has been a resurgence of interest in IWW history and philosophy, resulting in a remarkable wave of books, plays, memoirs, oral histories, and films that deal in part or in whole with the IWW and its legacy. Fred Thompson (1900–1987), who joined the IWW in the early 1920s, served a sentence at San Quentin federal penitentiary, and was first elected to the general executive board in 1928, was an adviser on many of these projects. Thompson, the official IWW historian, was called upon by virtually every researcher on the IWW and dedicated himself to preservation of an authentic IWW history. The single most important element in that effort occurred when the organization donated its archives to Wayne State University in Detroit, where they are available to the general public as well as scholars.

INDUSTRIAL WORKERS OF THE WORLD CARTOONS. The Industrial Workers of the World (IWW) is the only North American labor union that produced a distinctive and enduring tradition of cartooning. In the IWW's heyday, from the early 1910s through the mid-1920s, its cartoons were almost as effective in "fanning the flames of discontent" as the famous Wobbly songs.

The Socialist Party's cartoonists—those of the Masses, for example (Art Young, John Sloan, Robert Minor, et al.) tended to be professional artists who worked for large commercial dailies and fashionable magazines; their work was slick, stylish, intellectual, subtle, sometimes skipping into preciosity. Wobbly artists, however, tended to be self-taught amateurs, and their art, reflecting the predominance of hoboes in the union's membership during its most active years, was huskier and brasher, or, as some might say, cruder and more vulgar.

At least one of the IWW's founding fathers, Thomas J. Hagerty, had tried his hand at cartooning, and the most famous Wobbly of them all, the martyred Joe Hill, was a cartoonist as well as a writer of songs. Another well-known Wobbly bard, Ralph Chaplin, author of "Solidarity Forever," contributed scores of cartoons to the IWW press over the years.

The following brief accounts of some representative IWW cartoonists should convey something of the range and quality of Wobbly art.

Ernest Riebe. Notwithstanding the fact that he was the creator of the best-known and longest-running IWW comic strip, Mr. Block—the slapstick misadventures of a blockheaded worker who believes the boss is always right—little is known of Ernest Riebe other than that he was born in Germany and lived in or near Minneapolis during his IWW years. Mr. Block debuted in the Spokane Industrial Worker, the IWW's "Official Western Organ," on 7 November 1912, and continued to appear in that paper, and later in other IWW publications, through the early 1920s.

Before Riebe, IWW cartoons were mostly of the serious editorial type. With Mr. Block Riebe helped create the distinctively aggressive variety of hobo humor for which the IWW became so renowned. His scratchy energetic drawings were well-suited to his raucous gags.

Inspired by Riebe's work, Joe Hill's "Mr. Block" song recounted several of the strip's early episodes; first published in January 1913, it soon became one of the most popular lyrics in the IWW's Little Red Songbook.

A collection of twenty-four Mr. Block strips was published as a comic book later in 1913 (evidently the first use of the comic-book format for specifically revolutionary propaganda); a few strips also appeared as postcards. A smaller comic booklet, Mr. Block and the Profiteers, was issued in 1919. Riebe also contributed a poem and a play involving Mr. Block to the IWW press. Several other early Wobbly cartoonists, including "Dust" Wallin and Ern Hanson, introduced the Mr. Block character into their own cartoons, and from time to time the strip has been revived in IWW publications, even in recent years.

In addition to Mr. Block, Riebe did numerous single-panel cartoons, among them a remarkable anti-patriotic series, "Under the Stars and Stripes," featured on page one of the Industrial Worker from May through July 1913. Later he drew cover cartoons for the One Big Union Monthly. His ironically titled Crimes of the Bolsheviks, a pocket-size comic booklet published in 1919, was, like all IWW literature at that time, emphatically pro-Bolshevik in content.

Ern Hanson. Of Norwegian descent, IWW cartoonist Ernest Henry Hanson was born 2 June 1889 in Forest City, Iowa. At twelve he moved west with his parents, first to California and then to Portland, where he worked at the printing trade. Introduced to labor radicalism in Arizona in 1914, he soon afterward joined the IWW on his way to the North Dakota harvest. In 1917, while "beating the draft by keeping on the move from job to job," he became an IWW traveling delegate. He took part in the union's famous May Day, 1919, eight-hour strike, in which the "bindle-stiffs" burned their "lousy blankets" in the public squares of large and small towns and logging camps throughout the Northwest.

Hanson was secretary of the Missoula, Montana, IWW local in 1924 but, like thousands of other Wobblies, left the organization in the wake of the so-called decentralist split. After hoboing much of the first three decades of his life, in his Wobbly days he worked mostly as a logger, and off and on as a trapper and trail cook. In the late 1920s he settled in Idaho as an employee of the U.S. Forest Service, from which position he was fired in 1953, evidently at the demand of the Federal Bureau of Investigation, as "a danger to the national interest." Returning to work as a logger at age sixty-four, he retired on a small pension two years later. He died in 1981 or 1982.

Ern Hanson contributed some of the weirdest and most ornate cartoons ever to appear in the IWW press. Most of these were published in the Industrial Worker, the union's western organ, which had a large hobo readership. His grotesque portrayal of "Scissor Bill"—the Wobblies' name for any hopelessly non-class-conscious, boss-loving worker, mercilessly drubbed in one of Joe Hill's songs—was Hanson's greatest creation, and figured in many of his cartoons.

C. E. Setzer. One of the greatest Wobbly cartoonists, North Carolina-born C. E. Setzer (1905?–1970?) joined the IWW's Lumber Workers Industrial Union 120 in 1922, and from time to time also worked as a harvest hand, construction worker, and machinist. Over the years he served the IWW as branch secretary, general executive board member, and organizer on the Boulder Dam project in the early 1930s, but his abundant and highly original cartoons were his most enduring contribution. Although he did some notable pen-and-ink drawings, his best work was done in linoleum-block, a medium he originally chose simply to save the Industrial Worker the cost of photoengraving. Signed "X13" (from his IWW "red card" number), or with his initials, Setzer's distinctively thick-lined, grotesque cartoons, bristling with an oftentimes savage humor, are unique in the annals of modern cartooning. Reduced versions of several of his linocuts have appeared as IWW "silent agitator" stickers.

William Henkelman. A machine-gun instructor in the U.S. Army during World War I, William Henkelman was among the American Expeditionary Forces who mutinied when sent to Russia at the close of the war in an effort to crush the revolution. Honorably discharged, he resumed the trade of sign-painter and lined up in the IWW in the early 1920s. Over the years he lettered many signs for IWW halls and meetings, and later for the Veterans Home in Yountsville, California, where he spent the last decades of his life. More important, he became one of the IWW's most prolific and imaginative cartoonists.

The range and power of Henkelman's cartoons reveal his constant search for new and unusual ways of expressing the IWW message of working-class self-emancipation. Among his cleverest cartoons are his Wobbly adaptations of well-known advertisements, in which commercial slogans are humorously made to subserve IWW aims. In 1945 he prepared an IWW calendar to commemorate the union's fortieth anniversary, and he did the cover for that year's edition of The Little Red Songbook. For many years he drew, with a stylus, directly on stencils, numerous cover illustrations for the IWW's mimeographed convention proceedings and internal General Organization Bulletin.

Carlos Cortez. Foremost of the more recent Wob cartoonists is Carlos Cortez (b. 1923), probably the only IWW artist whose work has been exhibited at New York's Museum of Modern Art. Inspired above all by the work of the famous printmaker of the Mexican Revolution, José Guadalupe Posada, and the German expressionist Käthe Kollwitz—international influences that reflect his own heritage as the son of a Mexican Wobbly father and a German socialist-pacifist mother—Cortez is best known for his large linocut poster-portraits of Joe Hill, Ricardo Flores Magón, Lucy Parsons, and Ben Fletcher. In earlier years he contributed many linocuts to the Industrial Worker, but when the paper switched to offset in the 1960s, he began drawing pen-and-ink cartoons. Poet and songwriter as well as artist, Cortez has also served as editor of the Industrial Worker and on the union's General Executive Board, and is one of the IWW's most popular public speakers. In 1985, to commemorate the union's eightieth anniversary, he organized an important exhibition, "Wobbly: Eighty Years of Rebel Art," featuring original works by many IWW cartoonists of the past and present.

INDUSTRIAL WORKERS OF THE WORLD SONGS.

From its inception in Chicago in 1905, the Industrial Workers of the World (IWW) provided members with an ample platform for cultural expression: songs, stories, skits, jests, cartoons, artifacts. Trade unionists, anarcho-syndicalists, and socialists brought diverse ideological messages to the new organization. Similarly, hard-rock miners, straw cats, textile hands, and sisters and brothers in a thousand mines and mills declaimed or warbled in a rainbow of tongues. Unlike many radical unionists before and after 1905, the IWW accepted strange accents and multiple styles as proper in enhancing its appeal.

IWW pioneers did not create a rich body of song lore either by decree or magic. Rather, founders came to Chicago well acquainted with two tested musical genres: formal radical fare (for example, Socialist Songs with Music, issued by Charles Kerr, 1901) and traditional occupational folk song (not yet gathered in books, but present in the various craft, regional, and ethnic communities).

In short, to understand the IWW's contagious musical blend, one must hear in the mind's ear rebel unionists who knew "L'Internationale" and "La Marseillaise" as well as they knew homespun shanties and ballads indigenous to forest bunkhouse, hobo jungle, or mountain mining camp. Before and during the IWW's formative years, textile workers literally sang "Hard Times in the Mill"; coal diggers and hard-rock "ten-day stiffers" shared the mournful "Only a Miner"; itinerant toilers along countless miles of railroad tracks spun out pieces such as "Big Rock Candy Mountain" and "Hallelujah, I'm a Bum"—in straight or bawdy form, compensatory vehicles for rootlessness.

With the appearance of IWW newspapers (Industrial Worker in Spokane, Solidarity in Cleveland), readers submitted texts for fresh poems, often set to then-popular vaudeville or parlor music or gospel-hymn tunes. In 1909, the Spokane IWW branch gathered some two dozen numbers, new and old, into a pocket-size booklet with an extended title: Songs of the Workers: On the Road, in the Jungles, and in the Shops; Songs to Fan the Flames of Discontent.

After the nickname "Wobbly" began circulating (1913–1914), enthusiasts coined short booklet names: Little Red Songbook, Wobbly Songbook. Still in print, they have gone through many editions. Over the years, various editors have deleted particular songs either for dated polemical content or in response to changes by members both in personal taste and regarding external issues. At times, behind-the-scenes debate on difficult items has revealed switches in position on large organizational matters: job action, sabotage, lifestyle, gender, relations with other sections of the Left. Thus, a critical overview of all Wobbly songs would complement standard histories.

Although the IWW discouraged personality cults within its ranks, songwriter Joe Hill achieved legendary status in the labor movement. Hill's life as a Swedish emigrant to the United States, his capacity to pen two dozen memorable Wobbly songs within a five-year span, his trial for murder and death by firing squad in Salt Lake City (1915), and unresolved questions of guilt or innocence combined to elevate him into the workers' pantheon.

The extensive literature on Joe Hill (by writers as different as Gibbs Smith, Joyce Kornbluh, Wallace Stegner, and Ralph Chaplin) leads readers beyond his biography to bedrock questions on the nature of Wobbly lore and its "fit" as a chip in the mosaic of labor's heritage. IWW composers strove to nurture revolutionary consciousness. Each piece—whether elegiac, sardonic, or comic—served to educate/agitate. Songs were intended as building blocks in altering bourgeois mentality, and in anticipating a new social order—the commonwealth of toil.

In everyday practice as Wobblies sang at migrant campfires, in meeting halls, and during free-speech rallies, much of their song repertoire melted away. Some texts proved too taxing to sing; others had been set to tunes that lost out in style wars; still others became irrelevant as the IWW declined. However, a handful entered tradition—some as folk songs, some as trade-union classics. Not all Wobblies have enjoyed sharing songs across institutional lines, nor upon hearing treasures performed by pragmatic craft unionists and reformist allies.

Wobblies known for bravery on the strike front were powerless to control the trajectory of "their" songs, or to determine life or death for given pieces. In 1927, Carl Sandburg happily noted folk rank for "The Preacher and the Slave." Under varied titles ("Long Haired Preachers," "Pie in the Sky"), Joe Hill's parody of the hymn "The Sweet Bye and Bye" reached beyond labor's sphere to comment upon moral values in the American polity.

Ironically, a ballad "born" outside the IWW orbit yet memorializing Hill achieved more fame than most pieces in The Little Red Songbook. "Joe Hill" opens with "I dreamed I saw Joe Hill last night alive as you and me." It has been sung by Paul Robeson, Joan Baez, Pete Seeger, Joe Glazer, and many other stalwarts. Alfred Hayes and Earl Robinson offered it initially in 1936 at Camp Unity near New York City. Their gift—forged on a Communist Party Popular Front anvil—has sometimes been erroneously attributed to Hill himself by commentators who allege that he composed it as a salute to fellow workers and a prophecy of immortality.

Present-day IWW activists divide in assessing their musical heritage. Some assert, "Economic forces outweigh cultural expression; we need to alter conditions at the point of production; class struggle relegates song lore to a derivative role." Others suggest that IWW songs capture the union's spirit better than its manifestoes, pamphlets, and proceedings: "We should not apologize for our songs; rather, let's use them as ambassadors to working people wherever they toil."

Today, Wobbly songs seem suspended between cultural domains. Many are obscure. A few live in folk tradition. Not one has achieved national popularity associated with Broadway, Nashville, or Hollywood. Nevertheless, labor partisans treasure The Little Red Songbook for internal cheer, oppositional message, and humane promise. Essentially, each Wobbly song that carries into the next century will affirm the linkage of poetry to cause, as well as music's use in defining individual and social identity.

INMAN, MARY (1894–1985). A Marxist-feminist theoretician who rejected the label "feminist", Mary Inman covered a broad agenda in her writings on women's oppression. These ranged from decrying the demeaning portrayal of women in the Maggie and Jiggs comic strip and protesting "cheesecake" photos in the major Communist Party newspapers to a long-standing and bitter debate with the Party over the correct position on the "woman question." Underpinning all her writings was Inman's argument that the production of life was as important as the production of life's material requirements.

Raised in Oklahoma, Inman personally learned about women's role in social production when she became the "mother of the house" at age thirteen. Three years later, after a short-lived flirtation with fundamentalism, she became a socialist. In 1917 Inman married Frank Ryan, an organizer for the Industrial Workers of the World in Tulsa. Along with other Wobblies, they were both run out of town by vigilantes in November of that year. To escape detection, the couple began to live under her surname and eventually legalized Inman as their family name. In later years, Inman jokingly referred to herself as a "Lucy-Stoner," a woman who kept her own family name after marriage, following in the footsteps of Lucy Stone.

Inman began writing on women in the mid-1930s, after reading Clara Zetkin's conversations with Lenin. When her six-hundred-page manuscript was rejected by the Party, Inman turned to Harrison George, a Wobbly comrade who had become the editor of the People's World in San Francisco. He published condensed portions of the manuscript in weekly installments, after which time, in 1940, it went into three printings under the title In Woman's Defense. Although it was initially well received by women like Elizabeth Gurley Flynn and Mother Bloor, the Party launched an official attack in 1941 in a series of articles by Ruth McKenney in the New Masses. These were eventually followed by the publication of A. Landy's pamphlet Marxism and the Woman Question.

The balance of Inman's original manuscript was published in revised form in 1942, under the title Woman-Power. Inman's works were banned by the Party and she was forbidden to write on the woman question for one year. Though she was expelled from the Party in 1942, Inman nevertheless honored the discipline, breaking her silence with the pledge that "never again will the woman's movement be without a militant weapon of publicity of its own." Inaugurating her four-page newsletter Facts for Women in 1943, Inman used its pages for the next three years to both continue her theoretical discussions and to develop programmatic ideas for the organizing of women, including a plan for the formation of a Union of Labor-Power Production Workers (housewives).

Inman's final book, The Two Forms of Production under Capitalism, was published in 1964, but she continued to write about women, carrying her long-standing argument with the Communist Party to Chair Gus Hall in a sixty-six-page letter in 1972 and to the readers of Political Affairs in a lengthy 1973 commentary. Although Inman's writing efforts during the last dozen years of her life were primarily autobiographical, she continued to speak out on women's issues almost until her death in 1985.

INTERCOLLEGIATE SOCIALIST SOCIETY.

The earliest collegiate radical movement in the United States, the Intercollegiate Socialist Society (ISS) had several important influences. It made socialist ideas intellectually respectable. It brought together a remarkable coalition of socialist revolutionaries and reformers on equal ground. And it established the institutional basis for a particular kind of socialist intellectualism that gained importance to the labor movement during the 1920s and retained a certain political value into the 1960s. By then the ISS had become the lineal ancestor of the most important radical student group of the century, Students for a Democratic Society.

The original ISS "call" was signed by prominent intellectuals from abolitionist veteran Thomas Wentworth Higginson and feminist-socialist Charlotte Perkins Gilman to reform editor B. O. Flower, lawyer Clarence Darrow, and writers Jack London and Upton Sinclair. Its student representative on the executive committee, Harry W. Laidler, began a lifelong dedication to campus socialist thought and socialist intellectualism.

Jack London's 1906 campus tour initiated the new method of agitation, followed with great success by many other ISS speakers, of rousing students to the realities of poverty and suffering. Soon, chapters were founded at Wesleyan and Columbia, followed by Princeton, Harvard, and more than fifty others; although mostly concentrated among the elite schools of the Northeast, the movement established a presence in many state and private colleges. A small bulletin grew into the Inter-Collegiate Socialist, a wide-ranging quarterly with contributions from most major U.S. socialist intellectuals and a handful of British leaders.

ISS leaders and members stressed not commitment to socialism, as in the Socialist Party proper, but willingness to discuss the subject. With that perspective, they urged (sometimes successfully, as at Harvard) the introduction of courses on socialism into the regular curriculum. They held forums and, where possible, channeled regular political work such as electioneering into the local Young People's Socialist League. In a few cases, they launched their own publications, the most famous of which was the New York Dental College's curious monthly, the Progressive Dentist. All in all, the ISS had little direct political influence and an inevitably shifting, unstable membership of a few thousand; but its influence upon the emerging generation of intellectuals was often considerable.

World War I, and especially U.S. entry into the war, produced a conservative tide on campus, and a simultaneous defection of leading intellectuals (some of them formerly active in the ISS) to the Wilsonian program. The ISS executive board, divided internally and fearing repression, took no official position on the war. Meanwhile campuses became virtual camps of the Reserve Officers' Training Corps, and the ISS strove to remain quietly alive.

In the aftermath of the war, the ISS published Socialist Review to survey the prospects of the world socialist movement from a reform (rather than a revolutionary, or Communist) perspective. As the ISS became the League for Industrial Democracy in 1921, devoted to the scientific study of social change, so the Socialist Review became Labor Age, published with the aim of "keeping [American] labor informed of worldwide labor developments." Early writers included carryovers from the Socialist Review and a new entity of socialistic labor researchers (not necessarily members of the Socialist Party), including David Saposs and Theresa Wolfson and an "angel" of the magazine, Prince Hopkins.

Labor Age, professionally one of the most attractive radical monthlies of the 1920s, informed a mostly educated readership about the latest developments in labor. Somewhere to the left of the American Federation of Labor (AFL), it refrained from open criticisms and eulogized AFL president Samuel Gompers upon his death in 1924. Soon after, the magazine began to dissent from the "new era" policies of the new AFL president, William Green, and vice-president, Matthew Woll. Labor Age, unlike the AFL, supported industrial unionism, urged U.S. recognition of the Soviet Union, and opposed the American invasion of Nicaragua.

Toward the end of the 1920s, Labor Age completed the trajectory from the Inter-Collegiate Socialist's rallying of students to the promotion of labor studies. Brookwood Labor College and its leader, A. J. Muste, became the foremost influence in Labor Age. From 1929 to 1933 the official organ of the Conference for Progressive Labor Action (AFL dissidents rallied by Muste), Labor Age reported primarily on the Conference's organizing efforts. When the Conference dissolved to become the American Workers Party, Labor Age ceased publication. The League for Industrial Democracy, descendant of the Intercollegiate Socialist Society, had survived by remaining on campus (as the Student League for Industrial Democracy, or SLID), although engaged in research more than action. SLID remained nominally intact until the founding of its vital lineal successor, Students for a Democratic Society. SLID, after decades as a small research center guided by Harry Laidler, fell during the 1960s into the hands of rightward-leaning labor leaders who were fully supportive of the Cold War.

INTERNATIONAL ASSOCIATION OF MACHINISTS. Launched by southern railroad machinists in 1889, the International Association of Machinists (IAM) was by 1900 a national union of skilled machine-shop workers and one of the largest and most influential organizations to be affiliated with the American Federation of Labor (AFL). The union's changing politics reflect both the general fortunes of American socialism and the specific history of the machine trades.

The IAM was not, at first, a socialist stronghold. Indeed, the union gained its AFL charter in 1895 at the expense of the International Machinists Union, an industrial organization led by Socialist Labor Party members Thomas Morgan and August Waldinger. By 1903, however, the IAM had become one of the leading socialist opponents of Samuel Gompers within the AFL; supporters of the Socialist Party dominated the union's executive council, and the IAM constitution committed the union to "class struggle upon both economic and political lines" and to using "the means of production and distribution for the benefit of all the people." Between 1904 and 1911, moreover, IAM members were prominent among socialist candidates for municipal office, and in the latter year the union elected as president William Johnston, a socialist and former Socialist Party candidate for the governorship of Rhode Island.

This transformation of union politics reflected in part the influence of Eugene Debs's American Railway Union on IAM members employed in railroad shops—members who resented their leaders' failure to support the Pullman strike. More important, populist demands for economic and political democracy had special appeal (and strong roots) among railroad machinists fighting large railway companies. With the demise of the People's Party, the union joined the move of labor's Left to the Socialist Party, whose gradualist program particularly suited the IAM's largely Anglo-Saxon leadership. The spread of socialism in the IAM reflected, finally, the obvious failure of pure and simple unionism after 1901, when metal trades employers—with the support of courts and militia—turned to belligerent open-shop policies.

Despite its socialist politics, the IAM remained a highly exclusive union. During the early twentieth century, rapid concentration of capital, technological innovations, and scientific management undermined the privileges and bargaining power of skilled men. These changes reinforced the search for political solutions to workplace exploitation. But the same trends also pitted the sectional orientation of craft leaders against a large minority of IAM members who increasingly turned to industrial unionism and syndicalism as appropriate strategies for preserving control at work. Northern locals proved receptive to influence from the Industrial Workers of the World (IWW) after 1905, and beginning in 1910 railroad machinists joined all-grades "system federations" and cooperated with activists from the Syndicalist League of North America. Such rank-and-file initiatives were strenuously opposed by conservative and socialist IAM officials alike.

Even before the end of Johnston's presidency (1926), the IAM followed the labor movement's left wing in moving away from socialist politics. As with other AFL unions, Woodrow Wilson's administration (1913–1921) drew IAM support away from the Socialist Party. Wartime economic conditions and labor policies further moderated union politics. With the IAM gaining new members in war industries and representation on the National War Labor Board, collaboration proved more attractive than the Socialist Party's pacifism. Political moderation, in turn, reinforced the union's industrial conservatism. IAM leaders continued to endorse amalgamation among metal trades unions, but they also opposed rank-and-file militancy whenever it threatened war production or, as in 1919–1920, it involved cooperation with such radical organizations as the Workers International Industrial Union or the "One Big Union," as IWW offshoots were variously known.

While the IAM strongly supported railroad nationalization in 1920 and the La Follette candidacy in 1924, by the mid-1920s it had become an exemplar of AFL liberalism—in principle nonpartisan, in practice pro-Democratic, and reserving its strongest political passions for fighting the Communist Party. (The IAM was one of the first unions, in 1925, to make Communist Party membership grounds for expulsion.) IAM executives also played leading roles in the AFL's battle against the early Congress of Industrial Organizations (CIO), and they sought employer support as a "responsible" alternative to more radical labor organizations. These policies heightened conflict within the union as conservative leaders suppressed militant action by industrial unionist members and disciplined rebellious locals on the West Coast.

For most of the postwar era, too, IAM politics have remained within the AFL-CIO's liberal wing, with the union a major actor in the Committee on Political Education. But in the late 1970s, amid renewed challenges from anti-union employers and from new technologies (supported once more by government policies), the IAM leadership again moved to the left of the AFL-CIO mainstream. After assuming the IAM presidency in 1977, William Winpisinger became a major figure in the Democratic Socialist Organizing Committee and its successor, the Democratic Socialists of America. While sympathetic to the ideal of an independent labor party, Winpisinger considered it more realistic to push the Democratic Party to the left on issues of social welfare, military spending, and union rights. To this end he strongly advocated building alliances with constituencies outside the union movement (e.g., environmental and peace groups).

These socialist political leanings—unlike those of the pre-World War I IAM—complemented progressive industrial goals, summarized in the union's 1981 "Technology Bill of Rights." This proposed amendment to national labor law called for greater union control over the design and use of new technology, with the participation of citizen action groups outside the labor movement. The best-known (if partial) application of these ideals was the Workplace Democracy project launched at Eastern Airlines (1983), in which wage concessions were paired with union representation on the company board and union participation in the implementation of new technology. The union's capacity to sustain such measures in an era of union decline is questionable (the Eastern agreement collapsed in 1986). So, too, is the IAM leadership's willingness to integrate progressive political and industrial goals with rank-and-file militancy—a dilemma familiar from the Johnston era and still commonly resolved in favor of bureaucratic control. In retrospect, Winpisinger's efforts presaged the overturn of conservative AFL-CIO leadership in 1995. Winpisinger's successor, George Kourpias, actively supported the reform forces.

INTERNATIONAL BROTHERHOOD OF TEAMSTERS. The Left has long been active in the International Brotherhood of Teamsters (IBT), which was organized originally as a union of truck drivers and warehouse workers but broadened to include cannery workers, factory operatives, clerical workers, teachers, police, flight attendants, and other occupations.

During the 1930s Trotskyists were especially influential in the IBT. The 1934 Teamster rebellion in Minneapolis, led by Trotskyists, resuscitated the union from its weak state during the early years of the Great Depression. Minneapolis Trotskyists used direct action and secondary boycotts to organize trucking and warehouse workers from Colorado to the Appalachians. During World War II, employers, state governments, the Communist Party, and top union leaders drove many Trotskyists from the union.

During the 1950s and early 1960s the Left was extremely weak in the IBT. In particular locals, such as Los Angeles Local 208, radicals attempted to transform undemocratic, ineffective locals into militant, democratic ones that enforced their demands through strikes and other forms of direct action. Black and Latino radicals were important in these efforts. In many cases, radicals who came to union office through these struggles eventually lost their militancy.

The late 1960s was a period of growing militancy throughout the IBT. This rank-and-file unrest culminated in 1970 in a national wildcat strike that secured improved contracts and revealed the complacency of the union leadership. In its wake employers attempted to intimidate a major center of rank-and-file rebellion in Los Angeles through a two-month lockout, five hundred firings, and the later imposition of a trusteeship on a key local by IBT president Frank Fitzsimmons. Teamster rank-and-file militants responded by organizing a national rank-and-file organization, Teamster United Rank and File.

In 1975 Teamster members of the International Socialists set out to establish a national rank-and-file group in the IBT. When they began, there were fewer than fifty Teamster members of the International Socialists, mostly ex-student radicals who were working in the industry primarily to carry on their political work. Their strategy aimed to organize a "Teamsters for a Decent Contract" campaign among freight workers, car haulers, and United Parcel Service employees. Thousands of workers demonstrated and circulated a petition listing contract demands; this campaign dovetailed with a major car-hauler wildcat. Success led to the founding of Teamsters for a Democratic Union (TDU).

TDU, a rank-and-file group, boasted several thousand members by the late 1980s. It established itself as a credible and serious opposition to the IBT bureaucracy. TDU served as a source of on-the-job leadership in struggles with employers. It conducted major lawsuits in defense of workers' interests, opposing undemocratic procedures in contract ratification and urine tests to detect drug use.

TDU supported the successful presidential campaign of reformer Ron Carey in 1991. While the alliance was not without problems, especially when Carey made overtures to some of the established leaders, TDU backed Carey in his successful reelection campaign in 1996. His opponent was James Hoffa, Jr., who represented the union's past problems with corruption and hoodlumism. The Teamsters supported the New Voices slate, which was elected to the leadership of the American Federation of Labor and Congress of Industrial Organizations in 1995.

INTERNATIONAL JURIDICAL ASSOCIATION BULLETIN.

Widely considered the law journal of the Left, the International Juridical Association Bulletin (IJA) was published by the American section of the association. The parent International Juridical Association was founded in 1931 by German and French lawyers prepared to fight Hitler and defend civil liberties and labor rights. The American section stemmed from a meeting in Berlin between Carol King, a well-known attorney with the American Civil Liberties Union in New York City, and Dr. Alfred Apfel, head of the association.

The American section attracted a wide range of activist attorneys, legal scholars, and prominent intellectuals whose political ideologies ranged from liberal to radical. These included Carol King (secretary), Nathan Greene (editor), Sol Cohn (treasurer), Osmond K. Fraenkel (representing the American Civil Liberties Union), Joseph Brodsky (representing the International Labor Defense), Roy Wilkins (representing the National Association for the Advancement of Colored People), Professors Paul F. Brissenden, Jerome Frank, and Karl Llewellyn, and writers Sherwood Anderson and Floyd Dell.

While existing law journals focused on defending property rights, the IJA specialized in describing cases involving defense of human rights. It also offered an analysis of current economic and social trends and their effect on cases, a practice other legal publications avoided. Peak circulation of 1,450 was achieved in 1938, and copies were to be found in the offices of Supreme Court justices, Department of Justice officials, and many bar association and law school libraries. The dean of the Wisconsin Law School regarded the IJA as "the best publication" in its area of specialization. The other major work of the International Juridical Association was done in groups researching projects suggested by movements and lawyers too busy in practice to set aside time for the creative thinking and research needed to fashion new ideas to attack old and new problems. This work often found its way into court briefs, legislative committee testimony and reports, and campaign speeches.

The IJA devoted considerable space to major civil rights and labor cases, including the "Scottsboro Boys," Angelo Herndon, and Harry Bridges. It also analyzed New Deal legislation such as the Wagner Act, the Fair Labor Standards Act, and the Tennessee Valley Authority. Writers for the IJA included Abe Fortas (future U.S. Supreme Court Justice), Alger Hiss (future presidential assistant), Lee Pressman (general counsel, Congress of Industrial Organizations), Thomas Emerson (future Yale Law professor), and Shad Polier (American Jewish Congress). Many law students contributed while working under Professors Walter Gelhorn and Herbert Wechsler to meet the Columbia Law School's student research requirement.

With the advent of World War II, the IJA was concerned that legal gains established in the 1930s were not only preserved but extended. The IJA also supported excess-profits taxes, as well as wage increases in munitions industries. Although finances and circulation remained strong, many staff members were drawn into war service in Washington agencies or into military service. As a result, the editorial board decided to cease publication in 1942 in order to merge forces with the National Lawyers Guild. The IJA editors felt the Guild association would allow their work to go on "to greater glory." For the next two decades IJA-style articles, often written by Carol King, appeared regularly in the Lawyers Guild Review. The IJA, now available in facsimile edition, remains an outstanding source for research into the legal disputes of 1932-1942 that were of most interest to the Left.

INTERNATIONAL LABOR DEFENSE.

Founded in 1925, the International Labor Defense (ILD) was a radical legal-action group that specialized in representing jailed union members, immigrants, political activists, and members of minority groups. In the early 1930s it attracted special notoriety through its militant defense campaigns in behalf of black prisoners, which exposed widespread racism in the American South. Less active during World War II, the organization unsuccessfully attempted a comeback at the war's end. In 1946 it merged into the Civil Cover of pamphlet issued by the International Labor Defense, 1920s, by Fred Ellis.

Rights Congress, which continued many of the ILD's original policies.

The individual most responsible for the establishment of the ILD was James P. Cannon, an influential leader in the Communist Party, USA (CPUSA). During a visit to the Soviet Union in 1925, Cannon discussed the need for a comprehensive legal-defense organization with William D. "Big Bill" Haywood, the exiled American labor leader. Upon his return, he helped initiate the drive that led to the formation of the ILD at a Chicago convention in June of that year. Elected as national secretary, Cannon remained the dominant influence in the group until 1928, when he was replaced by J. Louis Engdahl after being expelled from the CPUSA. The stated purpose of the new organization was "to defend all persecuted for their activity in the labor movement," including minorities, and to provide aid for their families. The ILD's guiding philosophy was its concept of "mass defense" or "mass protest." This concept taught that since working-class defendants inevitably faced a hostile court system, legal maneuvers alone could not win an acquittal. Instead, legal strategy had to be complemented by a mass protest movement that would mobilize the general public in behalf of the accused. Only through this dual struggle could justice ultimately prevail.

Although there were always several non-Communists on the national executive board, the Party openly dominated the ILD until 1937. Yet the organization's membership not only included Communists but also numerous liberals and radicals of various ideologies. With the exception of Trotskyists, its legal assistance was consistently made available to prisoners on a nonpartisan basis. Soon after its inception, the ILD became quite active in the unsuccessful campaign to save the lives of Nicola Sacco and Bartolomeo Vanzetti. During the late 1920s and 1930s, the ILD mounted major campaigns over such famous political prisoners as Tom Mooney and Warren Billings, James B. McNamara, and the Centralia, Washington, defendants. In 1930, strongly influenced by the CPUSA's new emphasis on Afro-American affairs, the ILD aggressively began to seek out black cases. The promotion of attorney William L. Patterson, an outspoken black Communist, to the national secretary's post in 1932 further underscored this new commitment.

Among the most important black cases handled by the ILD were those of Angelo Herndon in Georgia, Euel Lee in Maryland, Willie Peterson in Alabama, and Jess Hollins in Oklahoma. But by far the most significant such affair was the famous Scottsboro case, in which nine young black men were accused of raping two white women on a freight train in north Alabama in 1931. The ILD vigorously defended the nine in court while its aggressive protest campaign, aided by the CPUSA and many others, developed the case into an internationally known cause célèbre symbolizing southern racism. Through its aggressive tactics and militant ideology, the ILD added a radical dimension to civil rights struggles and exposed many blacks for the first time to Marxist teachings and Communist Party activities.

In 1937 the ILD was reorganized in response to the rise of the Popular Front. Vito Marcantonio, the East Harlem politician, became president and a major force in the group, while Anna Damon, a CPUSA member, was named national secretary. Under their leadership the ILD became even more heavily involved in defending trade union members and officials, especially during organizing drives of the Congress of Industrial Organizations. In addition, the group expanded its legal assistance to immigrants and resident aliens and conducted an important national campaign against the ubiquitous practice of debt peonage on southern plantations.

With the outbreak of World War II, the ILD went into a slow decline, increasingly relying on volunteer workers rather than paid employees. The group strongly protested wartime violence against blacks and racial discrimination in the war effort. Yet it never formally endorsed the "Double V" campaign of the Afro-American press and was criticized by some blacks for failing to repeat its dramatic campaigns of the 1930s. At the war's end, ILD supporters tried to revitalize the organization, but with limited success. After extended discussions in 1946, the group's leaders, probably with the encouragement of top Communist Party officials, decided to disband. Officially the ILD was merged into the Civil Rights Congress, a new organization that continued the ILD's traditions of "mass defense" and prisoner relief into another era.

INTERNATIONAL LABOR UNION. See International Workingmen's Association.

INTERNATIONAL LADIES GARMENT WORKERS UNION. A major center of Jewish immigrant radicalism and socialistic sentiments, the International Ladies Garment Workers Union (ILGWU) has also been marked historically by bitter divisions among the Left and by particular labor problems of the trade. It has, alongside its dynamism, also manifested a deeply antiradical sentiment and an abiding rule of male officials over a predominantly female work force. As a labor organization, it has nevertheless had many inspiring moments, and made great contributions to its members' welfare. As a factional battleground, it offered sobering lessons in the losses, moral and strategic, self-inflicted by American radicalism.

The early socialism of ILGWU leaders was shaped by their experiences in the Jewish Bund, along with a scattering of other Eastern European revolutionary organizations. The sweatshop, together with popular traditions of Jewish messianism, created the context for garment workers' response to socialistic ideals. Irish, American-born, and (with important exceptions) Italian workers in the industry remained immune to such appeals, even while often willing to follow radical leaders in practical activities.

Early struggles roiled the Jewish Lower East Side ghetto. During the early 1890s, Jewish anarchists and socialists struggled among themselves while they attempted to create garment locals and to promote the much-anticipated revolutionary transformation. In 1896 the Progressive Cloak Makers joined the Socialist Trades and Labor Alliance, only to be denounced by the rival United Brotherhood of Cloak Makers, led by anarchists and parliamentary-minded socialists. The founding of the ILGWU in 1901 left behind the Socialist Labor Party and placed the union in ambiguous relation with the emerging Socialist Party. New York garment local leaders, many of them socialists, intermittently sought a modus vivendi with nonsocialist national leaders of the ILGWU, compromising for practical reasons the vision of a socialist union. Related to political issues stood the problem of organizational structure, acute for an ILGWU divided in locals along craft, sex, or ethnic lines.

The syndicalism of many Italian garment workers, and the radicalism of Jewish veterans of the 1905 Revolution, posed both a serious possibility of defections to the more extreme Industrial Workers of the World (IWW) and contradictorily provided shock troops for militant ILGWU advance. With the help of the American Federation of Labor (AFL), and given the IWW's own weakness, the threat of dual unionism receded (ILGWU leaders continued, into the early 1910s, to join in the appeals of employers and religious leaders to IWW strikers to return to work in garment-related trades). Meanwhile, the growing popularity of Socialist electoral campaigns, and the ardent support of ILGWU unionization by the Jewish Daily Forward, cemented Jewish loyalties to a political socialism.

The 1909–1910 “rising of the twenty thousand” women shirtwaist makers forced the reorganization of the crucial (and radical) Local 25, itself rising to a membership of ten thousand. Socialist agitation for the strike also marked a high point of women socialists’ propaganda efforts on behalf of female workers. This strike paved the way for the cloak makers’ strike of 1910, involving fifty thousand workers, which resulted in the “Protocol of Peace,” with improved wages, sweatshop supervision, and a fifty-hour week. The protocol, soon viewed by much of the membership (and leaders of dissident locals) as suspending class conflict by removing the strike weapon from workers’ hands, was sustained under the new socialist president, Benjamin Schlesinger, despite management provocations. The ILGWU, by now the third-largest member of the AFL, was also increasingly outright in endorsing socialist policies.

Indeed, in this “golden era” of the Socialist Party, the ILGWU facilitated through its membership an array of support for radical institutions and movements. Not only socialist candidates and the Jewish Daily Forward, but radical cultural societies, woman suffrage campaigns, Yiddish schools, and an array of publications from Italian anarcho-syndicalist to Jewish anarchist to Labor Zionist, all found a day-to-day convergence of supporters at ILGWU-organized jobs and union meetings. Meyer London’s 1914 election to Congress owed much to ILGWU members, as did near-misses and strong campaigns by various socialist candidates. Juliet Stuart Poyntz’s emergence from prominent research positions to become educational director of the ILGWU, 1915–1919, facilitated the formation of Unity House, a summer retreat whose comradely atmosphere (especially for young women of varying ethnic backgrounds) typified the “leisure” side of union work at its contemporary best.

On the other hand, the ILGWU drew increasingly close to AFL leaders on more than a practical basis. While proposing socialist resolutions at AFL conventions, the union leadership ardently defended the AFL against radicals’ criticism. This approach alienated many labor activists, not only in the fading IWW but also in independent unions (such as the Amalgamated Clothing Workers) formed where AFL bodies had failed. During the First World War, the robust ILGWU courageously defended official socialist policies and even initially endorsed the Bolshevik Revolution. Yet the challenges rising up from the ferment—the call for more labor militancy, centered in the Current Affairs Club of mostly young women enamored of Russian events—brought ridicule (leaders openly suggested the women were sexually frustrated) and attempted repression. In the recession of the early 1920s, with working conditions deteriorating and wages swiftly declining, political and generational conflicts bought internecine warfare.

The Trade Union Educational League, founded by Communists and led by William Z. Foster, had one of its strongest bases inside the ILGWU, and also some of its most sophisticated opponents. A shop-delegate movement sought to democratize union leadership drastically, returning it to the shop floor (and the hands of many Communists activists), marking a high point of “workers’ control” movements in contemporary labor. Charles Zimmerman, a young darling of the trade, was a most energetic Communist union figure, almost Wobbly-like—as he later recalled—in his enthusiasm for rank-and-file democracy. In response, ILGWU leaders divided Local 25 to weaken radicals, demanded that all shop leagues cease activities, and amended the constitution to forbid membership to anyone holding a separate labor affiliation. In 1925 Communist garment leader Louis Hyman drew close to Morris Sigman in the balloting for union president. In 1926 Communists led a six-month, unsuccessful general strike of the garment trade in New York, at the end of which many left-wing locals were suspended. ILGWU leaders and institutions had, meanwhile continued to support socialist candidates, and gave special urgency to the 1924 La Follette-Progressive campaign. Increasingly, however, they turned toward major-party politics, first of New York governor Alfred Smith, and then Franklin Roosevelt. The vision of socialism remained, but was increasingly a sentimental one.

The ILGWU meanwhile played a major role in the 1930s Left politics, both public and internecine. The division of the Communist Party between supporters of Moscow and supporters of "Right" Communism (in the United States, of Jay Lovestone) in 1928 affected the ILGWU more than any other union, for here Lovestone's intimates, including Zimmerman, had their base in Local 22. When Communists abandoned the ILGWU for the Trade Union Unity League's Needle Trades Workers Industrial Union, Zimmerman and his supporters remained with the union. The return of relative peace to a much-weakened ILGWU facing the Depression made Zimmerman, and Lovestone, valuable commodities to the new leadership of David Dubinsky, himself a former Bundist gone mainstream. Will Herberg, chief Lovestoneite theoretician (and later conservative theologian) became educational director of Local 22. The Lovestoneite weekly, Workers Age, operated almost as a house organ within the union's upper ranks. For their part, the Yiddish-speaking anarchists, who also found in Local 22 their main base of union members, had bitterly opposed Communists from the early 1920s and likewise provided Left logic as well as personal enthusiasm to the union, for a time publishing their own anticommunist ILGWU-oriented organ, Der Yunyon Arbeter. As it did with the Lovestoneites, the ILGWU leadership reciprocated anarchist affections. Subsidizing the anarchist papers through "greetings" advertisements in the Freie Arbeter Shtimme, Dubinsky personally hailed the paper and its champion, Rudolf Rocker, many times in print, at ILGWU expense. This indirect form of subsidy remained, in ever-diminishing form, until the paper's folding in 1976.

Their own union effort a failure, Communists rejoined the ILGWU in 1934, when the beginnings of a massive National Recovery Act-inspired industry-wide success made Local 22 for a time the largest union local in the United States. Through the 1930s, Communists campaigned on various issues, for and against administrations, but they no longer seriously threatened Dubinsky's or Zimmerman's authority. As individuals, indeed, many supported the massive expansion of leisure and cultural activities (especially in Local 22) and Zimmerman's generally keen attention to working conditions. As a group, Communists coalesced with Dubinsky's important support for the American Labor Party (ALP), bringing them together with Jewish socialist old-timers in a common cause, and with the general support for the New Deal that this orientation contained. Symbolically, the stage production of Pins and Needles, labor's greatest theatrical extravaganza—with a union cast disproportionately taken from Local 22—offered a moment of class unity in a world of political conflicts.

Personal as much as political conflicts within the upper reaches of the Congress of Industrial Organizations (CIO) seriously affected the Left. In 1937 Dubinsky began to separate himself from John L. Lewis and Sidney Hillman (whom he had earlier seen as his mentor), and became far more willing than his fellow leaders to conciliate differences with the rock-ribbed conservative AFL. In 1938, amid a developing quarrel within the ALP (Dubinsky bitterly opposed the proposal to nominate Sidney Hillman as senatorial candidate, and the old-line socialists, supported by the Jewish Daily Forward, lined up with Dubinsky as Communists lined up with Hillman), Dubinsky sponsored Jay Lovestone's guidance of the conservative Homer Martin's short-lived United Automobile Workers regime and Martin's own return to the AFL. Dubinsky himself withdrew the ILGWU from the CIO and returned to the AFL, denouncing the CIO as Communist-led.

As tensions grew within the ALP in the early 1940s, Dubinsky scorned all Hillman's offers for conciliation of the AFL and CIO (i.e., of the "right" and "left" wings). When the Hillman wing won a decisive primary victory in 1944, Dubinsky and his allies seceded, forming the New York Liberal Party under ILGWU auspices. The death of Sidney Hillman and the spread of Cold War sentiment doomed the ALP, while the Liberal Party became a patronage machine, depriving both socialists and communists of an electoral arm even semi-independent of the two-party system.

The ILGWU thereafter experienced a major demographic change: the "Jewish trades" ceased to be Jewish in any respect but leadership, as sons and daughters of garment makers were succeeded by Afro-Americans, Puerto Ricans, and others. With the passing of the old generation, socialism dwindled into a sentimental recollection of the union's difficult early days. A final, ironic blow to the union's progressive image came with the vote by its field staff in 1960 for their own unionization. Dubinsky's refusal to negotiate with the staff union, made up largely of young socialists and liberals who had attended the ILGWU Training School during the 1950s, symbolized the chasm between the ILGWU's hierarchical "social unionism" and the nascent New Left. Harsh and telling critiques by Herbert Hill and Paul Jacobs, in the journal New Politics and elsewhere, soon followed.

Meanwhile, the ILGWU moved toward protectionism as ever-greater quantities of goods from abroad (produced by both American and foreign manufacturers) increasingly dominated American markets. Between the early 1960s and late 1980s, union membership dropped from an all-time high of 450,000 to 170,000, and as the end of the century approached, industrial homework had reappeared as a major menace to union standards. Occasionally, the ILGWU still provided inspiration and defenses to the impoverished and vulnerable new members of the garment-industry work force, especially in defending their rights against immigration authorities. At the same time, the ILGWU remained scarcely less rigid in its ideological antiradicalism, which had extended from Communist to the New Left and beyond, to internal dissidents of all types. Former ILGWU officers dominate the Union of Needletrades, Industrial and Textile Employees (UNITE), the 1995 amalgamation of virtually all of America's disunited and feuding garment and textile unions. In the historic battle over AFL-CIO leadership that also took place in 1995, UNITE backed the more conservative slate.

INTERNATIONAL LONGSHOREMEN'S AND WAREHOUSEMEN'S UNION.

Heir to a long tradition of waterfront unionism and Left politics, the International Longshoremen's and Warehousemen's Union (ILWU) currently represents some 45,000 workers in the western United States and Canada, predominantly longshoremen, warehouse workers, inland boatmen, and workers in agriculture and the tourist industry in Hawaii. San Francisco longshoremen first unionized in 1853. The International Longshoremen's Association (ILA) appeared in most Pacific Coast ports by the early twentieth century, when influences of the Industrial Workers of the World were strong among some longshoremen. An unsuccessful strike in 1919 destroyed most western ILA locals. By the mid-1920s, longshore unions had largely disappeared from Pacific coast ports.

In the early 1930s, western longshoremen revived ILA locals and demanded a coastwide contract. When waterfront employers refused, the ILA struck all Pacific Coast ports in May 1934. Other maritime unions also struck with their own demands. During the strike, six workers were killed and hundreds injured. The Communist Party gave strong support to the strikers and advocated a general strike. Following a four-day general strike in San Francisco employers agreed to arbitration.

After the 1934 strike, the ILA sought to unite West Coast maritime unions into a Maritime Federation of the Pacific, whose newspaper, the Voice of the Federation, provided strong advocacy for Left causes. A strike by the federation in 1936-1937, however, revealed serious conflict between the ILA and the Sailors' Union of the Pacific. Concurrently, the ILA began a "march inland" from the docks to warehouses. Despite successes in northern California, most warehouse organizing elsewhere was blocked by Teamster opposition.

Conflict with the Sailors' Union of the Pacific, the Teamsters, and ILA national officers coincided with an ideological attraction among West Coast ILA activists to the recently formed Congress of Industrial Organizations (CIO). In 1937 the Pacific Coast District of the ILA voted to enter the CIO and was chartered as the ILWU. Harry Bridges became ILWU president. The ILWU constitution prohibited discrimination based on political beliefs, and Communist Party members came to hold key positions in the ILWU. Leftists promoted a strong role for the union rank-and-file and opposed racial discrimination. Organizing drives east of the Rockies produced a few warehouse locals, but efforts to organize Gulf of Mexico longshoremen were unsuccessful. During World War II, the ILWU joined other Left unions in encouraging maximum productivity, and Bridges promoted a no-strike pledge. Louis Goldblatt (ILWU secretary-treasurer, 1943–1977) protested the wartime relocation of Japanese Americans.

Late in the war, ILWU leaders decided to organize in Hawaii from the docks up the chain of production to sugar and pineapple field-workers; the ILWU became the first union to achieve lasting success in organizing agricultural field-workers. As Hawaii's economy moved to tourism, the ILWU organized hotel employees and tourism workers. Since the 1960s, Hawaii has claimed a large portion of ILWU members.

In 1950 the CIO expelled the ILWU as Communist-dominated. Bridges was tried repeatedly in an effort to prove Communist affiliation and was jailed briefly for urging an end to the Korean War; Jack Hall, ILWU leader in Hawaii, was tried under the Smith Act. Among the unions purged by the CIO, only the ILWU maintained most of its original membership, jurisdiction, and contracts. The Fishermen and Allied Workers Union joined the ILWU in 1949, and the ILWU became a refuge for other victims of anticommunism. In 1959–1961, San Francisco longshoremen elected Archie Brown, an announced Communist Party member, to local office, violating a Taft-Hartley prohibition; in U.S. v. Brown (1964), the Supreme Court ruled the prohibition unconstitutional.

Ironically, Cold War attacks on the ILWU came as longshore labor relations were improving. In 1948 negotiators refused to bargain with the ILWU so long as Bridges was president. After a three-month strike, the waterfront employers fired their negotiators and created a new employers' organization, the Pacific Maritime Association; since then, longshore labor relations have been generally smooth, characterized even by cordial cooperation.

The "new look" after 1948 laid the basis for successful adaptation to mechanization. After extensive rank-and-file discussion, the ILWU negotiated the Mechanization and Modernization Agreement in 1960. Also in 1960, the ILWU and Teamsters began joint negotiations for northern California warehouse workers, ending their jurisdictional disputes.

Since the 1950s, the role of Communist party members had diminished in the ILWU, coinciding with the Party's general decline, but ILWU politics have remained well to the left. ILWU officers strongly supported civil rights activities in the 1950s, and the union first called for U.S. withdrawal from Vietnam in 1967. However, the same years saw Communist Party attacks on the Mechanization and Modernization Agreement, and a lawsuit that alleged racial discrimination against eighty "B-men," provisional longshoremen. Bridges had long worked to integrate the ILWU despite opposition in some locals, and he denied the charge; the lawsuit was decided in favor of the union.

Strained relations between Bridges and Goldblatt contributed in 1975 to a requirement that ILWU officers retire at age sixty-five; both men retired in 1977. James Herman's election to the ILWU presidency brought little change to the ILWU's politics. In 1988 ILWU members voted to join the American Federation of Labor and Congress of Industrial Organizations (AFL-CIO) by a three-to-one margin. ILWU presidents are elected by the full membership, and with Herman's retirement in 1991 the ILWU witnessed two successive closely contested elections for the presidency. In 1991 David Arian won with a campaign that focused on his militancy and Left politics, but in 1994 he lost to Brian McWilliams amid charges that Arian's organizational changes had threatened rank-and-file democracy. Politically, the ILWU has continued to stand well toward the left among AFL-CIO affiliates.

INTERNATIONAL PUBLISHERS. A Communist-oriented New York publishing house that was founded in 1924 by Alexander Trachtenberg—a veteran socialist who joined the Communist Party in 1921—with financial assistance from the socialist and entrepreneur A. A. Heller, International Publishers (IP) became the first U.S. publisher to extensively publish the works of V. I. Lenin, Leon Trotsky, Nikolai Bukharin, and other Soviet Communist thinkers in English. Additionally, IP began extensive publication of the works of Marx and Engels, often commissioning new translations and thus becoming the predominant publisher of Marxist classics in the United States, cooperating with Lawrence and Wishart Publishers, Great Britain, and the Foreign Languages Publishing House, Moscow.

During the heyday of the Communist movement in the United States, which occurred in the 1930s and 1940s, IP published Marxist-Leninist classics in large editions in many formats, including the inexpensive Little Lenin Library series, whose titles were sold for only a few cents each. IP also published original works in a variety of subject areas, including the Labor Fact Book series, which was co-published with the Labor Research Association. Leaders of the Communist Party, including Earl Browder and William Z. Foster, were also among its authors.

During this period IP also published works such as Philip S. Foner's History of the Labor Movement in the United States and Herbert Aptheker's Negro Slave Revolts, which influenced many outside the Communist movement. IP also published works by black authors such as W. E. B. Du Bois, making them available to a larger audience. Distribution was handled, in great part, through a network of left-wing and Communist Party-related bookstores and through the movement apparatus itself. Displays of IP books and related literature were always present at meetings, rallies, and demonstrations, often reaching tens of thousands in this manner.

IP's fortunes waned during the McCarthy period, as Trachtenberg was jailed with other leaders of the Communist Party under the Smith Act for conspiring to teach the advocacy of the overthrow of the government by force and violence. With the decline of the Party and its formidable literature-distribution apparatus, IP's fortunes suffered. Some of IP's original works during this period included William Z. Foster's History of the Communist Party of the United States, History of the Negro People, and other historical works.

After Trachtenberg's retirement in 1962, he was succeeded by James S. Allen, author of Reconstruction: The Battle for Democracy. Allen began to revamp IP's marketing efforts, printing attractive trade paperback editions of Marxist classics, and hiring a marketing staff that concentrated on regular bookstore channels. Subsequently, during the rise of the student movement of the 1960s, IP's fortunes also rose, making possible a wide range of new titles. Among these were a number of works by Antonio Gramsci, Kwame Nkrumah, Franz Marek, and Ernst Fischer. IP also became a co-publisher of Marx-Engels's Collected Works in fifty volumes with Lawrence and Wishart and Progress Publishers, Moscow. The use of original Marxist works in college courses not only boosted IP's sales but prompted publication of a number of titles, such as Dynamics of Social Change, as supplementary reading for courses.

In 1973 Allen was replaced by Lou Diskin, who stepped up IP's marketing efforts through the book trade. As the student upsurge of the 1960s waned, sales of Marxist classics flattened. IP continued to publish works of U.S. Communist leaders such as Gus Hall and Henry Winston. Allen began and Diskin continued the publication of biographies and autobiographies of Party leaders, including John Williamson, Ben Davis, Hosea Hudson, and William L. Patterson. By the early 1980s Diskin was replaced by Betty Smith, who continued to reprint Marxist classics and publish new works by black authors and younger Marxist scholars. Standard works, such as Foner's History of the Labor Movement, grew to ten volumes.

By the end of the 1980s, IP's catalog included works by Angela Davis, reprints of early works on jazz and music criticism, Native American and African American poetry, as well as Albert Soboul on the French Revolution of 1789 (the translation of the latter subsidized by the Mitterrand government). IP's books could be found in major bookstores across the country as well as in many classrooms.

Nonetheless, the impact of the Reagan-Bush years of conservative dominance brought hard times to all left-wing publishers, and IP was no exception. An even greater blow fell with the collapse of Communism in Eastern Europe and a subsequent schism within the Communist Party, USA, which saw the departure of many of IP's authors, including Herbert Aptheker and Angela Davis. The down-sized Party, faced with draconian belt-tightening, had fewer resources to devote to publishing. Nonetheless, even in the mid-1990s its catalog still contained dozens of highly respected titles, even if it had failed to retain or attract young authors.

Marxist publishing in the United States grew substantially during the sixties and seventies, with presses such as Monthly Review, Pathfinder, South End, and others producing significant titles. Newer houses such as Marxist Education Press of Minneapolis, which had a close kinship with IP, but specialized in more scholarly works, and New Outlook Press of New York, which specialized in hagiographic biographies of Communist leaders, also continued to publish.

INTERNATIONAL SOCIALIST REVIEW.

Published by Charles H. Kerr and Company of Chicago, the International Socialist Review (ISR) still stands as a major chronicle of the American socialist movement in the first two decades of the twentieth century. The monthly's contributors—a virtual "who's who" of international socialism—reported and made comment on every major social, political, and economic development that had some bearing on the movement's direction.

Edited from 1900 to 1908 by socialist intellectual Algie M. Simons, the ISR initially served as a sounding board for the numerous theoretical debates facing the international movement. Its primary goal, enunciated at its inception, was to help familiarize American activists with socialist thought. Differing opinion on the strategy and tactics of the American movement and lengthy exchanges on "correct" Marxian or "scientific" positions filled its pages. Additional discussions on the socialist's relation to the American farmer and the "land question," the "Negro problem," women and socialism, and perspectives on organized religion also found a place during those years. In 1902 the International Socialist Bureau at Brussels designated the ISR "the official American organ" for its communiqués.

Kerr fired Simons in 1908 and worked to transform the monthly into "the fighting magazine of socialism," a popular monthly "of, by, and for the working class." Liberally illustrated with "action fotos" and original graphics, the revamped ISR carried first-hand reports of major strikes, lockouts, organizing drives, and employers' offensives as well as theoretical and political discussions. Kerr's work with long-time associates Mary and Leslie Marcy and an editorial board including left-wingers William D. "Big Bill" Haywood, Frank Bohn, and poet/illustrator Ralph Chaplin raised the ISR's circulation from nearly six thousand in 1908 to over forty thousand by 1911.

A national voice for the movement's direct-action, industrial unionist wing, the monthly survived the in-house battle between Left and Right within the Socialist Party of America in 1912–1913, only to fall victim, in 1918, to government suppression for its opposition to U.S. entry into World War I. Two American Trotskyist journals, the most recent in 1997, subsequently adopted the name of ISR without being able to replicate its prestige or wide circulation.

INTERNATIONAL SOCIALISTS. See Independent Socialist Clubs.

INTERNATIONAL TRADE UNION EDUCATION LEAGUE. See Trade Union Educational League.

INTERNATIONAL TYPOGRAPHICAL UNION. The oldest and historically one of the most democratic unions in the United States, the Typographical Union (ITU) had many antecedents. Following a journeymen printers' strike in Philadelphia in 1786—recognized as the first recorded strike in U.S. history—many more or less short-lived local printers' unions or benefit societies were organized.

The delegates from fourteen local unions who formed the National Typographical Union in 1852 (it changed its name to International in 1869 after several Canadian locals had affiliated) assembled in response to a militant "Address to the Journeymen Printers of the United States" drawn up in 1850. Written largely by Martin F. Conway, of Baltimore—later renowned as an abolitionist, lawyer, and judge, a close friend of John Brown's and a major figure in Kansas politics—the "Address" noted the "perpetual antagonism between labor and capital" and called for the "ultimate redemption of labor" by workers' self-organization. His class-struggle perspective was quietly ignored by the new organization, but the ITU from the start had many unique features that distinguish it from all other American labor organizations.

ITU law, for example, drawing in part on the oldest traditions of the printers' craft—the "art preservative of all arts," the herald of freedom, and the "the tyrant's foe"—going back to its origins in the late Renaissance and early Reformation, has always had a markedly ultrademocratic tendency. Regular "chapel" (i.e., job site) union meetings on company time, as well as direct referendum vote in all elections and on constitutional changes, gave rank-and-file printers a say in everyday decision-making scarcely dreamt of by most American trade-unionists.

Union printers, moreover, exercised a control of the workplace rarely approached and never surpassed by any other sector of the organized labor movement. On daily newspapers, always the ITU's stronghold, ITU law provided for automatic work-stoppage if an employer so much as set foot in the composing room. The closed shop and traveling-card system enabled "tramp printers"—a great majority of ITU members "tramped" for a time after completing their apprenticeships, and not a few for the whole of their working lives—to secure work at newspaper and printing offices throughout the country simply by depositing their card with the chapel chairman, bypassing the personnel office altogether. Well into the 1960s there were many thousands of union printers who had never suffered the humiliation of "applying" for a job.

The ITU's strong internal democracy and high degree of workplace control help explain why so many radicals have found it a congenial organization. The same factors also help explain why, notwithstanding its leadership's often noncommittal and sometimes downright conservative attitude toward controversial national and international political issues, the ITU long remained the most consistently progressive and least corrupt of all craft unions.

A dictionary of American radicals would contain far more members of the ITU than of any other union. From the last quarter of the nineteenth century through the first quarter of the twentieth, when the ITU was one of the largest and most powerful unions in North America, printers were prominent all across the spectrum of the Left, distinguishing themselves especially as editors of influential radical and labor papers. Among the many ITU members who enjoyed national and in some cases even international reputations as radicals in the 1880s–1890s were Joseph R. Buchanan of the International Workmen's Association (the "Red International"); "single-taxer" Henry George, author of Progress and Poverty and many other works; Haymarket martyr Albert R. Parsons; individualist-anarchist Jo Labadie, one of the best-loved personalities of the Detroit Federation of Labor and principal contributor to the Detroit Labor Leaf; and Alzina P. Stevens, organizer and Master Workman of the Joan of Arc Woman's Assembly of the Knights of Labor, editor of the Chicago Vanguard, and a mainstay of Jane Addams's Hull House.

After the turn of the century, printers provided much of the leadership of the new Socialist Party. A founding member of the party, and its frequent candidate for office, George Koop was for decades one of the most notable "characters" in the Chicago Federation of Labor. William J. Ghent authored a number of works of socialist theory and criticism, including Our Benevolent Feudalism, which influenced Jack London's Iron Heel. Ben Hanford was a popular Socialist Party pamphleteer and Eugene Debs's vice presidential running mate in the 1908 election. Cleveland Citizen editor Max Hayes, an ITU international officer and Sam Gompers's most serious rival for leadership of the American Federation of Labor (AFL), ran for the U.S. vice presidency on the Labor party ticket in 1920.

Emma F. Langdon, socialist author of an admirable firsthand account, The Cripple Creek Strike, was Denver ITU Local 49's delegate to the founding convention of the Industrial Workers of the World (IWW). Louis C. Fraina, a principal founder of the Communist Labor Party in 1919, had a card from New York Typographical Union No. 6. The anarchist presence maintained in the union by Labadie was reinforced by Steven T. Byington, an officer of the Cambridge, Massachusetts, local who is best known for his translation of Max Stirner's The Ego and Its Own.

Although the influence of radicals within the ITU has varied greatly over the years, union printers have consistently stood in the forefront of the great struggles of the broader labor movement. Their role in the prolonged crusade for the eight-hour day was second to none, and they continued to uphold the demand for still-shorter hours after the eight-hour day was won. In 1945, when most unions no longer gave even lip-service to a further reduction of working time, ITU members initiated an eventually successful drive for a seven-hour day.

The ITU was the only craft union that supported the Committee for (later Congress of) Industrial Organizations (CIO); ITU president Charles P. Howard served as the first secretary of that body. Although the printers' union did not actually join the CIO, in 1938 its members refused, by overwhelming referendum vote, to pay the AFL's anti-CIO "war tax," whereupon the AFL expelled the ITU, one of its founding affiliates. According to the study Union Democracy, CIO organizers found that "when they entered cities and towns in anti-union areas such as the South, the one place they could obtain any help was the ITU local in town. Many ITU leaders in the South became temporary and in some cases permanent organizers for CIO unions."

No union was hit harder by the 1947 Taft-Hartley "Slave Labor" Act, and no union worked harder to overturn it. One of three unions that refused to sign the Taft-Hartley affidavits—the others were the United Mine Workers and the IWW—the ITU led organized labor's first major anti-Taft-Hartley strike in a twenty-two-month battle with the Chicago newspapers that began in November 1947.

On broader social issues the ITU has generally pursued a policy far in advance of other unions, though not always as far in advance as its more radical members would have preferred. African Americans were welcomed into the union at an early date, but remained a very small minority of the membership. Among black ITU members was West Indian-born Otto Huiswood, pioneer American Communist, member of the African Blood Brotherhood, and the first American black to meet Lenin.

The ITU was the first national union to admit women (1869); the first to elect a woman, Augusta Lewis, to national office (1870); and the first to demand equal pay for men and women doing equal work (1873). More recently, Jean Tussey of Cleveland Typographical Union No. 53 and Mollie West of Chicago Local 16, both longtime radicals, helped found the Coalition of Labor Union Women in 1974.

The ITU's once-numerous foreign-language locals—German, Swedish, Italian, Polish, Czech, and Yiddish—were an important part of the union for many years; only the New York Italian local survives. The German and Yiddish locals tended to be among the most radical printing trade unions. For several years before it received a charter from the ITU in 1894, Chicago Deutsche-Amerikaner Typographia No. 9, of which Haymarket martyr Adolph Fischer was a member, carried on as an independent anarchist union.

The contributions of union printers to workers' culture, and indeed, to American culture as a whole, are enormous. Such popular authors as Mark Twain, Artemus Ward, and Fredric Brown were all card-carrying, dues-paying Typographical Unionists. The clubs that once flourished in every ITU local—chess clubs, singing clubs, athletic clubs, mutual aid societies, the Old-Time Printers Association, and so on—reflected a kind of trade union utopianism in which the union truly was the vital center of working-class life. ITU brass bands were for years an indispensable part of every Labor Day parade. Formed in 1908, the Union Printers International Baseball League is still around today, the oldest amateur baseball league in the country. Finally, it was printers, more than anyone else, who made America's working public conscious of the significance of the union label as an emblem of solidarity and craft pride.

Severely weakened by the ongoing Cold War against labor that started with Taft-Hartley, and ravaged by rapid technological changes in the printing industry throughout the same period, the ITU survived as a dignified but increasingly powerless relic of a once-great union. Several of its strikes in the 1960s and 1970s were notable for their militancy and creativity, and many ITU locals have continued to exemplify the finest traditions of progressive unionism. But steadily declining membership as the industry bows to electronics and computerization has placed ever-narrower limits on the printers' field of action. After unsuccessful attempts at merger with the Newspaper Guild, the Graphic Communications International Union, and even the Teamsters, in 1986 the ITU became the Printing, Publishing and Media Workers Sector of the Communication Workers of America. All but a few of its locals, however, have retained the time-honored name of Typographical Union.

INTERNATIONAL WOMAN'S DAY. It is a historical accident that the first International Woman's Day was held on 23 February 1909 by socialists in the United States rather than in Germany, under the leadership of Clara Zetkin. Zetkin had been present on Bastille Day, 1889, in Paris when socialists organized the Second International Working Men's Association, an assembly of socialist parties, trade unions, and political clubs. The group planned May Day, first held in Europe in 1890. Among the goals of the Socialist International and the demands of the first May Day were control of female and child labor and the ten-hour day for all workers. Zetkin was powerless to ensure that the women's component remained a focus of May Day, but she never gave up her own consciousness of the connection between working women's rights and the goals of working-class emancipation.

Socialist women caucused on 17 August 1907 in Stuttgart, Germany, before the annual meeting of the Second International. Under the leadership of Zetkin and Louise Zietz, socialist women pledged to fight for equality in every aspect of life. They suggested an annual demonstration similar to May Day to emphasize the needs of working women and to place the support of socialists behind winning rights for women. But the women's demands got lost in the political debates at the 1907 meetings.

Socialists in Europe held their first International Woman's Day in 1911, taking 18 March, the fortieth anniversary of the Paris Commune, as the date to commemorate. The U.S. socialists, recognizing a good idea, had already held their first demonstration on 23 February 1909 when they fixed the last Sunday in February as the holiday's annual date. Following the American model, Russian socialists, led by feminist Alexandra Kollontai, began their International Woman's Day celebrations on the last Sunday in February, 1913.

The importance of International Woman's Day became evident when socialist internationalism otherwise collapsed at the outset of World War I. Zetkin's comrades among socialist deputies in Germany and Austria voted war credits for their governments. Socialist women, led by Zetkin, however, attempted to assert their own internationalism on Woman's Day 1915. Meeting in Bern, Switzerland, socialists like Louise Saumoneau of France wrote a manifesto calling on women as wives and mothers to end the war. For her bravery, she suffered two months in French jails.

The most dramatic celebration of International Woman's Day was in Russia in 1917. Deteriorating living conditions and massacres of Russian men at the front led Russian women in Petrograd (formerly Saint Petersburg) to take the occasion of International Woman's Day (8 March in the West, but 23 February on the Julian calendar) to demand bread and peace. Against the wishes of the Socialist Party and trade union leaders, the women led marches from the breadlines to the factories. Half a million Russian workers, mostly in Petrograd, were already out on strike, providing the powder keg the women ignited. They launched the February Revolution in Russia. By 12 March (Julian 27 February), Czar Nicholas II had been forced to abdicate. The provisional government formed to rule until the election of a constituent assembly granted women the right to vote.

Under Zetkin's instigation, in 1922 Lenin established International Woman's Day as a holiday in Communist countries. In 1967, women students in Chicago revived the celebration. Since then, it has become the occasion for a new sense of feminist internationalism.

INTERNATIONAL WOODWORKERS OF AMERICA.

An affiliate of the Congress of Industrial Organizations (CIO), the International Woodworkers of America (IWA) was founded on 20 July 1937 following a secession movement within the American Federation of Labor's United Brotherhood of Carpenters and Joiners. Many workers active in that movement had been members of the Industrial Workers of the World and the Communist Party's Trade Union Unity League affiliate, the National Lumber Workers Union.

The first president of the IWA was Harold Pritchett, the only Canadian ever to head a CIO-affiliated union. Like most of the union's executive board members, Pritchett was a member of the Communist Party. Between 1937 and 1941 the IWA's Communist leaders were annually reelected to office by rank-and-file referendum elections. During those years the IWA was prominent in coalition organizations such as the Oregon and Washington Commonwealth Federations.

The support for the Communists came primarily from unskilled, immigrant workers in the mill towns and logging camps in which the Communist worked and resided. Opposition to the Communists arose from the ranks of the more skilled and native-born workers and was supported by the CIO national office. Early in 1940, CIO president John L. Lewis put Adolph Germer in charge of the IWA's organizing activities. Germer, an experienced unionist and decidedly anticommunist Socialist Party factionalist, was able to shift the balance of power within the IWA through his staff choices and by identifying pockets of conservative workers to be brought in the union as new members.

Following several years of lobbying by business interests and investigation by the Dies Committee, Harold Pritchett was refused entry from Canada on 22 August 1940. Other Canadian Communists were denied entry during the 1940s. Combined with the effects of the Taft-Hartley Act, these events precipitated an attempt by the Canadians to disaffiliate and form the Woodworkers Industrial Union of Canada (WIUC) in 1948.

A raiding campaign by the International defeated the WIUC and the Canadians remained part of the IWA until 1987, when they attained independent status.

INTERNATIONAL WORKERS ORDER.

Working-class fraternal societies are nearly as old as the working class itself. Dating back at least as far as the English Friendly Societies of the eighteenth century, fraternal societies helped workers cope with some of the economic insecurities of life and death under capitalism by providing a form of life insurance that assured a proper burial and money for survivors. Occupation, geography, nationality, race, religion, and sometimes politics served as the base for fraternal orders. In the United States, fraternal societies organized along the lines of race, and national origin often performed another function besides the economic, which was to provide immigrants and Afro-Americans with a familiar cultural oasis within the larger society. Of the myriad of fraternal orders that have existed, the most important in terms of radical politics and class struggle was the International Workers Order (IWO).

The IWO was formed in 1930 by Communist and other left-wing members of the Workmen's Circle, a fraternal society organized in New York by Jewish socialists in 1892. Rubin Saltzman and other founders of the IWO decided to make it unique among fraternal organizations—a multinational and multiracial order that would offer all workers regardless of occupation the most economical insurance possible, and an order that was committed to the class struggle. By 1947 the IWO had 187,226 members. Though the Jewish section remained the largest (50,000) and best organized, the order also contained sections of Italians, Slovaks, Hungarians, Ukrainians, Poles, Greeks, Romanians, Croatians, Russians, Spanish, Carpatho-Russians, Finnish, and Afro-Americans and other English-speaking members.

For as little as $13.68 a year, a twenty-five-year-old could buy $2,000 of term insurance. For slightly more, a worker could buy sickness insurance and tuberculosis insurance. In major cities the IWO provided a panel of doctors for members, and in New York the IWO had medical and dental clinics.

The individual sections of the IWO supported their own foreign-language newspapers and halls. They also sponsored sports teams, choruses, orchestras, cultural schools, dance and theater groups, and children's camps. Such cultural figures as Paul Robeson, Langston Hughes, Rockwell Kent, Jimmy Durante, Irwin Corey, and Zero Mostel were associated with the IWO.

The IWO remained closely aligned with the Communist Party throughout its history. Many of its leaders, such as Max Bedacht, general secretary of the IWO from 1932 to 1946, were also Communist Party leaders.

Though not a political or labor organization itself, the IWO actively supported progressive political causes and labor struggles. In the 1930s the IWO played an active role in the early Congress of Industrial Organizations, particularly in the organization of the steelworkers, and it campaigned for unemployment insurance and aid to Spain.

In December 1947, the placement of the IWO on the Attorney General's List initiated a series of events that led to the liquidation of the IWO by the Insurance Department of New York. In 1954, after a number of court cases, the Insurance Department abolished the IWO and turned over its assets to Continental Assurance Company of Chicago.

INTERNATIONAL WORKINGMEN'S ASSOCIATION. Often referred to as the First International, the International Workingmen's Association (IWA) was established in 1864 by a diverse coalition of English and French artisans and trade unionists, expatriate revolutionaries, and political reformers who found common ground for organization in the threat of European militarism and the increasing use of imported foreign workers to break strikes. The IWA grew steadily through the accretion of labor and republican organizations throughout western and southern Europe and gained international renown after the Paris Commune of 1871, which it was accused of organizing but could not claim as its own. Standing at the ideological crossroads of the nineteenth century, the IWA attracted to it representatives of nearly every branch of anarchism, socialism, and the labor movement of its day.

Although he played no part in organizing it, Karl Marx was present at the IWA's founding meeting in London and immediately perceived its potential to radicalize the British and European labor movements. From the beginning, Marx believed that his foremost task was to combat those elements that he deemed reformist, idealistic, or adventurous, a group that eventually came to include not only anarchists but leaders of the English trade union movement, Italian nationalists, Spanish syndicalists, and "Yankee" socialists (as Marx called native-born American radicals) of all stripes. Marx ultimately achieved his goal of gaining ideological leadership of the IWA, but not before his attempts to centralize the IWA under his own control had pushed most independent socialist and radical sections into an opposition headed by the anarchist philosopher Mikhail Bakunin. The resulting factional feuding effectively destroyed the association by 1872.

The factional divisions that divided the General Council in London were exported along with the IWA to the United States in the late 1860s. While the official secretary for the United States corresponded with American radicals and labor leaders, Marx rallied his old comrades from the Communist League who had since emigrated to America. In the end, two distinct groups of Americans—on the one hand, native-born radicals with long experience in the movements for abolition, women's rights, or labor reform, and on the other, German American Marxists, many of whom were veterans of the revolutions of 1848—declared their affiliation with the IWA. Owing to their differing social outlooks and the fact that each group's contact in London represented rival factions on the General Council, each developed a unique understanding of the philosophy, rules, and purpose of the association.

In the late 1860s, New York City became the center of both American internationalist movements. Under the influence of Marx's American correspondents, several dozen German American socialists were converted from their Lassalleian faith in political contests to Marx's strategy of working through the trade unions. Affiliating their New York Communist Club with the IWA, these men formed the first officially recognized section of the First International in America. Their most active members, particularly Friedrich Sorge, reinvigorated the moribund Allgemeiner Deutscher Arbeiterverein (General German Labor Union) and turned its office in the Tenth Ward Hotel into the headquarters and informal training academy of American Marxism for a decade to come. Among its distinguished alumni were Adolph Strasser and Samuel Gompers, founders of the American Federation of Labor.

At about the same time, another handful of New York socialists whose radical experience was shaped by a variety of antebellum protest movements (the oldest of whom could remember working alongside Thomas Paine) organized the "New Democracy," an organization devoted to political reform (including women's rights), land redistribution, and state ownership of basic industries. The New Democracy turned to the remnants of antebellum radicalism, to pacifists, spiritualists, and labor and land reformers, to find recruits for its cause.

After the uprising and bloody suppression of the Paris Commune in 1871, the IWA gained international notoriety; it was even accused in the American press of setting the fire that destroyed Chicago. The tragedy of the Commune only served to lift the prestige of the IWA in the eyes of old-line American radicals, such as Wendell Phillips and Theodore Tilton, as they viewed the Commune as a struggle against political tyranny in the mold of the American Revolution. In the wake of the Commune the IWA spread steadily among native-born radicals and soon drew to its banner the famous sister stockbrokers, spiritualists, and feminists Tennessee Claflin and Victoria Woodhull, who placed their eclectic weekly journal at the International's disposal. "Yankee" chapters of the IWA were formed in over a dozen cities from San Francisco to Boston over the following year.

All of this flew in the face of the strategy that Marx and his German American cohorts had hammered out for America. Marx had called for organizing a coalition of German and Irish workers who would together radicalize the American proletariat as it was represented in trade unions. In the context of the existing labor movement, the strategy became a mandate to leave unchallenged, both in industry and in society as a whole, currently hardening attitudes in favor of racial and sexual exclusion.

Yankee Internationalists pursued their own broad egalitarian goals from under their new red umbrella. In New York, native American Internationalists symbolically marched in commemoration of the Paris Commune with African-American Civil War veterans in their foremost ranks. They organized blacks into the International and railed against discrimination of all kinds in their newspapers. They nominated Victoria Woodhull and Frederick Douglass for the highest offices in the land. In Washington they worked with the National Woman Suffrage Association and submitted a legal brief asserting that the Fourteenth Amendment to the Constitution guaranteed to women the right to vote. To Sorge and his allies at the Tenth Ward Hotel, these were diversionary, even embarrassing, idealistic and moralistic tendencies that must be eradicated.

And so they were. Purged first from the Central Committee by a rump meeting of Sorge's German American faction, the Yankee Internationalists were then denounced by Marx as "bogus reformers, middle-class quacks and trading politicians" and suspended by the General Council. In spite of the personal appeals of New Democracy founder William West, who spent all his meager savings on a one-way steerage ticket to attend the Hague Congress of 1872, the Yankee Internationalists were thrown out of the IWA. Sorge was rewarded with the job of general secretary and the General Council was moved from London to New York to separate it from its increasingly powerful Continental dissenters.

The "Yankees" disregarded the order and continued to call themselves the true representatives of the International in America. They published their own party journal, the Worker, and held several poorly attended congresses of their own. With the onset of depression in 1873 they achieved some success in organizing the unemployed, a movement that culminated in the police riot at Tompkins Square in 1873.

But within a couple years of the Hague Congress most sections had collapsed and most members had drifted on to other reform projects. The former members of the section in Philadelphia continued on as one of the founding chapters of the Sovereigns of Industry, the urban equivalent to the growing Patrons of Husbandry. Several former Yankee Internationalists became active in the Knights of Labor, particularly in that hotbed of radicalism and power politics known as the Home Club. Many eventually joined in the Greenback enthusiasm of the late 1870s, and some, including William West himself, could be found in the membership rolls of the Socialist Labor Party in the 1880s. For the most part, however, these were the individual efforts of a collection of dauntless American radicals. Their importance as an ideological and institutional connection with the deep history of American radicalism was lost to the American Left.

Sorge's forces kindled the fading light of the IWA for several more years. In spite of their isolation from the native streams of radicalism and their failure to make inroads among the existing trade unions, the resolute socialists of the Tenth Ward Hotel stuck by their trade unionist strategy to the dismay of those who wanted to redirect the International toward electoral action. In 1874 the remaining shard of the International split again as "Lassalleian" socialists formed their own organizations in Chicago and New York. Soon afterwards, Sorge himself fell victim to the continued infighting and was forced to step down from the General Council. When the two sides finally reconciled at the "Unity Congress" in 1876, what remained of the International was formally dissolved.

Forty years later Friedrich Sorge published a collection of his extensive correspondence with Marx, Engels, and other important nineteenth-century socialists. In his preface to the Russian edition of the letters, V. I. Lenin called attention to their value in highlighting the dangers of sectarianism and the isolation of American socialism from the working-class movement. In spite of his appreciation of these dangers, Lenin was not aware of the degree to which Sorge and Marx themselves had contributed to creating the pattern, indeed the culture, of sectarianism and isolation that plagued the American Left from the very beginning of the First International. Marx's and Sorge's dream of establishing a centralized, ideologically focused association was doomed to fail among American workers and American radicals who refused to compromise their moral principles or republican beliefs for a distant strategic purpose.

IN THESE TIMES. From the later 1970s through the 1990s, with the Left in a badly reduced state, the weekly tabloid In These Times became the most read and discussed socialist paper. Its circulation, only a few thousand at its 1976 inception, reached almost forty thousand by the close of the 1980s before declining to below twenty thousand a few years later. Its independence, eclecticism, and general perspective in fact coincided with much of the surviving (and slowly regenerating) radical opinion.

In a political sense, In These Times could trace its lineage, through its editor, James Weinstein, to Studies on the Left, the journal Socialist Revolution (after Weinstein's tenure, Socialist Review), and the early years of the New American Movement. Weinstein had moved from institution to institution with the fixed purpose of promoting radical ideas and practice more in line with the pre-1920 Socialist Party than any other precedent. Now hinged upon the revival of anticorporate, anti-Cold War educated opinion, these views, flexible on details, readily encompassed peace movements, environmentalism, labor dissent, feminism, cultural radicalism, and a special concern for radical history. Editorials elaborating these positions, formulated in the paper's early years by fellow Studies on the Left veteran Martin Sklar and in later years by Weinstein himself, focused politically on efforts within the Democratic party, but occasional insurgent efforts such as the New Party also received respectful attention.

In practice, the main strengths of In These Times lay in its reportage and its cultural section. Independent journalists from Africa, the Middle East, Latin America, the former Soviet Union, and various parts of Europe sometimes scooped the commercial press. Mainstream journalists also occasionally contributed essays unpublishable in their usual outlets.

A political shift away from the disappearing New Left and its successors proved to be the paper's Achilles' heel. As the midterm election of 1978 had provided the high point of political expectations for the Democratic Socialists of America, so the Jesse Jackson campaign and the struggle against Reagan's wars in Central America marked a high tide of the paper's readership. Those now leaning steadily rightward—among the staffers, most prominently John Judis—celebrated the Sandinistas' electoral defeat, treated critics of U.S. interventionism as enemies of a new liberal-centrist coalition, and hailed the Gulf War as the end of the Vietnam Syndrome. As Judis defected to the New Republic (and labor reporter David Moberg, more cautiously, into similar circles), a portion of readers turned away from what they viewed as creeping centrism or abandoned the Left entirely.

In 1994, In These Times averted a nearly fatal crisis by abandoning the weekly tabloid format altogether for a biweekly magazine format. With less space and lower budgets than previously, In These Times continued to search for another new constituency beyond the New Left and its successors. Founder James Weinstein determinedly remained at the helm, looking ahead to some future day when the revival of a mass socialist movement would bring the politics of In These Times into the mainstream.

IRISH AMERICANS. The American Irish, third largest ethnic group in the United States, arrived to occupy the lowest occupational categories open to whites. Canal diggers, domestic servants, and common laborers, they can be considered the first large-scale American proletarian group. Their relationship with the Left has been ambivalent. Although active in militant and sometimes revolutionary unionism, Irish Americans have, to many observers, epitomized the conservative side of the American worker (and, especially, the labor leader). Proportionally to the size of the group, very few have enrolled in Left movements. Yet Irish Americans have taken their place in the vicinity of the Left, at important times sharing anticapitalist sympathies even while restrained by religious and other reasons from adopting Marxism.

Irish American labor activity grew with the new industrial society of the early nineteenth century and expanded among the refugees from Ireland's Great Famine of the 1840s. Conflicts with Protestant workers (most notably in Philadelphia during the 1840s) and antipathy toward blacks (most notably in New York City during the 1840s–1860s) mixed with class-conscious rhetoric and action. The creation of the "Stage Irish" proletarian archetype or caricature beloved by the rising urban audiences, also provided symbols both sympathetic and ridiculing about the American worker.

In the later 1860s and early 1870s, Fenian conspiracies and proletarian discontent overlapped with early Marxist agitation. The First International made contact with groups of nationalists, and socialist wunderkind P. J. McGuire led a mostly-Irish slum proletariat of New York in dramatic public demonstrations demanding relief. Violent repression followed, and McGuire (who, along with International Labor Union and later Paterson, New Jersey, labor leader J. P. McDonnell, was one of the rare prominent Irishmen in the American socialist movement until the 1880s) recruited few Irish here or elsewhere in his lecture tours to socialist ranks.

Meanwhile, however, the Irish World and American Industrial Liberator (1870–1984) championed labor and Irish national causes, its earliest editor, Patrick Ford, sometimes espousing socialistic ideas without describing them as such. The burgeoning of the Irish Land League in the later 1870s and early 1880s laid a political basis for important labor causes shortly to follow.

The Knights of Labor, one of the most universalistic and potentially revolutionary of American social movements, was disproportionately Irish, from leader Terrence Powderly to the local craftsmen and factory operatives who joined with workers of all kinds (including many Irish American working women) in short-lived but impressive solidarity. In many places, the middle-class-oriented Land Leagues flowed into Knights' branches, and in some served as one origin of avowedly revolutionary intent. In Denver, Colorado, the anarchistic Rocky Mountain Social League and its important weekly, the Labor Enquirer, found strong support in the Irish community. From Saginaw, Michigan, Land League veteran Tom Barry rose to the National Executive Board of the Knights and simultaneously embraced social revolutionism.

Irish Americans played a major role in the formation of local labor parties in the mid-1880s. Many won local office temporarily and forced an accommodation of the Democratic Party to working-class demands. The most spectacular, the Single-Tax mayoralty campaign of New Yorker Henry George, seemed to merge Irish nationalism and socialist idealism under one banner.

During the confusion after the Haymarket incident, Powderly and most Knights leaders disavowed all radical connections, alienating socialists without slowing the Knights' disintegration. Local labor parties also faded away. However, in a number of industrial localities, individual Irish American labor activists made common cause with German American socialists, forming "American" branches of the Socialist Labor Party. This was especially so in New England, where shoemakers and assorted tradesmen sent socialists to the Massachusetts legislature during the 1890s and elected several local officials. The socialist-led National Union of Textile Workers, founded in Providence, Rhode Island, in 1896, was a largely Irish effort to revive the spirit of the Knights of Labor.

Socialist success, however limited, alarmed Catholic prelates, affecting no community more than the Irish Americans. Rigorously espousing the social doctrines of Pope Leo XIII's Rerum Novarum, leading bishops endorsed the principle of unionism (in the moderate version of the American Federation of Labor) while turning full fury against the Socialist movement and the Industrial Workers of the World (IWW). Along with the appeal of the Democratic Party labor politics, rapidly spreading in the Progressive Era, this pressure limited radical appeal to Irish Americans. Just to the right of the Socialist Party, however, the more aggressive nonsocialist unions (such as those in the Chicago Federation of Labor) and the then-muckraking, anti-war appeals of newspaper magnate William Randolph Hearst, stirred Irish radicalism of another kind. Between the two types stood a barrier as large as that between May Day and Labor Day, or between the neighborhood ethnic Marxist and the occasional "labor priest." Recruitment among Irish was proportionally very small, if not insignificant, into the Socialist Party. James Connolly, in the United States for only a few years, launched his unsuccessful Harp, founded the Irish Socialist Federation in 1908, and debated fellow socialists over the morality of divorce. He found fame (and martyrdom) on his return to Ireland.

More characteristically, an Irish American syndicalist spirit operated on the sidelines of political socialism. Connolly himself contributed to that, with his journalism on industrial unionism. Leonora O'Reilly, although a socialist, made her foremost contribution as a luminary of the Women's Trade Union League and speaker-strategist of the 1909 Shirtwaist Strike. William Z. Foster and Jay Fox, true European-style syndicalists urging work within the American Federation of Labor, pointed toward Communist strategies of the 1920s. Father Thomas Hagerty contributed the famous IWW preamble. Elizabeth Gurley Flynn, the Wobbly "Rebel Girl," was already in her teens a member of Connolly's Federation, before rising to the apex of her fame as agitator and strike leader in Lawrence, Massachusetts, and elsewhere. Even Margaret Sanger, pioneer leader of birth control agitation, had her political origins in syndicalist sympathies which strongly colored her short-lived tabloid, the Woman Rebel.

Communists like their predecessors recruited relatively few Irish Americans. But William F. Dunne (Farmer-Labor political leader and for many years an editor of the Daily Worker) and his brothers Grant, Miles, and Ray (organizers of the Minneapolis Teamsters Strike of 1934, and among the founders of American Trotskyism) exemplified the trade union orientation of Irish cadre. Michael Quill, who emerged as foremost leader of the Transport Workers Union (TWU) and a most popular spokesman of the American Labor Party, was by all odds the most successful. Irish American Communists in the National Maritime Union, somewhat greater in number, until the middle 1940s led one of the most powerful affiliates of the Congress of Industrial Organizations.

Neighborhood and community work had less success, despite moments of promise. At the height of the Depression, socialist James Grailton (deported from Ireland) organized Irish Workers Clubs, with branches in Philadelphia, Boston, Chicago, New York, and Providence (known there as the Right to Live Club). Grailton himself taught the writings of James Connolly to Mike Quill and a handful of veterans of Clan na Gael, the American affiliate of the Irish Republican Army, who went on to found the TWU. The Communist Party had meanwhile published the Irish Worker sporadically in the 1920s-1930s and promoted Connolly Clubs in the 1930s-1940s.

By the later 1940s and early 1950s, anti-radicalism held sway. Irish Americans contributed some of the most conservative individuals and institutions, including Joe McCarthy and the Church leadership. In part at least, however, the bitterly anti-Communist but (especially in its leadership) anarcho-radical Association of Catholic Trades Unionists (ACTU), disproportionately Irish and linked to the Catholic Worker movement, embodied much the same ambivalent conservative radicalism as the earlier Hearst following. Some ACTU local members, active past their days of anti-Communist concentration, worked with 1950s-1960s civil rights movements and, later, the 1970s grape boycott campaigns, embracing their once-bitterest foes.

In the late 1960s, Irish American radicalism revived in homeland-oriented activity, and emphasized a political dimension in the flourishing Irish American cultural associations. The North Irish Civil Rights Association spawned support groups and Republic Clubs throughout the United States. Irish American support for a united Ireland, long notoriously conservative in political orientation, grew more progressive or socialistic along with developments in the Sinn Féin and the Irish Republican Army. Irish Northern Aid, often embracing New Left veterans and reaching out to the new wave of Irish immigrants, retained an ambivalently radical spirit during the 1970s–1990s.

IRISH PROGRESSIVE LEAGUE. A small, New York-based organization, the Irish Progressive League (IPL; 1917–1920) was notable for bringing left-wing perspectives into the larger Irish American movement for Irish independence, a movement that was generally indifferent to class inequality and opposed to socialism. In the wake of America's entry into World War I and the federal government's efforts to silence Irish American nationalists, the IPL emerged as one of the few organizations willing to continue open agitation in favor of an Irish republic. But unlike many Irish American nationalists of this era, IPL activists believed that the fight for Irish independence needed to be linked to sweeping domestic social reform, peace, and the overthrow of colonialism in general.

The IPL endorsed socialist Morris Hillquit in his anti-war campaign for mayor of New York in fall 1917, and over the next three years attracted support from a variety of socialists, suffragists, left-wing progressives, and radical labor activists. These included Hillquit; socialist and pacifist Norman Thomas; suffragist and labor activist Leonora O'Reilly; Nora Connolly, daughter of the Irish socialist martyr James Connolly; and James Maurer, the socialist and anti-war leader of the Pennsylvania State Federation of Labor. These individuals viewed support for the Irish Republic as part of a wider struggle for peace, social reform, or workers' betterment.

IPL leaders adopted what might be called an "internationalist" or "anti-imperialist" position on the Irish question. Their cause, they believed, was thoroughly intertwined with those of Indian and Egyptian nationalists in particular, and some IPL leaders also advocated support for Marcus Garvey's Universal Negro Improvement Association. Other IPL activists linked their cause with that of the Bolshevik revolution and called for U.S. recognition of the new Soviet government in Russia.

The IPL was also distinctive as the first Irish American nationalist organization to be led mainly by women. Key figures included Dr. Gertrude Kelly, an Irish-born anti-war activist and feminist with political roots in the Henry George single tax movement; the Irish socialist and feminist Hannah Sheehy-Skeffington; and Helen Golden, soon to emerge as a leader of the American Women Pickets in the pro-Irish New York dock strike in 1920. In November 1920, the IPL folded itself into the larger American Association for the Recognition of the Irish Republic.

ITALIAN AMERICAN ANTIFASCISM. Labor and political radicalism represent essential components of the Italian immigrant experience in the United States. From the beginning of the century to World War II, the dominant feature of the Italian American Left was a fundamental tension between its enduring political ties with Italy, its complex relationship with the radical and labor movement in the United States, and the problem of defining its place within the Italian ethnic community. In the interwar period, within this general context, for thousands of Italian American radical and labor activists the struggle against fascism became the center of their activities.

By exposing the repressive and expansionist nature of fascism, Italian American antifascists sought to achieve several objectives. First, they wanted to help eradicate the Fascist tyranny in Italy. Second, they fought to rally Italian American workers to the struggle against Mussolini. Finally, they sought to illustrate that the universal nature of fascist ideology threatened U.S. society and its institutions.

In their relentless campaign against Italian American fascist organizations, scores of profascist Italian-language papers, and other ethnic institutions, antifascists voiced their concerns in a variety of ways, in many ideological forms, and through a variety of publications and organizations.

Although outnumbered and outsold by the profascist press, Italian American radical papers like the socialist La Parola del Popolo and Il Corriere del Popolo; the anarchist Il Martello, L'Adunata dei Refrattari, and Controcorrente; and the Communist Alba Nuova, Il Lavoratore, and L'Unità del Popolo, provided a forceful and spirited alternative voice in Italian communities across the country. The chief target of the antifascist campaign was Generoso Pope's Il Progresso Italo-Americano, which was the country's leading Italian American profascist newspaper.

In addition to verbal attacks, the battle against Mussolini and his supporters often escalated into bloody confrontations on the streets of Little Italies across the United States which left several killed and scores injured on both sides. On 14 July 1933, during a particularly violent confrontation between hundreds of opponents of Mussolini and members of Arthur J. Smith's "Khaki Shirts," a young antifascist, Antonio Fierro, was bludgeoned and then shot to death.

In April 1923 a broad range of Italian American labor and left-wing forces joined in founding the Antifascist Alliance of North America (AFANA). Common hatred for Mussolini and his supporters was not enough to unify a traditionally faction-ridden Italian American Left. By 1926 the civil wars that split the International Ladies Garment Workers Union and the Amalgamated Clothing Workers of America spilled over into the Italian American radical movement and caused the breakup of the AFANA. The collapse of the AFANA marked the end of the only successful attempt to bring together into one organization all the components of Italian American antifascism.

The fragmentation of Italian radicalism did not signal the end of Italian American antifascism. Throughout the Depression, led among others by Carlo Tresca, Arturo Giovannitti, Salvatore Ninno, Frank and Augusto Bellanca, and Michele Salerno, class-conscious Italian Americans continued to battle against Mussolini and his supporters. However, while some functioned as members of ethnic-based organizations or union locals, increasingly many antifascists voiced their concerns as members of multiethnic militant unions and, to a lesser degree, "American" radical political organizations.

For antifascists the greatest challenge was to curb the strong profascist feeling among the Italian American community: more specifically, to challenge the dominant definition of Italian American identity that associated U.S. and Italian patriotism with support for Mussolini. During the 1930s, antifascists appealed to first- and second-generation Italian Americans by capitalizing on their strong support for industrial unions and for Roosevelt's New Deal policies. To undermine the ideological and institutional strength of profascist sentiments, Italian American antifascists provided an alternative definition of what it meant to be both an Italian "patriot" and a "true" American that linked the national and international struggle against fascism with the battle for higher wages, improved working conditions, and union recognition in the United States. Class-conscious Italian Americans saw a clear connection between anti-labor and nativist sentiment in the United States and the rise and consolidation of fascism in Italy. Accordingly, their actions typify the historical focus of Italian American radicalism: the continuing struggle against exploitation and oppression both in their country of origin and in their country of adoption.

ITALIAN AMERICANS. The Italian American Left institutionalized itself only briefly, and to a small degree, within the Italian American community. But for that vital period, from the early years of the twentieth century to the early 1920s, radicals exerted influence vastly beyond their numbers, creating popular heroes and creating movements that nearly transformed Italian American life. In success and failure, they supplied the shock troops and also most of the outstanding intellectuals of class-conscious U.S. anarchism.

The earliest radical activity—part of the demographic cutting edge of an immigrant wave that would surpass any previous ethnic group, reaching nearly two million—developed around trades familiar to radical activity in the homeland. Skilled textile workers flocked to Paterson (“City of Anarchy”), New Jersey; marble and granite workers turned up at quarry sites in New England. Soon, more scattered organization in a variety of trades, against the background of the socialist movement’s development in native Italy, tended in the direction of coordination. By 1896, the “Partito Socialista della Pennsylvania” launched the weekly Il Proletario, destined to become the leading Italian American Left publication. Like the homeland movement, growing between bursts of activity and severe government repression, its U.S. counterpart adopted a variety of strategies to meet the special needs of constituents.

Largely illiterate (especially the female population), predominantly from the rural and conservative Italian south, these immigrants lacked for the most part the rudiments of Left self-organization, either industrial skills or strong national self-identity. They faced unrelenting exploitation at the lowest levels of American industry, their work often symbolized by the shovel of the menial laborer. Indeed, despite their penetration of major industrial labor such as textiles, they would continue to be viewed as a group apart, virtually nonwhite. Anarchism and syndicalism, with an emphasis on explosive rhetoric and direct action, understandably took early precedence over a patient, electoral socialism dependent upon a stable, educated population.

In 1902 the Federazione Socialista Italiana del Nord America (FSI) consolidated the leading body of militants. Unique to any major immigrant grouping, they chose a year later to withhold their affiliation from the Socialist Party, seeing the latter as politically timid and near-xenophobic. The Industrial Workers of the World (IWW), with its class-conscious strategy, its fierce egalitarianism, and its American version of the extreme anticlericalism native to Italian radicals, became instead the natural ally of the FSI (and again uniquely, its economic expression: all FSI members were mandated to join the IWW).

While the failure of the organization to develop left local Italian American radicals with no resources and little strategy but agitation against clericalism and for industrial unionism, the eventual upswing of IWW momentum placed them in the forefront of early 1910s labor struggles. The Lawrence, Massachusetts, textile strike of 1912—with Carlo Tresca, Arturo Giovannitti, and Joe Ettor sharing the spotlight and the threat to their personal safety—marked FSI’s highest point. With no more than three thousand members, it managed to direct support and related activities up and down the Atlantic Coast. The defeat of the Paterson strike the following year, and the retreat of the IWW, marked the eclipse of FSI influence and syndicalism at large.

Soon, Italian American radicalism tended toward two extremes: on the one hand, the more practical and mundane organization of industrial unions within the labor mainstream; on the other, the perpetuation of outright anarchist agitation against the calamities brought by the war years. Through the International Ladies Garment Workers Union and Amalgamated Clothing Workers (ACW), erstwhile anarcho-syndicalists such as Giovannitti attained respectability and considerable influence. New figures of importance, such as Joseph Bellanca of the ACW, emerged at the leftward edge of the Socialist Party mainstream. In coal-mining districts, and in the shoe and needle trades, immigrant socialists marched toward their goal of mobilization in unions, organization in Italian Chambers of Labor (a district-wide employment service inspired by homeland activities), and education in socialist principles. By 1919, they had achieved their immediate goals, at least in the New York area, to a surprising degree.

They had succeeded, however, in the wrong industries and the wrong era. Textiles, coal mining, and shoes would soon be “sick” trades, garments in a slump. More important, they had consolidated their energies just as the fierce anti-labor “open shop” wave swept across America. In a few years, nearly all their practical accomplishments had been eradicated, their movements virtually destroyed. Fierce struggles in the early 1920s, against the return of wages and working conditions to pre-World War I status, along with the reorganization of leading radicals in the Italian Federation of the Communist movement, marked the final heroic phase. Antifascist agitation, working against the unquestionably widespread appeal of Mussolini to nationalistic sentiments, tended to center in the diminishing organized Italian-speaking Left, with an occasional foray into direct action against fascist parades.

The Sacco-Vanzetti agitation, underscoring the victimization of Italian Americans in general and anarchists in particular, proved the last hurrah. A short-lived Italian-language Communist daily, Lavoratore Italiano, closed its door within a few years, and Italian support of Communism diminished to such inconsequential numbers that not even the later popularity of radical New York City congressman Vito Marcantonio could create a substantial Left cadre.

Surviving Italian American radicalism tended increasingly toward anarchism of the extreme, almost individualist, varieties. Following the severe anti-war agitation of Cronaca Sovversiva editor Luigi Galleani, government repression reached deep into the Italian community, plucking out hundreds for deportation. Eclectic anarchist Carlo Tresca, publisher of Il Martello, remained a popular figure for decades, until his mysterious murder (apparently at the hands of the Cosa Nostra) in 1940, but among a severely depleted constituency. Apart from the scattered and aging followings of the Socialist and Communist parties, Italian American radicalism drifted in its final decades toward a social life in local clubhouses established long before for a more aggressive purpose. In the 1990s, a new generation of Italian Americans sought to recuperate the radical legacy through scholarly conferences and participation in contemporary progressive movements.

ITALIAN FEDERATION OF THE SOCIALIST PARTY OF AMERICA. Founded in 1910, the Italian Federation of the Socialist Party of America (IFSPA) was formed when a group of reformists split away from the predominantly syndicalist Italian Socialist Federation, which had been established in 1902. Although the ideological boundaries between the two federations were rather vague, the tactics of the IFSPA were decidedly reform oriented: unions and ethnic mutual aid societies were major focuses of activity, and immigrants were encouraged to participate in the political life of the United States by learning English and acquiring U.S. citizenship and voting rights.

Although its membership rarely exceeded a thousand, (rising to fourteen hundred in 1914 owing to its opposition to the war), the IFSPA enjoyed significant influence within the Italian immigrant community. The federation published three weekly newspapers—La Parola dei Socialisti (later renamed La Parola Proletaria, La Fiaccola, and finally L'Avanti), La Fiaccola of Buffalo, and La Fiamma of Camden, New Jersey—with a combined circulation of approximately seven thousand. The upper echelons of the organization, most notably Giuseppe Bertelli, Alberico Molinari, and Girolamo Valenti, while not charismatic leaders, were able to provide valuable guidance, often based on the significant political experience that they had acquired in Italy. While they never rose to positions of influence within the American party, the Italian leaders of the federation played an important role in several labor organizations, especially in the "new unionism" with roots in the garment industry. The federation rarely took the lead in any strike activity, but it actively supported the garment workers' and cigar workers' strikes in Chicago and Tampa, respectively; it remained on the fringes of the labor struggles in East Coast textile centers such as Lawrence and Paterson. The electoral position of the IFSPA hindered relations with the Italian Socialist Federation despite the fact that, among the memberships, there was continual movement in either direction across organizational lines. The Italian Socialist Federation merged into the Industrial Workers of the World in 1921. The IFSPA, having survived its split with the Communists during the early twenties, engaged in various antifascist activities and published La Stampa Libera and Il Nuovo Mondo; it survived into the forties.

The history of the IFSPA sheds light on an important cause of the weakness of the Socialist Party in the United States: like other foreign federations, the IFSPA—the protests of its leaders notwithstanding—was not extended any decision-making powers within the Socialist Party. The IFSPA was hamstrung by a Socialist Party that effectively ignored the “new immigrants” and the problems of their community. The lack of interest showed how far removed the party was from the real life of foreign-born industrial workers in the United States.

JAMES, C. L. R. (1901–1989). The West Indian historian and social critic Cyril Lionel Robert James is best known in the United States as an anticolonial writer and Pan-African thinker and activist. Another critical dimension to his life and work was his long-standing interest in the politics and political culture of the United States. In recent years there have been a flurry of studies and biographies addressing different aspects of James's remarkable career.

Born and raised in colonial Trinidad, C. L. R. James received an outstanding secondary education at the Queen's Royal College in Port of Spain and went on to become an early advocate of self-government for the West Indies. James relocated to Britain in 1932 to fulfill his early ambition of becoming a literary figure. Within months he found employment as a sports reporter covering cricket matches. Gaining contacts from his professional success, he became active in the radical political milieu of 1930s London. Along with George Padmore, Jomo Kenyatta, and other expatriated blacks, he helped establish the International African Service Bureau, a militant anticolonial organization. In addition, he immersed himself in Trotskyist politics and lectured widely on the need for a new form of revolutionary socialist politics to supplant the fallacies of orthodox Communism.

James's involvement in Pan-African and socialist politics inspired one of his very best pieces of historical writing, The Black Jacobins: Toussaint L'Ouverture and the San Domingo Revolution (1938), which studied the relationship between the French and Haitian revolutions at the end of the eighteenth century. At root, The Black Jacobins is concerned not only with the complicated relationship between colonialism and the emergence of modern Caribbean societies, but also with the lessons that the Haitian story could offer to anticolonialists and Pan-Africanists in the twentieth century. While residing in Britain James was also able to publish a novel, Minty Alley (1936), and World Revolution: The Rise and Fall of the Communist International, 1917–1936 (1937), a well-researched critical history of the international Communist movement.

In 1938, at the prompting of Leon Trotsky, he traveled to the United States to attract black Americans to the revolutionary cause. In conversations with Trotsky, held in Mexico in 1939, he made the case for providing support to independent black organizations on the grounds that black movements for civil rights had their own legitimacy and autonomy and would serve as a stimulus for mass, labor-based mobilizations. His interest in the condition of black people in the United States deepened as a result of his travels through the American South and his involvement in a sharecroppers' strike in southeast Missouri in 1941. His position on the relationship between the civil rights struggle and radical politics was summarized in a 1948 essay, "The Revolutionary Answer to the Negro Problem in the U.S.A.," which has been widely reprinted.

In addition to writing on black politics in this period, James worked closely with a small number of collaborators to rethink the theoretical foundations of left-wing political practice. With his co-thinkers, most especially Raya Dunayevskaya, Grace Lee, and Martin Glaberman, he formed a small political group and intellectual circle known as the Johnson-Forest Tendency. ("Johnson" was the pen name of James and "Forest" that of Dunayevskaya.) The group translated sections of Karl Marx's 1844 Economic-Philosophical Manuscripts, promoted the discussion of Hegel's political philosophy among radical activists, and championed the independent political activity of militant industrial workers and other subaltern groups.

Overall, the Johnson-Forest Tendency served as a kind of catalyst for unorthodox radical thinking. It was in the context of his collaborations with Dunayevskaya and Lee that James produced the document that would become Notes on Dialectics (1980). Dunayevskaya also played a critical role in helping to develop a "state capitalist" analysis of the Soviet Union that rejected the Trotskyist interpretation of the degeneration of the Russian Revolution. By the early 1950s the group had severed its ties with the Trotskyist movement and had abandoned the approach of building a revolutionary vanguard party that would lead the working class to socialism.

Whereas the Johnson-Forest Tendency mostly confined its theoretical investigations to the sphere of politics and economics, James sought to apply its perspective to American society and culture as a whole. His interest in, and affection for, the political culture of the United States grew out of his commitment to revolutionary politics, and was most notably evident in the unpublished 1950 manuscript "Notes on American Civilization," which eventually appeared under the title American Civilization (1993). The book's central argument was that America's distinctive contribution to world affairs was the value her people placed on the pursuit of individual happiness. James maintained that the "struggle for happiness" had been thwarted by a pernicious combination of the assembly line and the bottom line. The deepening contradiction between liberal values and socioeconomic realities would gnaw at the society's foundations until the day that a broad social coalition rose up in democratic revolt.

Along with James's Mariners, Renegades and Castaways: Herman Melville and the World We Live In (1953), American Civilization underscores the distinctive nature of James's perspective and the importance he attached to autonomous movements of blacks, women, young people, and industrial workers in laying the basis for a sweeping transformation of American society. In retrospect, James's analysis anticipated the rejection of political conservatism in the late 1950s and 1960s that eventually engendered the counterculture and new social movements of the late 1960s and 1970s.

James's involvement in black issues, his investigations into America's political culture, and his political work on behalf of the Johnson-Forest Tendency were cut short in 1952 when he was arrested and interned on Ellis Island on the grounds of "passport irregularities." His application for U.S. citizenship was denied the following year, and he was forced to leave the country. He moved first to London (where he prepared his major study of cricket, Beyond a Boundary) and then to Trinidad in 1958, where he became a leading figure in the West Indian national independence movement. For nearly two years he edited the Nation, the weekly newspaper of the Peoples' National Movement, but he broke with the movement in 1960 and left the country just prior to the arrival of independence in 1962. His critique of the People's National Movement, Party Politics in the West Indies, appeared in 1962; his lectures on the relationship of the West Indies to world civilization were published in 1960 under the title Modern Politics.

During the 1970s and 1980s, James taught at several U.S. colleges and universities and lectured widely to audiences of young radicals. His Nkrumah and the Ghana Revolution, a sympathetic study of the postwar campaign for political independence in West Africa, appeared in 1977. His final years were spent in the Brixton section of London, where he spoke with numerous visitors and kept abreast of contemporary political events. During his lifetime, three volumes of selected writings appeared; he also worked with his assistant Anna Grimshaw to prepare what would become The C. L. R. James Reader. This single volume provides an exceptionally useful introduction to his rich and multifaceted intellectual legacy.

JAPANESE AMERICANS. Within the pre-World War II Japanese immigrant communities, the Japanese American Left consisted of a small but vocal minority whose birth and fortunes reflected developments in both the labor and radical movements in Japan as well as the United States. In stark contrast to the European immigrant Left, however, Japanese American immigrant leftists were at a special disadvantage because they stood outside the American body politic. As aliens ineligible for citizenship, they could not enter the political arena to participate in the American political process. Furthermore, Japanese American Leftists, unlike their European counterparts, also stood outside the structure of organized American labor because Asians were excluded by organized labor on racial grounds until the advent of the Congress of Industrial Organizations (CIO) in the 1930s.

Japanese American socialist study groups first appeared in San Francisco, Oakland, and other cities shortly after the turn of the century under the influence of the early socialist and labor movements in Japan. In 1906 a handful of Japanese immigrants formed the Social Revolutionary Party in Berkeley. An anarchist organization, it was launched at the behest of Kōtoku Shūsui, the noted Japanese anarchist. In 1908 remnants of the Social Revolutionary Party organized the Fresno Labor League, an incipient agricultural labor union of migratory Japanese laborers, under the partial influence of the Industrial Workers of the World. In 1910 Kōtoku and his alleged co-conspirators were arrested on trumped-up charges of plotting to assassinate the Japanese emperor, and in the following year he, along with others, was executed in what came to be known as the High Treason Affair. This marked the temporary demise of the Japanese socialist and labor movements both in Japan and the United States.

The Japanese American Left resurfaced after World War I under the influence of Sen Katayama, who was one of the founders of the socialist and labor movements in Japan. In 1914 he came to the United States because his life as a socialist in Japan had become intolerable. While residing on the East Coast, he came under the influence of Russian revolutionaries living in exile and became one of the founding members of the American Communist Party in 1919. In New York City, Katayama published a monthly called the Heimin [The Commoner] between 1916 and 1919. Under his influence, Japanese immigrant communists, including Okinawans and women, appeared in the 1920s, and by the middle of the decade they organized Japanese Workers Association branches in New York City, Seattle, San Francisco, and Los Angeles.

During the course of the thirties, Japanese immigrant communists were active in the American labor movement and the international struggle against fascism. Some were active in CIO organizing drives, especially among Alaskan cannery workers. In San Francisco, they published a monthly called the Kaikyūsen (Class Struggle) from 1926, renamed the Zaibei Rōdō Shimbun (Labor News) in 1928. From 1930 this publication was issued as a semimonthly under the title Rōdō Shimbun (The Japanese Worker) as the official organ of the Japanese section of the American Communist Party. In 1937 the Rōdō Shimbun was redesignated Dōhō, meaning "Brotherhood," in line with the Popular Front policy of the Comintern, and published continuously out of Los Angeles until April 1942. Almost immediately after the attack on Pearl Harbor, the American Communist Party suspended all Japanese American Party members and their spouses and supported the mass internment of all Japanese Americans. This racist policy (later acknowledged as an error by the Party), along with the actual mass internment of Japanese Americans during World War II all but spelled the demise of the Japanese American Left in the continental United States.

JAZZ. The myth that jazz transcends politics obscures a history of struggle in the jazz community. When analyzed in the context of racism, capitalism, and other systems of power, jazz artists have engaged in a certain kind of activism merely by creating and performing their music. Commentators have also argued that various jazz styles have echoed the political moment of their production. However, it is important to distinguish a broadly theorized cultural politics from the self-conscious political work in which musicians have involved themselves. We can envision the political activity and utopian aspirations of jazz musicians at the core of the story of jazz and the Left. Jazz and the Left is also defined by an unfortunately small, yet interesting, body of literature written by intellectuals who have self-identified with the Left.

As jazz developed during the early twentieth century in a context of migration, urbanization, and capitalist expansion, musicians challenged the conditions under which they labored. In 1910 James Reese Europe founded the Clef Club in New York as a trade association for black musicians who were unable to join the segregated Musicians' Union within the American Federation of Labor (AFL). Several years later he helped establish a separate African American AFL local. African American political organizations promoted the music as a vehicle for community building in the 1910s and 1920s. Although early organizers of the National Association for the Advancement of Colored People (NAACP) generally frowned upon jazz and blues, Marcus Garvey's Universal Negro Improvement Association (UNIA) sponsored musical performances and UNIA bands in various cities and published favorable articles on the music in its newspaper, Negro World. This institutional structure enabled politically inclined musicians, such as vocalist/pianist Revella Hughes and band leader Arnold Ford, to merge aesthetics and politics as they devoted their talents to the Garvey movement.

The socialist and black nationalist African Blood Brotherhood (ABB) also supported jazz. Through the impetus of its leader, Cyril Briggs, the ABB sponsored concerts, published music, and ran advertisements and articles about jazz and blues in its journal, the Crusader. Among the contributors to the Crusader was Andy Razaf, a well-known composer and lyricist for Fats Waller. Razaf was also a poet and street corner orator.

significant role in the cultural life of Harlem and other black communities. This sponsorship by the Left encouraged politically-minded musicians to lend their names and talents to progressive causes.

In 1937 the Daily Worker began publishing laudatory articles about jazz. In Harlem, this newfound respect for jazz was augmented with the Communist Party's institutional support for black arts, which was part of the Party's broader attempt to gain favor in African American communities. Although the Party's cultural politics during the Popular Front often reflected middle-class tastes and were by no means universally welcomed by black artists and intellectuals, left-wing sponsorship allowed musicians to achieve limited political expression. A benefit concert at Carnegie Hall for the Spanish Children's Milk Fund during this period featured W. C. Handy, Fats Waller, Cab Calloway, Jimmy Lunceford, Noble Sissle, and Eubie Blake.

The validation of black popular culture by the Left during the late 1930s may well have influenced more centrist institutions in African American communities. By the end of the 1930s, the NAACP, clubs, and churches were sponsoring performances of jazz and blues music. A 1939 benefit for the NAACP featured Duke Ellington, Louis Armstrong, and other prominent jazz musicians.

During World War II, jazz benefits and concerts expressed the rising cultural consciousness of African Americans and other communities of color, as well as the political demand of the "Double V" campaign. Duke Ellington presented his composition "Black Brown and Beige" at Carnegie Hall in 1943, intending this thematic exploration of African American life to be a vehicle for social change. On the West Coast, the first Jazz at the Philharmonic concert in Los Angeles in 1944 was a benefit for twelve Mexican American youths wrongly imprisoned in the Sleepy Lagoon case.

Also emerging during the 1940s was the musically complex modern jazz known as bebop. Although the radical intentions of its innovators have often been overstated, Dizzy Gillespie recalled that several of his contemporaries had close ties to the Communist Party and that he participated in a few demonstrations himself. Bebop itself was important as a self-consciously black expression that rejected the conformity of commercialized jazz. The musical and sartorial styles of its practitioners provided the codes for the creation of a rebellious subculture, and in the end, the sonic force of bebop inscribed political meanings onto jazz for musicians and commentators alike.

White cultural-critic Sidney Finkelstein was among the observers influenced by the politicizing impact of modern jazz. He wrote glowingly of the music in Masses and Mainstream, and in Jazz: A People's Music (1948), he sketched a book-length history of jazz and a program for its advancement. Eschewing both the "folk" purism and elitism of other commentators on the Left, Finkelstein rejected the boundary between jazz and European concert music, arguing that it was artistically limiting and indicative of the music industry's discrimination against black musicians. Jazz, he argued, would not reach its fullest expression until a "democratic change" in American musical culture allowed musicians to incorporate jazz elements into orchestral compositions and create a more universal expression.

From today's perspective, Finkelstein's aesthetic philosophy seems dismissive of the African American cultural tradition. At the time, however, his ideas were consistent with those of many politicized black musicians. In the early 1950s, saxophonist Buddy Collette and other black members of the segregated musicians' local in Los Angeles fought for union amalgamation. One weapon in this struggle was the Community Symphony Orchestra, wherein black and white musicians, classical and jazz players alike, presented public rehearsals to promote the cause of integration. Bassist Charles Mingus, who was also from Los Angeles and a participant in the local amalgamation movement, began his forays into public discourse by putting forth a similar philosophy in a 1951 letter to Down Beat magazine.

Shortly after the publication of his letter, Mingus moved to New York and began working with drummer Max Roach and other bebop veterans. During the civil rights era, Mingus and Roach were symbolic of the growing politicization of black musicians. In 1952 they formed record and publishing companies in an attempt to achieve some measure of economic and artistic autonomy. Mingus and Roach were increasingly vocal about discrimination and inequality in the jazz industry, and each incorporated political themes into his music. Mingus gained notoriety for the parodic song "Fables of Faubus" (1959), but perhaps the most important political jazz albums of this period were Roach's album We Insist! The Freedom Now Suite (1960) and vocalist Abbey Lincoln's Straight Ahead (1961). Lincoln and Roach performed on each other's sessions and were later married. They subsequently articulated their dissatisfaction with injustice in the jazz world and the broader society in a roundtable discussion, organized by Down Beat in 1962 after fallout from a negative review of Lincoln's album by one of its critics. Lincoln also became actively involved in working toward the fair treatment and visibility of African American women in the arts.

Musicians continued to lend their talents to national political causes during the civil rights movement. Ellington supported and played benefit shows for the NAACP and other causes during the 1950s and 1960s. At one concert in 1956, he appeared with Harry Belafonte and Coretta Scott King to help victims of racist violence in the southern United States. Mingus raised money for the NAACP at a concert at Town Hall in 1964, where he expressed his own contempt for the situation in the South between songs. In 1965 Albert Ayler and Cecil Taylor played a fundraiser for the Congress of Racial Equality at the Five Spot, and Cannonball Adderly performed at a Southern Christian Leadership Conference benefit in Chicago in 1969.

One of the more important and interesting developments in the jazz community during the heightened political moment of the 1960s and 1970s was the formation of collective organizations by musicians. Some groups were interracial, as was Bill Dixon's short-lived Jazz Composers Guild, which was formed in 1964 after a successful free jazz festival called "The October Revolution." Other organizations were predominantly or entirely black. A few jazz collectives were founded on a commitment to a free jazz aesthetic, while others were formed around more general principles of artistic expression, economic self-determination, and community activism.

Among the most prominent of these collectives were the Association for the Advancement of Creative Musicians (AACM) in Chicago, which was founded by Muhal Richard Abrams and featured Anthony Braxton and members of the Art Ensemble of Chicago as early members; Reggie Workman's Collective Black Artists in New York; and Horace Tapscott's Union of God's Musicians and Artists Ascension in Los Angeles, which performed as the Pan Afrikan Peoples Arkestra. Ideologically, these groups were united by black nationalist, communitarian, and utopian visions. Members of these organizations were in dialogue with other black arts groups and activists in their communities. They involved themselves in youth education programs and local struggles for justice and community uplift while simultaneously working toward bettering their own lives as musicians.

Some jazz artists espoused explicitly left-wing beliefs through their music and public statements. Saxophonist and playwright Archie Shepp, for example, was politicized in Greenwich Village intellectual circles in the early 1960s, where he was in frequent dialogue with LeRoi Jones. By the late 1960s, Shepp publicly articulated a Marxist perspective attuned to African American and Third World struggles as he critiqued the business practices of the jazz industry and capitalism in general. Shepp later wrote a play called The Communist, and in 1976 he recorded an album with Max Roach called Force, dedicated to Mao Zedong.

Bassist Charlie Haden also articulated a radical perspective through his musical projects. In 1969 he founded the Liberation Music Orchestra and recorded an album in collaboration with Carla Bley. The session included three folk songs from the Spanish Civil War and a Haden composition called "Song for Che." Haden received international attention in 1971 when he was arrested and briefly detained in Portugal after dedicating a performance of "Song for Che" to the liberation struggles in Portuguese-held Mozambique, Angola, and Guinea.

The political upheavals within and outside the jazz world were the inspiration for Frank Kofsky's Black Nationalism and the Revolution in Music (1970). This Marxist analysis of jazz aesthetics and industry practices, which was influenced by Thomas Kuhn's theory of shifts in scientific paradigms, celebrated "revolutionary" black musicians and condemned white critics, who Kofsky claimed were mouthpieces of the "class" that controlled the jazz business. Although its model of the politics of race and economics in jazz was ultimately reductionist, Kofsky's book provided an important critique of industry practices.

Kofsky built upon the early jazz writing of Amiri Baraka (LeRoi Jones). Although Blues People (1963) and several essays in Black Music (1967) employed a class analysis in their discussion of the production and consumption of jazz, Baraka took an increasingly cultural nationalist position through the 1960s. This changed in the 1970s, when Baraka rejected elements of black nationalism and adopted a Marxist perspective. By the time of the publication of The Music: Reflections on Jazz and Blues (1987), which he wrote in collaboration with Amina Baraka, the warring ideals of the black working class and petite bourgeoisie were even more central to this aesthetic formulations.

Today, at a moment when jazz is gaining "respectability" and becoming institutionally entrenched in universities and cultural centers, it retains its role as a vehicle for political expression. Musicians across geographic and ethnic lines continue to view jazz as a tool for social change. The AACM is still in operation, and other collectives intermittently emerge to voice a similar commitment to artistic freedom and social change. Charlie Haden resurrected the Liberation Music Orchestra in the 1980s and 1990s to record political folk songs from around the globe. Musicians also lent their names and talents to new types of struggles. In 1994 a wide-ranging collection of jazz players joined forces with hip-hop artists and other musicians to record an album entitled Stolen Moments: Red, Hot and Blue to promote AIDS awareness and raise funds for AIDS organizations worldwide.

JEFFERSON SCHOOL OF SOCIAL SCIENCE.

The U.S. Communist Party founded the Jefferson School of Social Science in 1943 as an expression of its view that Marxism was a legitimate doctrine that was being neglected by conventional schools. An unofficial establishment, this alternative school was intended primarily for outreach rather than (as in the case of its predecessor, the Workers School) to train Party cadres or to recruit members. At its Lower Manhattan site, the "Jeff School" offered hundreds of courses each term, boasted of a thirty-thousand volume library, and put on concerts and theatrical presentations that attracted large audiences. The student body numbered twenty-five hundred at first and went up to five thousand a term by the peak years, 1947–1948. Howard Selsam, the school's director, was a former Brooklyn College philosophy professor. The rest of the administrative and teaching staff (who were offered salaries) and an unpaid board of trustees included several heavily credentialed leftist academics and a number of teachers dismissed from New York's municipal colleges in the Rapp-Coudert purges of 1940–1941.

The learning process at the Jefferson School was not entirely political in nature. The introductory twelve-week course on Marxism, "The Science of Society" (fee: $7), covered the basic principles of Marxism, historical materialism, the theory of the state, surplus value, class struggle, and strategy and tactics in the transition to socialism. Advanced courses—hundreds each term—explored such issues as racism, imperialism, the U.S. political system, Jewish history, and trade union tactics. But artists and craftspersons also offered studio art and dance programs for children and adults. Some of the courses seem to have had little direct relation to the kind of political action normally fostered by a Communist Party-run school. For example, in the winter term, 1948, Dashiell Hammett taught "Mystery Story Writing." Students could also take such courses as "How to Decorate Your Home . . . [a] practical course in making a home within a limited budget." There was even a "Beauty and Fashion Clinic: Making the Most of Your Appearance" intended to show "the busy working woman how she can make herself more attractive with the least expenditure of time and money" and thus be more effective in trade union organizing. These courses, along with popular forums, special workshops, and single-admission ($.50) lectures, attracted students from the large pool of politically aware office and industrial workers in the city (men and women, black and white), conventionally educated middle-class people, and the inevitable springling of agents planted by the Federal Bureau of Investigation.

The problems of effective teaching in the Jefferson School's lively, heterogeneous classes of mostly adult students, many with little previous academic experience, soon prompted the faculty to institute teacher-training courses and to prepare learning aids for students. The staff produced a simple yet sophisticated nickel pamphlet, How to Study, that sought to demonstrate that Marxism can "be mastered by the average person." The emphasis was on building confidence and putting ability to learn in a political context, countering alleged capitalist propaganda about workers' supposed "limited intellectual abilities."

During the McCarthy era the Subversive Activities Control Board (SACB), the federal apparatus of the Federal Bureau of Investigation, directed the Jefferson School to register as a "Communist-controlled organization." At first the Jefferson School refused to do so and attempted a defense against the SACB (Jefferson School v. SACB, 331 F.2d 76 [1954]). In the end, the Jefferson School succumbed to massive government pressure and permanently closed its doors in 1956.

JEWISH AMERICANS. The Jewish role within the American Left has been one of such complexity that it defies easy summarization. Between 1890 and 1880, Jewish radicals played a central role in most Marxist organizations not otherwise designated racially or ethnically. But Jews were also active before the 1890s; and after 1880, even as the proportionate role of Jewish participation (Jewish workers especially) declined, the stamp of multigenerational Jewish participation remained.

The German American Left of the 1830s–1890s involved relatively few Jews, but those few individuals included free thinkers and some of the best-known socialist journalist-editors. Meta Stern Lilienthal, an editor of the free-thought journal Neue Zeit and an advocate of woman suffrage, was supported by other German Jews. Alexander Jonas, whose era with the New Yorker Volkszeitung spanned the 1880s to 1910s, opened doors for the Yiddish-speaking Jews of the new immigration. As the century drew to a close, the wrongs done to the Haymarket martyrs, generalized anti-Semitism, and the Russian agitation of the 1890s stirred the economically suffering new immigrants.

By the later 1890s Jews and German immigrants within the highest strata of Left political organizations far outnumbered the dozen or so other immigrant groups of the Left combined. In the following decade, Jews provided intellectual leadership of the Hungarian American Left and the political leadership of the Russian Americans, as well as of the Yiddish-speaking branches and the English-speaking sections in certain neighborhoods. In the wake of the tumultuous 1910s, Jews supplied both the rank-and-file militants and the cautious bureaucrats of large sections of the needle, fur, and jewelry trades as well as of other light industry in the Northeast. As such, they represented insurgent women activists, social democrats, and anarchists. The breakup of the Socialist Party in 1936 prompted the movement of its institutions (principally the weekly New Leader and New York radio station WEVD) into a semi-socialist, liberal direction.

In essence, radical Jews of various national origins and a considerable portion of their offspring continued to dominate Left circles well into the 1940s. Other immigrant groups never achieved similar importance. The attachment of the Left's hopes to the Soviet Union, the temporary flourishing of Russian Jewish culture, and then (despite Stalinism) the struggle against Fascism riveted Jewish concern. Toward the end of the 1930s, indeed, the proportions of Jewish Communists rose as the Party added numbers fastest in New York State and among hard-pressed professionals rather than blue-collar workers. Likewise, young Jewish Communists "colonizing" industries during the early and middle 1930s often found themselves leading union locals of large size and importance by the end of the decade. Still more often, they provided speeches and political documents for Gentile leaders.

After World War II virtually the only social democratic milieu in the United States was Jewish. Although progressive by American standards, it was among the most conservative social democratic milieus in the world. The formation of anti-Communist intelligence networks involved erstwhile socialists in considerable numbers, from embittered Menshevik refugees to upwardly mobile intellectuals. These social democratic circles, often devoting themselves in later years to support of Israel within the American labor movement, dominated the Social Democratic Federation, the Jewish Labor Committee, and later the Social Democrats, USA. As such they ardently supported the hawkish conservative labor leadership of George Meany and Lane Kirkland. More and more, "socialism" was viewed in these circles as an idealistic and useful movement of the past.

Communists and participants in the Popular Front meanwhile staggered into the Cold War era, electing a Jewish congressman from the Bronx on the American Labor Party ticket. Disillusionment with Stalin and the Soviet Union, along with the heavy-handed persecutions of the McCarthy era, damaged but did not destroy Jewish attachments to the broad causes of the Left. Abandoning the Communist Party, often going quiet for years, thousands of former Communists threw themselves into civil rights and peace causes. Unlike many Jewish liberals, they forswore cooperation with the Federal Bureau of Investigation and awaited the return of socialism's vision.

Many became involved in opposition to the Vietnam War, but it remained largely to the next generation to attach refurbished socialist visions to the New Left and feminism. From the middle 1960s to the middle 1970s, Jewish Americans were frequently found in college campus revolts and in newly formed feminist, gay, and lesbian groups. Efforts to attach a more specifically Jewish character to leftist efforts had little success with the exception of Michael Lerner's Tikkun magazine. Nonetheless, even in the 1980s-1990s, Jews were vastly overrepresented at every level and age group within all progressive movements.

JEWISH DAILY FORWARD. See Cahan, Abraham; Yiddish Left.

JEWISH LIFE/JEWISH CURRENTS. The oldest left-wing American Jewish periodical in English began in 1946 as Jewish Life (JL), the English-language organ of the Morgen Freiheit, and functioned in the orbit of the Communist Party. However, in 1956 the magazine embarked on an independent course, was renamed Jewish Currents (JC) in 1958, and evolved in the 1970s into a democratic socialist secular Jewish publication with a heavy emphasis on Jewish culture, Jewish history, and support for close black-Jewish relations. Today JC is acknowledged as being inside the mainstream Jewish community, as its left-wing component.

For the first nine-and-a-half years of its existence, JL adhered to current positions of the U.S. Communist Party (CPUSA) on Jewish and other issues. From 1948 to the middle 1950s, it followed the Soviet view concerning assimilation when, under Stalin, after 1948 all Jewish social and cultural institutions suddenly shut down. The magazine's explanation for these events was that they merely reflected a natural process of assimilation of Jews into the general Soviet population and therefore should be seen as being a progressive development and a direct result of the building of a new socialist society in the Soviet Union. When the anti-Semitic campaign in the Soviet Union and Eastern Europe reached its zenith during the years 1948–1953, JL referred to it as being a myth fed by Cold War lies. The publication defended the Prague trials of 1952 and wrote an effusive eulogy on the death of Stalin called "Stalin and the Jewish People." These positions served to isolate JL from organized Jewry.

Therefore, in 1956 JL faced a severe crisis threatening its survival in light of the revelation of Khrushchev's secret speech denouncing Stalin's crimes and the appearance of an article from a Polish Yiddish newspaper, revealing—from an official Communist source—the destruction of Jewish writers and institutions in the Soviet Union from 1948 to 1953. The magazine and its editors appeared to have become discredited with many readers. While the editors of JL officially apologized "for having failed" their readers in not perceiving the crimes against the Jews in the Soviet bloc, it was too late. The magazine lost three-fourths of its readers. It looked like the periodical would have to fold.

But it survived, as Morris U. Schappes became its full-time editor in 1958. It was renamed, with the new editor resolved to "pursue a course of independence of any outside control. . . ." It would be explicitly committed to Jewish survival and opposed to anti-Semitism wherever it occurred, including the Soviet Union and its allies.

The magazine maintained its editorial independence during the next ten years, while still retaining a correct relationship with the Communist Party and generally supporting Soviet foreign policy. However, the Six-Day War of 1967 saw JC stand with the rest of American and world Jewry behind Israel, in direct opposition to the positions of the Soviet Union and the CPUSA. This issue, plus JC's condemnation of the rise of official anti-Semitism in the Soviet Union and Poland, and the 1968 Soviet intervention in Czechoslovakia, prompted the magazine and the CPUSA to go their separate ways.

In later years JC defined itself as a democratic, socialist, pro-Israel, but non-Zionist, secular Jewish periodical. The magazine's readership and financial base continued with those subscribers who came out of the progressive Jewish movement. The magazine supported close black-Jewish relations and supported the Peace Now movement in Israel and Palestinian self-determination, including independent statehood on the West Bank and in Gaza, next to Israel. It backed U.S.-Soviet détente, while it was critical of the Jewish situation in the Soviet Union, supporting the right to emigrate but also emphasizing the right to full Soviet citizenship of the majority of Soviet Jews who chose to remain, including the restoration of cultural institutions where Yiddish, Hebrew, Jewish history, and literature would be taught.

Louis Harap, editor of the magazine from 1948 to 1958 and an active board member until his ninetieth birthday, contributed many substantial articles during the 1960s and 1970s that were reprinted in pamphlet form. After his resignation, Harap completed the writing of his landmark Image of the Jew in American Literature, a five-volume work.

JEWISH PEOPLE'S FRATERNAL ORDER.

Largest affiliate of the International Workers Order (IWO) by far, the Jewish People's Fraternal Order (JPFO) was the most robust, and at times among the most independent-minded, of the Left fraternal movements after 1920. The JPFO grew out of a political and generational division within the Workmen's Circle of the 1920s. As leaders of the Workmen's Circle grew more suspicious of the Russian regime they had initially supported, and as Communist unionists in the garment industry and elsewhere squared off against old-line socialist leaders, a split became inevitable. The Left (popularly known as the "linkies") garnered the loyalty of most of the Shule teachers and those young people generally most involved with the Yiddish cultural and recreational institutions; the Right, based for the most part in the older immigrant class, conveyed a somewhat more assimilationist impression even while they supported the Jewish Daily Forward and the Yiddish day-schools.

A year after its 1929 withdrawal from the Workmen's Circle, the IWO (for the moment Jewish only) applied for an insurance charter, claiming five-thousand members. By the mid-1940s, at its peak, the JPFO (renamed from the Jewish Section of the IWO, during the 1940s, to avoid the stigma of outright Left affiliation) could tally some fifty-thousand members, far more than any of its sister groups, and more than a quarter of the combined IWO's 200,000 members. Along with insurance policies, the IWO founded—among other institutions—an adult organ, Undzer Vort, and a children's paper, Yung Varg, as well as summer camps, sports leagues, amateur and professional theater, and some fifteen choruses. Its schools, central focus of cultural attention, enrolled some six-thousand students. Its health clinics and cultural apparatus, especially apparent in such Jewish blue-collar neighborhoods as the South Bronx and Brighton Beach, were widely regarded as community centers. In 1944 the JPFO even gained official admittance to the American Jewish Congress.

By the early 1940s, as the scale of European Jewry's tragedy began to become known, the JPFO accelerated a turn away from "abstract internationalism" (or "national nihilism") to a progressive recognition of Jewish identity as holding foremost importance. Itche Goldberg (b. 1906), the JPFO's outstanding pedagogue, declared in 1943 that the melting pot had a "scorched bottom," and that real democracy demanded a multilingual society of the future. No socialist or communist pronouncements on the "national question" had previously gone so far as to reject the finality of ultimate assimilation. In the wake of the Holocaust, the JPFO furiously launched new schools and literary projects to preserve Yiddishkayt, the culture associated with the Yiddish language.

With the acceleration of the Cold War, the U.S. Treasury Department and the New York Insurance Department deprived the IWO of its tax-exempt status and its insurance charter. Accepting defeat, the JPFO (now also deprived of its financial advantages) reorganized, much reduced, as the Jewish Clubs and Societies. Until dissolved in the 1990s (by which time membership had dropped to a few hundred), the Clubs and Societies were an important source of support for the newspaper Morgen Freiheit, the magazines Jewish Currents and Yiddische Kultur, Camp Kinderland, and the publication of Yiddish books.

JEWISH SOCIALIST FEDERATION. The roots of the Jewish Socialist Federation, or JSF (1912–1922)—formally a Yiddish-language "ethnic" federation of the American Socialist Party—lay in the General Union of Jewish Workers in Russia, Poland, and Lithuania (generally known as the Jewish Labor Bund), the first U.S. branch being formed in New York as early as 1900. Four years later, some fifty branches of the Bund across the United States were in existence. They formed the Central Union of Bund Organizations, whose main work consisted of providing material aid to the movement in Europe.

Immigrant Jewish radicals, including Bundists and others who had participated in or watched with high hopes the 1905 Russian revolution, were leading activists in the historic mass strikes that unionized the American garment industry on the eve of World War I. This "Great Revolt" of Jewish garment workers laid the industrial basis for the historic connection between Jews and the Left in America.

The Jewish Agitation Bureau of the United States and Canada was founded at a convention in Rochester, New York, in 1907 as a Yiddish vehicle for the Socialist Party. The Bureau dissolved in 1912, and the Jewish Socialist Federation was formed. Its goal was a Jewish socialist movement that could play a major role in the United States, as the Bund did in the czarist empire. JSF members played influential roles in garment unionism. The JSF's central leader, J. B. Salutsky, was closely associated with men's clothing workers leader Sidney Hillman, himself a Bund veteran from Lithuania.

While the JSF was an autonomous body within the Socialist Party, not all Jewish party members belonged to the JSF. Some Jewish immigrants who had come to America before 1900 and a number of leading members of the United Hebrew Trades were concerned that the JSF was significantly to the left of the Socialist Party of Morris Hillquit. Others expressed concern that Bundists were dominating the federation.

From their arrival on American shores until well after the revolution of 1905, Bundist and other Russian-Jewish revolutionaries focused most of their political hopes and aspirations on Russia. At first, they were skeptical of the Socialist Party and its main vehicle within the American Jewish community, Abraham Cahan's Jewish Daily Forward. But by 1912, Bundists in America had shaken the dust of defeat in the old country off their feet—as was made explicit in 1914 when the JSF named its weekly journal Naye Welt (New World).

The JSF grew rapidly. Its journal, which was edited by Salutsky, had a sizable and influential readership, and it brought energy and enthusiasm to the Jewish labor movement. The JSF's relationship with the Socialist Party, especially Cahan's Jewish Socialist old guard, was not always smooth. Nonetheless, it never identified itself with the Socialist Party's traditional Wobbly-oriented left wing. Indeed, the JSF was initially dubious about the Bolshevik revolution, as many of its leaders identified with the Bund, which was allied with Lenin's Menshevik opponents. In 1919, when many units of the Socialist Party in the United States joined in the newly forming communist parties, the JSF stayed behind.

Two years later, the majority of the Bundists in the new Soviet Union joined the Soviet Communist Party. A large section of the Jewish community there had swung over to enthusiastic support for the Reds because of White pogroms in the Russian Civil War. The JSF also found itself divided. In September 1921 the JSF voted by a fairly narrow margin in a hotly contested decision at its convention to leave the Socialist Party. The majority joined with the Communist Party. While many of the leaders of the old JSF majority left soon after, most of their followers stayed in the Party.

A minority, led by Workmen's Circle leader Nathan Chananin, immediately formed a new Jewish socialist group, the Jewish Socialist Verband. Renting space in the Forward building on East Broadway, the Verband started publishing a weekly newspaper, Der Wecker, and spent the next dozen years propagand-dizing among Jewish workers in support of social democracy and trade unionism and against communism. Among the Verband's prominent speakers in the interwar era were Raphael Abramovitch, a prominent Russian Bundist and spokesman for the Menshevik tendency in the Russian Social Democratic Party and Henryk Erlich and Victor Alter, leaders of the Polish Bund who would be executed by Stalin's regime in 1941.

Almost all JSF leaders had noteworthy subsequent careers. Moissaye Olgin became the most prominent spokesman for American Jewish Communism, editing the Yiddish newspaper Morgen Freiheit. Max Goldfarb became a Red Army general under the pseudonym Petrovsky and then a Comintern official as "A. J. Bennett." He was executed in the purges of 1937. Schachno Epstein managed to survive the purges and headed the Soviet Jewish Anti-Fascist Committee during World War II.

Among the socialists, Baruch Charney Vladeck became a prominent figure in New York City politics. Serving as a Socialist alderman in the aftermath of World War I, he was a leader of the pro-La Guardia coalition on the City Council in the thirties and the first chairman of the Jewish Labor Committee. J. B. Salutsky maintained political independence from the Socialist and Communist Parties alike, took the name J. B. S. Hardman, served Sidney Hillman's union in various posts, and became a widely respected scholar of the American labor movement, editing the publication Labor and Nation.

JEWISH WORKERS CHORUSES. From the 1920s through the 1950s, a Jewish workers' choral movement flourished, with thousands singing Yiddish folk and labor songs of Europe and the United States. Developing national networks of affiliated choruses across the United States and Canada, this movement played an important role in sustaining Yiddish secular culture, left-wing activism, and Jewish national identity.

Distinctly different from religious choirs, the Jewish secular choral movement began in Poland in the 1880s, enlivened with the modernist spirit of the Jewish Haskalah (Enlightenment). With increasing Jewish emigration to the United States, young immigrants formed Yiddish singing societies to continue a strong musical tradition that played a central role in eastern European Jewish life. As many of these immigrants suffered harsh living and working conditions, the demands and visions of a young, literary, and street wise Jewish socialist movement were woven into the lyrical themes and social purpose of these new choral groups.

In the early 1910s the New York Workmen's Circle, the first large-scale Jewish workers' fraternal order, established what would become one of the major long-term choral groupings. By 1914, a Jewish Socialist Workers Chorus had been established in Chicago. In 1918 the Paterson Singing Society was formed in Paterson, a New Jersey mill town that in 1913 saw one of the largest mass strikes in U.S. labor history. Another early chorus, the Poalei Tzion Singing Society, represented the young Labor-Zionist movement coming out of Russia.

Splitting from the Workmen's Circle in 1923, the left-wing Freiheit Gezangs Ferein (Freedom Singing Club) was established in New York. These choruses stood for a militant, trade unionist, Soviet-affiliated perspective while holding to a "high" theatrical Yiddish standard. The Workmen's Circle opted for a more moderate, reformist approach. Smaller in numbers, the Jewish Verband (Association) and Labor-Zionist choruses held to a vision of Jewish emancipation in a worker-run society in Palestine.

The original choral music that developed out of this movement drew from eclectic sources: Hebrew religious chants, Slavic and Yiddish folk melodies, and Yiddish theater tunes, with lyrics often drawn from Yiddish poets and writers. This completely new and unique Jewish American musical form melded religious, folk, and revolutionary styles into classically oriented choral arrangements.

The influence of choral leader and composer Jacob Shaefer exemplifies this elevation of Yiddish folk music into a classical proletarian movement. Born in 1888, the son of a poor Jewish carpenter in a small Russian town near Galicia, he split his youth between working in his father's shop and perfecting his recognized musical talents in local synagogues. In his teens he became the cantor of a large synagogue in Galicia. The influence of early religious training would be heard throughout his choral compositions in religious chanting accents and tonalities.

Coming to the United States in 1910, Shaefer studied music at the Chicago Conservatory, continuing work as a carpenter and achieving prominence as the leader of the Jewish Socialist Workers Chorus. In 1925 he went to New York to lead the Freiheit Gezangs Farein (FGF). Under his direction, a National Jewish Musical Union was formed and the left-wing choral movement flourished. By the mid-1930s, forty branches of the FGF existed across the United States. Shaefer also encouraged the development of mandolin orchestras, which grew up alongside many of the choruses.

Through the 1940s, the choruses experienced their greatest strength. World War II, the Holocaust, and the founding of Israel brought a new set of choral themes, emphasizing Jewish cultural identity. This return to Jewish roots was reinforced by the revelations of Stalinist terror and repression of Yiddish culture in the Soviet Union. The McCarthyite Red Scare led to the suppression of left-wing idealism. These factors, combined with demographic forces within the American Jewish community—upward mobility, suburbanization, the decline of Yiddish—contributed to the decline of this diverse choral movement in the 1950s. Yet through the 1990s, several choruses affiliated with the Workmen's Circle and the FGF continued to perform, giving joy and meaning to members and audiences striving to stay connected with Yiddish culture, Jewish identity, and ethics of brotherhood and justice.

JEWISH WORKERS UNIVERSITY. The first and only Marxist school to conduct classes in Yiddish, the Jewish Workers University prepared hundreds of activists to occupy positions in organizations such as the Yiddish schools of the International Workers Order, unions, Left choruses, and the Left Yiddish theater. Founded in 1926 in New York City, the university began with about two hundred students, immigrants for the most part formally uneducated, save in rudimentary Hebrew (and only for the boys). It taught reading and writing in Yiddish, the history of the Jews and the working class, anthropology, political economy, and other subjects. It also founded its own chorus.

The school's primary director, Israel Ber Bailin (1883–1961), had been an ardent Bundist and political prisoner in czarist Russia, a translator-secretary for the pre-1919 Socialist Party, and a founder of the Chicago Gezangs Farein along with Jacob Shaefer. Educational director of the Workmen's Circle during the 1920s, he helped establish hundreds of Jewish Children's Schools throughout the nation and edited the fraternal monthly Der Freund. Driven out for his support of the Soviet Union, he became editor of Der Hammer from 1933 to 1939 and, on its closing, a staff member of the Morgen Freiheit.

Under Bailin's leadership, the Jewish Workers University continued until 1941, when it was replaced by the School for Jewish Studies, located in the same building (and sharing staff) with the Communist Party's Jefferson School of Social Science. The School for Jewish Studies, headed by Chaim Suller, closed with the Jefferson School in 1956 because of McCarthyite pressures.

JOHN REED CLUBS. Founded in New York in November 1929 by the editorial board of the New Masses, the John Reed Clubs (JRCs) were educational and agitational in purpose. They were modeled on literary studios for worker-correspondents created by the Proletcult in the Soviet Union, which Mike Gold and Joseph Freeman had seen during visits earlier in the decade. The shift in Comintern policy into the Third Period in 1928 made the American Left take the class war into every aspect of culture. With a slogan ("Art Is a Class Weapon") designed to emphasize the clubs' opposition to aesthetic doctrines of art for art's sake, the clubs offered an alternative to the "lost generation" and the postwar voices of disillusionment. The JRCs were militant, energetic, and highly political. Branches soon formed in the larger American cities, as well as in smaller towns like Carmel, California, and Kalamazoo, Michigan. By 1934 there were more than thirty clubs, with a reported membership of twelve hundred. A journal, the JRC Bulletin, was published by the national headquarters; regional and national conventions were held; and JRCs for artists were created. The leaders of the JRC were generally members of the Communist Party, though the role of the Party was sometimes disguised. The executive committee of the national organization included Joseph Freeman, Whittaker Chambers, and the artists Louis Lozowick and William Gropper.

The full range of club activities constitutes a legacy of radical cultural practice that the American Left, or the Communist Party, has rarely approached since. Consider the Chicago JRC in 1931. Club members made posters for demonstrations and parades in the city. Murals in the Peoples Auditorium were painted; dramatic material and scenery was provided for the Blue Blouses, a youth drama group; demonstrations were organized on high school and university campuses to win support for the International War Day on 1 August; the program for the John Reed Memorial Day held at the Peoples Auditorium was written by members, and consisted of songs, dances, music, a mass chant of an anti-war poem, and a talk on Reed by the former Wobbly Ralph Chaplin. A proletarian art exhibit, including work by Ivan Albright and Mitchell Siporin, and photographs from the JRC Film and Photo Group, was held in the summer. In December, a JRC Ball was held in Chicago to raise money for activities in 1932. The inner life of the JRC was less impressive: Party manipulation, ideological rows, and sectarianism were the order of the day. The New York JRC could call upon a wider range of literary talent (an impressive series of lectures was given by Kenneth Burke, Edward Dahlberg, Horace Gregory, Granville Hicks, John Howard Lawson, and Philip Rahv), but even here the Chicago JRC could boast of the discovery of Richard Wright.

The JRC sent a joint delegation with the New Masses in 1930 to the Kharkov Congress of the International Union of Revolutionary Writers (IURW). The delegation, which included Mike Gold and William Gropper, was divided along sectarian lines, with younger members seeking to block the affiliation of individuals like Upton Sinclair to the IURW. They called for stricter discipline and adherence, especially in the pages of the New Masses, to the rigorous demands of proletarian literature. The problem of relations with non-Party sympathizers was never solved by the JRC and remained a source of conflict. Alexander Trachtenberg, director of International Publishers and the link between the Party's central committee and the JRC, opposed sectarianism at the JRC convention in 1934, and when it became obvious that the club was unable to keep step with the evolution of Comintern policy toward a Popular Front, the JRC was quietly dissolved and Party efforts were directed toward the League of American Writers. Isolated cities retained active clubs into the next decade, but the journals, from the modest mimeographed Proletcult (Portland and Seattle) and Red Spark (Cleveland) to the prestigious and elegantly printed Partisan Review, edited by Rahv and William Phillips, nearly all died. The loss to American letters was not severe: it takes longer than five years to change a culture. But when the Partisan Review was reborn as an anti-Stalinist journal of the Left in 1936, the erosion of Party influence on the American intellectual Left had begun in earnest.

JOHNSON, OLIVE M. (1872-1952). One of the most prominent women in American Socialism, Olive Malmberg Johnson was editor of the Weekly People, organ of the (American) Socialist Labor Party, from 1918 to 1938. Born in Sweden, she emigrated in the 1890s to the United States, where she joined the Socialist Labor Party. Like many Scandinavian immigrants, she lived in the Midwest. After moving to California, she was elected to the national executive committee. Her marriage to another member broke up and she never remarried.

She was a close friend to Daniel De Leon, and much of their voluminous correspondence still survives. In 1907 she made an unauthorized trip to the national executive committee meeting in New York to support De Leon in his conflict with James Connolly over editorial and party policies. Her vote was also crucial in opposing national secretary Frank Bohn's moves toward unity with the Socialist Party. In 1910 she attended the socialist international congress in Copenhagen with De Leon. In 1918 she was chosen by the national executive committee to replace Edmund Seidel, who as national editor espoused pro-unity views.

Her editorial positions were especially hostile to the Communist and Socialist parties and the anti-political Industrial Workers of the World, but she also condemned the Congress of Industrial Organizations as well as nonrevolutionary movements such as the cooperative movement and the New Deal. She was very active during this period, not only as editor, but also as pamphlet writer, speaker, and candidate for public office. She was a spokesperson for a socialist women's group in greater New York and in 1907 wrote Woman and the Socialist Movement. Other works include The Cooperative Movement (1924), Industrial Unionism (1935), and a history, Socialist Labor Party, 1890-1930 (with Henry Kuhn, 1931).

In the 1930s, she suffered from tuberculosis and carried out her editorial duties more and more at home. This, along with personality differences with national secretary Arnold Petersen, resulted in her removal as national editor in 1938. Her health continued to deteriorate and she died in Malibu, California.

JOHNSON DOLLINGER, GENORA (1913-1995). Born in Kalamazoo, Michigan (where her mother, Lora Albro, had gone to give birth), but raised in Flint, Genora Johnson became a charter member of the newly organized Flint Socialist Party in 1931. She would go on to play a pivotal role in the sit-down strike of 1937 at General Motors Plant No. 4, an event that led to the signing of the first union contract by General Motors and was a turning point in the organization of the United Automobile Workers (UAW). Her first husband, Kermit Johnson, was the only member of the city-wide strike committee who worked at that plant, and his proposal that it be made the focus of the strike encountered opposition from Walter Reuther and other members of the Socialist Party; Genora appealed to Norman Thomas for support, and her unyielding insistence was a primary factor in the strategy's ultimately being accepted. Then, during the strike, she organized the thousand-member strong Woman's Auxiliary, out of which emerged a paramilitary Women's Emergency Brigade of four hundred. Arming itself with clubs to defend the strikers, it played a crucial role in their eventual victory. (The Auxiliary was the subject of the documentary With Babies and Banners, an Academy Award nominee in 1978.)

In 1938-1939, Genora Johnson organized the first unemployed union to be affiliated with the UAW and served as its secretary. To avoid blacklisting by General Motors, she moved to Detroit with her second husband, Sol Dollinger, and worked at Briggs. She was elected vice-chair of the Shop Stewards Body and sat on the committee set up in 1945 to investigate physical beatings of trade unionists. She soon became the victim of a lead-pipe attack while asleep in bed. Six years later the Kefauver Committee determined that the Briggs beating and the shotgun attacks on Walter and Victor Reuther were instigated by an alliance of several major Detroit auto executives and the Detroit Mafia.

Johnson joined the Socialist Workers Party in 1938 and was a founding member of the American Socialist Union in 1953. From 1960 to 1966 she was an officer in the Michigan Civil Liberties Union, and she was one of the first presidents of Women for Peace, an anti-Vietnam War organization. While in that office she persuaded a number of Detroit union leaders to come out publicly against the war.

In 1977, at the fortieth anniversary banquet of the sitdown strike, she took the opportunity to express her disappointment with the direction the UAW had taken, dismissing the festivities as just so much

"tuxedo unionism." In the 1980s she became a charter member of Labor Party Advocates. In 1994 she was inducted into the Hall of Fame of the Michigan Women's Historic Center in Lansing.

JONES, CLAUDIA (1915–1964). Born in Port of Spain, British West Indies (Trinidad), Claudia Jones was a child when her family migrated to Harlem in the 1920s. Like many working-class black Harlemites, she was attracted to the Communist Party through the International Labor Defense's campaign to free the "Scottsboro Nine." Soon after joining the Young Communist League in the early 1930s, Jones became editor of the League's Weekly Review and the Spotlight.

As one of the preeminent young black Communists in Harlem during the Popular Front era, Jones actively supported the National Negro Congress from its inception, serving as a leader of its youth council in Harlem. Although she had been associated with issues pertaining to Afro-American rights and was among the first to criticize Earl Browder's decision to abandon self-determination in the "black belt," during World War II Jones developed a reputation as a relentless critic of male chauvinism and a leading Party spokesperson for women's rights. After the war she was appointed to the Women's Commission, briefly serving as its secretary.

In 1951 Jones was convicted of violating the Smith Act and imprisoned in Alderson Federal Reformatory for Women. Because the prison conditions aggravated her tuberculosis (which she had contracted as a factory worker in Harlem), Jones served only one year and was deported to England soon after her release. Although residence in London did not vitiate her political activities (she edited the left-wing West Indian Gazette), her health continued to deteriorate. She died in 1964.

JONES, "MOTHER" MARY HARRIS (1836–1930). A union organizer and sometime socialist associated primarily with the United Mine Workers of America, "Mother" Mary Harris Jones was an impassioned and highly effective organizer. A white-haired, grandmotherly figure, she gained prominence during the anthracite strike of 1900, attracting national attention during several other strikes, including the Paint and Cabin Creek strike (West Virginia, 1913) and the Colorado Fuel and Iron strike (1913–1914). Her physical courage and flamboyant style became legendary as she waded creeks, defied mine guards, and went to prison in the miners' cause.

The facts of her early life remain for the most part obscure. She was born in Ireland, most likely in 1836, and at age seven came to the United States with her father. As a young woman she taught school and worked as a seamstress, eventually marrying George Jones, a member of the iron moulders' union. He and their four children died in the Memphis yellow fever epidemic of 1867. In 1871 her dressmaking shop burned down in the Chicago Fire. Thereafter she became involved with the Knights of Labor, and later with the anti-Chinese agitation that thoroughly infected the labor movement of the 1880s. In the early 1890s she began organizing coal miners.

Although chiefly associated with coal miners, Mother Jones worked with other groups as well. In 1903 she organized a widely publicized march of textile mill children to demonstrate the evils of child labor. She supported various socialist causes, including her one-woman campaign in 1910 for the release of Mexican revolutionaries jailed in American prisons.

Politically, Mother Jones moved in the mid-1890s from populism to socialism, and in 1916 from socialism to support of the Democrat Woodrow Wilson. She held strongly anti-capitalist views along with fervently traditional views on the roles of women, notwithstanding her own nontraditional lifestyle. Mary Harris Jones died on 30 November 1930 and was buried in the miners' cemetery in Mount Olive, Illinois.

KELLER, HELEN (1880–1967). Almost everyone knows that Helen Keller, born in Tuscumbia, Alabama, was stricken at the age of nineteen months by a disease that left her deaf, blind, and mute; that she was brought out of her prison of despair and frustration by Anne Sullivan; and that she triumphed over her disabilities, graduating cum laude from Radcliffe College after mastering Greek, Latin, German, and French. In the years that followed, Keller campaigned for the deaf and blind around the world. She also appeared in vaudeville and motion pictures and wrote books of literary distinction. Her accomplishments led Mark Twain to characterize her as “the greatest woman since Joan of Arc,” and to assert that “the two most interesting characters of the nineteenth century are Napoleon and Helen Keller.” Good Housekeeping included her in its selection of “America’s Twelve Greatest Women,” describing Helen Keller as “Living Proof of the Divine Spark in the Human Brain.”

For all her fame, not many people know that this woman was one of the best-known figures in the American socialist movement, a champion of the working class and its struggles against industrial barbarism, a consistent foe of militarism, war, and imperialism, and a militant crusader for a new society. Turning the yellowed pages of radical newspapers and magazines between 1910 and the early 1920s, one frequently finds the name Helen Keller beneath speeches, articles, and letters dealing with major social questions of the era. The radical vision that runs through these writings is the vision of socialism. In the New York Call, daily organ of the Socialist Party, Hattie Schlossberg wrote on 4 May, 1913: “Helen Keller is our comrade, and her socialism is a living vital thing for her. All her speeches are permeated with the spirit of socialism. . . .”

Until her death in 1967 at the age of eighty-seven, J. Edgar Hoover maintained a detailed investigative file on this remarkable and distinguished American whose triumph over her disabilities was an inspiration to millions the world over. To Hoover, Helen

Keller was a “writer on radical subjects,” and as such had to have her activities carefully monitored by the Federal Bureau of Investigation and recorded in a file that was stamped “Security Information Confidential.”

When Helen Keller decided after 1921 that her chief life work was to be devoted to raising funds for the American Foundation for the Blind, her activities for the socialist movement diminished but did not cease. No matter what social cause she espoused, Keller was always on the radical side of the movement. A left-wing socialist, she despised “parlor socialists” who quickly abandoned the struggle when the going became difficult and often ended up “hopelessly reactionary.” She supported every workers’ struggle, but she was “heartily disgusted” with the conservative policies of the leadership of the American Federation of Labor (AFL). “If only Jehovah in his infinite mercy would take [Samuel] Gompers to Heaven, there might be some hope of an American labor party worthy of the name,” she wrote in the early 1920s. Because of the AFL’s emphasis on organizing mainly the skilled, white, male workers in craft unions, she lined up with the Industrial Workers of the World. She admired the Wobblies’ militant, innovative tactics, their advocacy of industrial unions under which all workers would be organized regardless of skill, sex, and race, and their belief in the ultimate goal of a new society. She was also on the side of the militants in the struggle for woman suffrage, advocating the adoption of the militant tactics of the British suffragettes, including hunger strikes. “I believe the women of England are doing right,” she told a reporter for the New York Times. “Mrs. Pankhurst [founder of the British movement] is a great leader. The women of America should follow her example. They would get the ballot much faster if they did. They cannot hope to get anything unless they are willing to fight and suffer for it. The pangs of hunger during the hunger strike are a sample of the suffering they must expect.”

She did not value militancy for its own sake nor even for the sake only of individual causes. "I am a militant suffragist," she explained, "because I believe suffrage will lead to Socialism and to me Socialism is the ideal cause."

KELLEY, FLORENCE (1859–1932). Foremost socialist figure within the world of mainstream American reform, Florence Kelley reshaped the settlement house movement, conducted early factory inspections, and promoted the passage of groundbreaking state, federal, and local labor and social legislation.

Born into an elite Philadelphia family with a strong tradition of Quaker activism—the daughter of William "Pig Iron" Kelley, a radical Republican with fifteen consecutive terms in the U.S. House of Representatives—Kelley graduated from Cornell in 1882. Contact with socialist refugees and students at the University of Zurich in 1884 precipitated her lifelong commitment to socialism.

That year, she married a Polish Jewish socialist medical student, Lazare Wischniewetzky. She gave birth to three children in three years, and also undertook major translations of the writings of Marx and Engels. Her translation of Engels's Condition of the Working Class in England in 1844, first published in New York in 1887, remains the most widely read version of that classic work.

Upon moving to New York in 1887, she and her husband joined the Socialist Labor Party, from which they were soon expelled. The party was unaccustomed to women in leadership positions, especially those who challenged their interpretations of Marx and Engels with more authoritative versions. Thereafter, Kelley turned to other avenues of social change, training herself in 1889 as an expert on child labor reform.

Prompted by her husband's physical abuse, late in 1891 Kelley moved to Chicago. There she entered into a lifelong affiliation with the settlement house movement, taking up residence at Hull House with Jane Addams and others. Herself a key factor in their shift from philanthropy to reform, Kelley gained in turn emotional and financial support from her co-workers. Using data she collected as an investigator for the Illinois Bureau of Labor Statistics and as the U.S. commissioner of labor, she constructed in the maps of Hull House Maps and Papers (1985) the most sophisticated social survey in the United States. Appointed the first chief factory inspector for Illinois in 1893, she and her staff of twelve vigorously enforced a pioneering eight-hour law for working women and children.

Kelley returned to New York in 1898 as general secretary of the National Consumers League, residing until 1926 at Lillian Wald's Henry Street Settlement. Coordinating the efforts of scores of local leagues, she shaped much of the nation's early labor and social legislation. Between 1910 and 1930 she was the most important single lobbyist for the passage of state minimum-wage legislation for women, and was likewise instrumental in the creation of the U.S. Children's Bureau in 1912 and the Sheppard-Towner Maternity and Infancy Protection Act in 1921 (the only federal precedent for the child welfare portions of the Social Security Act of 1936). As a Socialist Party member, she played an especially important role in the Intercollegiate Socialist Society, frequently speaking at campuses under its auspices. After 1921, much of her energies were absorbed by her opposition to the Equal Rights amendments, which she viewed as a threat to her life's work of advocating protective legislation.

KELLY, HARRY (1871–1953). As editor and contributor to several anarchist journals and through his efforts to realize the philosophy of anarchism in educational and communal experiments, Henry May Kelly (who was known as "Harry") was a leading American anarchist from the 1890s until his death. Born in Saint Charles, Missouri, Kelly was self-educated and became a printer by trade. Introduced to anarchism by the lecturer Charles W. Mowbray in 1894, Kelly quickly became enmeshed in the anarchist movement as an organizer and writer for anarchist publications. With Mowbray and others he edited the Boston communist anarchist monthly the Rebel (1895–1896). In 1898 he traveled to England, where he lived for several years and worked closely with Kropotkin, Malatesta, Louise Michel, and Rudolf Rocker. His ties to the international anarchist movement remaining strong, Kelly returned to the United States and was again prominent in anarchist ranks and became a frequent contributor to Mother Earth after 1906.

Kelly distinguished himself through his efforts to bridge anarchist politics and cultural and educational radicalism. With others he founded the Francisco Ferrer Association in New York in 1910, which created a cultural center and spawned the Ferrer Modern School the following year. In 1915 the association established the Ferrer Colony in Stelton, New Jersey, to further the cause of progressive education and to build a new society through the unified efforts of intellectuals and the working class. Despite rivalries among leaders and educators and factionalism between anarchists and communists, the Stelton Modern School survived until 1953. In the 1920s Kelly also helped found two other colonies in New York, the Mohegan Colony near Peekskill and Mount Airy in Harmon.

Kelly's commitment to radical beliefs took him outside anarchist circles, and in 1920 with Elizabeth Gurley Flynn and Roger Baldwin, Kelly founded the League for Mutual Aid, which gave financial assistance to victims of the Red Scare and later to those associated with labor and libertarian concerns. Harry Kelly retired to New Rochelle, New York, and died in 1953.

KERACHER, JOHN (1880–1958). Pioneer American Communist, founder/leader of the Proletarian Party, and Marxist pamphleteer, John Keracher was born and raised in Scotland. He came to the United States in 1909 and settled in Detroit, where he operated a shoe store for many years. In April 1910 he joined the Socialist Party.

Discouraged by what he regarded as the party's low theoretical level, Keracher initiated an ambitious statewide party education program, based on the study of the Marxist classics. Out of this program grew Detroit's Proletarian University, a notable experiment in independent labor education, in which Keracher was among the most popular instructors.

With Keracher at its head, the Michigan Socialist Party grew to be among the largest and the most radical of the party's state organizations, and was often at odds with the more conservative national leadership, who in fact expelled the entire Michigan membership in May 1919. The ostensible reason for the expulsion was the Michigan section's vehement antireligious stance, in violation of party statutes. Keracher and his comrades maintained, however, that the expulsion was motivated by their militant defense of Bolshevism.

A few weeks later, together with others who had been expelled from the party and a few independents, Keracher helped found the Communist Party in Chicago in September 1919. Unlike most of his new-found comrades, however, Keracher did not believe that communist revolution was imminent in the United States, and he strongly opposed the new party's antielectoral, "underground," and dual-unionist orientation. Because of these and other disagreements, he and the entire "Michigan group," as its opponents called it, though it included supporters outside that state, were expelled from the Party in January 1920. In June of that year Keracher and the others founded the Proletarian Party, of which he remained the principal leader for the rest of his life.

As a major Proletarian Party publicist, Keracher wrote countless party leaflets as well as articles and editorials for the Proletarian News and internal polemics for party convention bulletins. His pamphlets, however—How the Gods Were Made (1929), Producers and Parasites (1935), The Head-Fixing Industry, a critique of capitalist media (1935; revised 1955, with a section on television), Crime: Its Causes and Consequences (1937), and Frederick Engels (1946)—are surprisingly free of sectarian rhetoric. Enlivened by flashes of soapbox humor—Keracher was a gifted street-speaker and indefatigable cross-country lecturer—these popularizations of Marxism, several of them still in print, were stocked by other socialist groups as well as by locals of the Industrial Workers of the World and free-thought societies.

Keracher's work at the Proletarian University in Detroit had brought him into close contact with Charles H. Kerr's socialist publishing house in Chicago, and it was to Keracher that an aging Charles Kerr, eager to retire after directing the operation for forty-two years, sold the bulk of his controlling shares in the cooperative firm in 1928. Remarkably, during the next forty-two years, when the Kerr Company was run by Keracher and his fellow Proletarians, it was never made into a narrowly "party press." According to Samuel J. Meyers, himself a member of the Proletarian Party in the late 1920s, "the most important contribution of John Keracher to the labor movement" was to keep the old Kerr Company going during those long, hard times.

Keracher left Detroit for Chicago in the 1920s, remaining there through the early 1950s, after which he retired to Los Angeles. Shortly before his death he completed a history of the Proletarian party, as yet unpublished.

KERR, CHARLES H., COMPANY. See Charles H. Kerr Company.

KESTER, HOWARD (1904–1977). Presbyterian and Congregational minister, early organizer of the Southern Tenant Farmers Union (STFU), and secretary of the Committee on Economic and Racial Justice, Howard Kester was also secretary of the Fellowship of Southern Churchmen and a participant in several important investigations by the National Association for the Advancement of Colored People (NAACP). Born into a segregated community to a father who, although opposed to slavery, was also a member of the Ku Klux Klan, Howard Kester, commonly known as "Buck," sought throughout his life to promote interracial unity and to place the problems of the South within a Christian context.

Kester's own conscience was awakened during a 1923 trip to Europe with the American Pilgrimage of Friendship, a program of the Young Men's Christian Association (YMCA). Kester immediately likened the postwar conditions of the Jewish ghettos of Poland to the plight of African Americans in the United States. Returning to Lynchburg College, which he attended on a Presbyterian ministerial scholarship, Kester became active in the YMCA's European Student Relief Project and formed one of the South's first interracial intercollegiate organizations. Through his friendship with George Washington Carver, Kester became the first white "fraternal" delegate to a black YMCA and advocated the desegregation of the YMCA and the Young Women's Christian Association as a whole.

After a brief stint in 1925, Kester left Princeton Theological Seminary because of the school's conservatism and enrolled at Vanderbilt's School of Religion. There, along with Ward Rodgers, Claude Williams, and Don West, he came under the tutelage of Professor Alva Taylor. Taylor's teachings, which had a formative influence on Kester's own philosophy, stressed that with modern science and Christianity, mankind could "make the world over into the kingdom of God."

Dismissed from his position within the YMCA, Kester left Vanderbilt (he did return and completed his degree in 1929) for New York, becoming youth secretary of the pacifist organization the Fellowship of Reconciliation (FOR). Traveling by rail to colleges throughout the South, Kester used the opportunity to defy Jim Crow laws. He also continued to organize interracial conferences and meetings now in the name of the FOR.

In 1931 Kester, as an anonymous agent of the NAACP, investigated the trials of the "Scottsboro Boys" and the lynching of George Smith in Tennessee. That year Kester also met and came under the influence of Socialist Norman Thomas, who he felt understood the needs of the South. Along with five others, Kester founded the Nashville local of the Socialist Party and unsuccessfully ran for Congress under the party's banner in 1932.

His involvement with the party increased his radicalism and brought him to the Communist-dominated Congress against War in October 1933. It also led to his dismissal from the FOR, which did not conceive of itself as the revolutionary body that Kester envisioned. Declaring that revolution was imminent and militancy was required, Kester became part of the Revolutionary Policy Committee representing the Socialist Party's left-wing.

Around this time, the NAACP widely distributed Kester's report on the brutal lynching of Claude Neal in Marianna, Florida. Kester also testified at congressional hearings on the Costigan-Wagner anti-lynching bill, part of an ongoing campaign by Kester against lynching.

At the urging of H.L. Mitchell, Kester became involved in the STFU soon after its founding in July 1934. Despite his apparent revolutionary zeal, Kester brought moderation to the STFU in his advocacy of nonviolence. Mitchell described him as an "outside contact man and a spokesman for the STFU." In 1936 Kester wrote the standard work Revolt among the Sharecroppers, which accurately detailed the plight of the sharecroppers. He also served as a STFU representative in its courtship of big-time labor. In October 1935, at the annual convention of the American Federation of Labor (AFL), Kester met with federation president William Green. Although giving a symbolic endorsement of the STFU, the AFL withheld financial backing.

In February 1936, Kester, with the assistance of Gardner Jackson, spoke to a group of senators and congressmen. Although Senator Robert La Follette was later to create a subcommittee to investigate violations of free speech and assembly, the committee did not concern itself with agriculture.

Kester also became embroiled in the disputes within the STFU after its merger with the United Cannery, Agricultural, Packing and Allied Workers of America (UCAPAWA), an affiliate of the Congress of Industrial Organizations, in September 1937. Having witnessed the Trotskyists' infiltration and debilitation of Norman Thomas's Socialist Party, Kester, as well as Mitchell, sought to preserve STFU autonomy. This potentially explosive situation led to the expulsion of Claude Williams and E. B. McKinney from the STFU and to a break between the STFU and UCAPAWA in March 1939. Spurned by established labor, without great financial or numerical support, the STFU lost much of its vigor.

Kester for his part devoted himself to his position as secretary of the Fellowship of Southern Churchmen, which he found more grounded in Christianity. The organization coordinated southern relief, attempted to create a volunteer interracial army unit, and sought to dispel commonly held myths concerning lynching.

In 1942 Kester began his career as an educator, serving as principal at Penn School in Beaufort, South Carolina, the first Christian school founded during Reconstruction for blacks in the South. In 1948 he moved to the John C. Campbell Folk School and later he became a professor and dean at Montreat Anderson College in Black Mountain, North Carolina. His time as an educator was interrupted by a return, from 1952 to 1963, to the Fellowship of Southern Churchmen. On 12 June, 1977, Howard Kester, the "'Gene Debs of Dixie,'" died.

KHRUSHCHEV REVELATIONS. From the mid-1930s to the mid-1950s American radicalism was dominated, in declining measure, by the Communist Party. At top strength, before the Nazi-Soviet Pact in mid-1939, the Party and its youth division numbered nearly 100,000. It had, as well, several hundred thousand sympathizers, and millions belonged to organizations with Communists among the leaders. All other radical groups combined then numbered a few thousand.

When the Cold War and the accompanying anti-communist hysteria hit high gear in 1948, Communist membership was still sixty-thousand. But by early 1956, when Khrushchev delivered his secret report on Stalin's crimes to the Soviet's Twentieth Communist Party Congress, membership had fallen to twenty-thousand, a two-thirds drop. This, however, was still several times greater than that of any other socialist group. Khrushchev's revelations had their principal impact on this residual Party membership. It was a devastating one.

Two fundamental developments caused the decline in membership and influence: the anticommunist hysteria accompanying the Cold War, and the sectarian policies following replacement of Earl Browder with William Z. Foster as Party leader in 1945. The Party's postwar policies reinforced the isolation imposed upon it by the witch-hunts.

Persecution of Communists expanded rapidly with the arrest of Party leaders under the Smith Act in 1948, and membership began to drop steadily. Around 1953 Party activists began to reexamine the assumptions and policies that had mired it in isolation. The return, early in 1956, to active political life of the leaders jailed under the Smith Act in 1951 gave impetus to this reexamination process. And in April 1956 the first national committee meeting in five years discussed major new directions.

Khrushchev's secret report, delivered in February, was yet unknown to the Americans in April. A summary received from abroad was read to the national committee and the result was shock. These devoted Communists who had dedicated their lives for decades in pursuit of a better society, and had rejected as impossible the widespread reports of Stalin's dreadful brutalities, were now confronted with the truth from a source they could not question. At issue was not only Stalin's paranoia, but the nature of the system that had permitted it.

The immediate consequence was to intensify the internal struggle concerning the extent and direction of Party change. The revelations, by shifting the emphasis of debate to Stalin and the Soviet Union, tended to undercut the independent overall self-examination that, it was hoped, would help to restore the Party's viability. While most leaders remained in the effort to seek change, a membership exodus did set in and those who left were among the supporters of change. Thus, while the Party convention in February 1957 approved sweeping changes, their advocates proved too powerless to make them stick, as members continued to depart in the face of the revelations and the Soviet invasion of Hungary in November 1956. By 1958, the Party was back in the grip of the sectarians. All others had left; the changes were reversed.

The New Left of the 1960s rose largely out of the void created by the essential disintegration of the Party. Many thousands of ex-Communists continued to function actively, however, in the peace, civil rights, labor, political, and other popular movements. Some joined democratic socialist organizations built in the 1970s, following the disintegration of the New Left.

KING, CAROL WEISS (1895-1952). Born into an affluent Jewish family headed by a man who organized one of the first corporation law firms in New York, Carol Weiss King represented radicals throughout her career, keeping them out of jail and from being deported. One of her brothers founded Paul, Weiss, Rifkind, Wharton, which remains a leading, traditional New York firm. A tireless writer who conducted an extensive correspondence, gave innumerable speeches, and was frequently interviewed, King remained an elusive figure for political pigeonholers. Her frequent defense of Communists led critics to label her a fellow traveler or, as the Saturday Evening Post of 17 February, 1951 put it, "the Communist's dearest friend." King refused to respond to such Red-baiting. She would not put a corset on her ample figure or her broad mind. Among friends, she was known as an independent radical who saw her role as defending people of various political views, guided by her own convictions, and using her innumerable contacts across political lines to defend constitutional rights.

While attending Barnard College, she became interested in labor union problems through the influence of her history teacher, Juliet Stuart Poyntz. In 1916 she worked as a research fellow for the American Association for Labor Legislation. Feeling she could accomplish even more as an attorney, she entered New York University Law School and became one of the few female graduates in the class of 1920. Her first legal work was defending foreign-born workers who had been victims of the Palmer Raids.

In 1925 King set up a law firm in partnership with Communist Joseph Brodsky and anarchist Isaac Shorr, and from 1924 through 1931 she edited the American Civil Liberties Union's Law and Freedom Bulletin. After author Gordon King, whom she had wed in 1917, died of pneumonia in 1930, she continued her numerous activities, propelled to an even quicker pace by the Depression and New Deal. One of her achievements was to persuade old family friends like Wall Street attorney Walter H. Pollak to work gratis on constitutional law cases. In 1932 she made a trip to Europe, visiting the Soviet Union, which inspired her, and Germany, which horrified her. On her return to the United States, she started the International Juridical Association Bulletin and was its moving force until 1942, when it merged with the Lawyers Guild Review, published by the National Lawyers Guild, another organization she helped to found.

Her association with Brodsky brought her into the International Labor Defense and work on the Scottsboro case. King also worked on hundreds of less well known cases. Her most famous client of the decade was Harry Bridges, who was threatened with deportation in 1938 for membership in the Communist Party. He won in his first hearing, based greatly on King's innovative use of expert testimony by university professors on Marxist theory, but he was rearrested and lost his second hearing. King orchestrated a reversal of the deportation order in the U.S. Supreme Court during World War II (Bridges v. Wixon, 326 U.S. 135 [1945]).

In 1942 King became general counsel for the American Committee for Protection of Foreign Born, a post she held until her death. That same year, her persuasive skills became evident to all when she was representing William Schneiderman, a Communist Party leader whose citizenship the government sought to revoke. As part of the defense effort, King was able to convince Wendell Willkie, 1940 Republican presidential candidate, to represent Schneiderman in the Supreme Court. The case was won in 1943 (Schneiderman v. United States, 320 U.S. 118 [1943]). Her greatest legal triumph came in 1950 when the Supreme Court accepted her theoretical positions and held that the Immigration and Naturalization Service had to obey the same rules as all other administrative agencies, halting all deportations until the service undertook reforms (Wong Yang Sung v. McGrath, 339 U.S. 33 [1950]). Congress soon passed an exception for the service, and King returned to the courtrooms to slow down the deportations of thousands of political radicals born abroad. She seldom won, but few clients were actually deported.

King formed a new law partnership in 1948 with Blanche Freedman, a New York lawyer long active in the Women's Trade Union League. The following year King ran unsuccessfully for a municipal judgeship on the ticket of the American Labor Party. The New York Bar Association rated her as qualified but could not resist questioning her "judicial temperament." In 1951 she made her first argument before the Supreme Court, and in January 1952 she died of cancer in New York City.

KNIGHTS OF LABOR. The Noble and Holy Order of the Knights of Labor, the largest U.S. labor organization of the nineteenth century, represented a massive outpouring of working-class resentment at the political corruption and social inequities that characterized industrial capitalism in the Gilded Age. It also put forward a cooperative and mutualistic vision that stood in stark contrast to the acquisitive individualism that was the era's dominant ideology. As a result, many radicals were attracted to the Order, some of whom tried to turn it in a more explicitly anticapitalist direction. At the same time, though, the patriotic, republican, and religious perspectives of the Knights brought them into conflict with other radicals, especially German American anarchists and socialists.

Uriah Stephens and a small group of his fellow Philadelphia garment cutters organized the Knights of Labor as a secret society in 1869. In its early years, it was as much a fraternal order as a labor union. But it was one of the few working-class organizations to survive the depression of the 1870s and, at its first national convention in 1878, it began the task of building a national labor reform movement. Under the leadership of Terence V. Powderly, a former machinist and the mayor of Scranton, Pennsylvania, who became Grand Master Workman in 1879, the Knights sought to enroll members of what they called the "producing classes" in an organization that cut across lines of occupation, gender, religion, nationality, and—to an important, but limited, extent—race.

The organization grew in the early 1880s, as existing craft unions and labor reform associations affiliated with it, and as semi- and unskilled workers began to organize for the first time under its banner. A stunning victory over Jay Gould in an 1885 railroad strike brought much publicity and thousands of new members to the Order, and, by the following year, it had reached a peak membership of 750,000. (As many as three million men and women may have passed through the Order over the course of its history.) The Knights of Labor was the first national labor organization to open its doors fully to women, who eventually constituted about ten percent of the total membership. The Order also attracted many southern African American members, numbering approximately sixty-thousand by the summer of 1886. The organization, however, was also marked by racism: in western states the Knights spearheaded the movement against the Chinese.

Although they never established their own political party, Knights of Labor activists were central figures in the explosion of independent working-class political activity that occurred throughout the country in 1885–1888. But beginning in the mid- to late 1880s, a strong counterattack by employers, government, and the press drastically weakened the organization. The Knights also suffered from serious internal divisions and from the defection of many craft unionists to the new American Federation of Labor, founded in 1886. Though continuing to operate in some industries and areas of the country through the 1890s, the Knights were virtually dead by the turn of the century.

At its height in the mid-1880s, the Order upheld a distinctive and powerful political vision, one called "labor republicanism" by recent historians. Building on a working-class tradition of thought that went back to the 1820s, Knights' leaders criticized industrial capitalism as a system that undermined the nation's traditional commitment to an independent citizenry. They believed, in the words of labor activist George E. McNeill, that there was "an inevitable and irresistible conflict between the wage-system of labor and the republican system of government." They saw their mission as a moral one, bringing a new morality to American society as a whole through structural reforms like producer cooperatives, while providing "moral uplift" to workers themselves through education and temperance. The Knights were marked in many places by a religious orientation, one that usually took a Protestant form despite the large numbers of Irish Catholic workers in the Order.

But as powerful and persuasive as it was to thousands of working people, the republican and religious outlook of the Knights also brought them into conflict with many European-born socialists and anarchists. In Chicago in the mid-1880s, for example, the Knights built strong support among native-born and Irish American workers, but their leaders vehemently denounced the "atheistic socialism" of German and Czech radicals organized in the International Working People's Association (IWPA) and in the city's Central Labor Union. Religion was a real issue of contention here, for atheism, or at least irreligion, did characterize the views of many of Chicago's European-born radicals. These radicals, in turn, criticized what they regarded as the timidity and ideological confusion of the Knights.

Native-born and Irish American radicals, on the other hand, often embraced the organization and tended to see its ultimate stated objective, "the abolition of the wages system," as quite compatible with their own. IWPA leader Albert Parsons, for example, who traced his ancestry back to the Massachusetts Bay Colony, had been the very first member of the Knights of Labor in Chicago and argued that "the platform of the Knights of Labor contains nothing else but socialistic demands, the realization of the whole of them would amount to Socialism."

English-speaking radicals played a key role in organizing Knights assemblies in many other cities. In Detroit, for example, Joseph Labadie, Judson Grenell, and a number of other socialists (both within and outside the Socialist Labor Party) wielded tremendous influence in the organization. In Denver, Joseph R. Buchanan, a member of the Knights' national executive board, was a socialist who saw the organization as an important force in the struggle against capitalism. Developing a proto-syndicalist emphasis on the importance of industrial action, Buchanan struggled to link the Knights with the emerging trade unions and to insure that the Order give full support to workers on strike. Along with Thomas B. Barry, a Detroit-based member of the national executive board who shared his views on unions and strikes, Buchanan also worked to lead the Order into the fight to save the lives of the Chicago anarchists convicted of the Haymarket bombing. Terence Powderly's strong condemnation of the Haymarket defendants, his growing opposition to unions and strikes, and his crackdown on internal dissent, however, led to the ouster of Buchanan and Barry from the Order and to the departure of many like-minded individuals in 1887 and 1888.

Radically different in outlook from such individuals were the Lassalleian socialists, who played an important role in the New York City-based Home Club. Working within the powerful District Assembly No. 49 and in alliance with Powderly, the Home Club exerted tremendous influence in the Knights of Labor in 1886–1888, doing much to shape the organization's hostility to trade unionism in these years. In 1894, District Assembly No. 49 also provided the base for Daniel De Leon's ultimately unsuccessful effort to capture the (by now rapidly declining) Knights for the Socialist Labor Party.

Although it would be incorrect to regard the Knights of Labor as an organization of the American Left, its significance for the Left was immense. The Order was the first "labor movement of national proportions in the United States," noted the early-twentieth-century Socialist Party leader James Maurer, just one of many socialists whose first labor organizing experiences were in the Knights. "'The injury of one is the concern of all,' was its constant declaration of faith. It naturally attracted radicals of all sorts."

KONIKOW, ANTOINETTE BUCHOLZ (1869–1946). Socialist orator and educator (in several languages), Antoinette Konikow was a physician who fought for the right of women to have access to birth control. Born in Russia, she came to Boston to 1893 and immediately threw herself into unemployed organizing, learning Yiddish in order to work among immigrants.

Although a mother of two children, Konikow graduated with honors from Tufts University in 1902. She organized sex hygiene lectures for women and was arrested for exhibiting contraceptives.

In 1923 Konikow published a handbook for women, Voluntary Motherhood. Particularly concerned about educating physicians about their responsibility to women, she published her Physicians' Manual of Birth Control in 1931. Konikow also polemicized against population-control arguments, asserting that the right of women to control their bodies must be the basis for building a movement.

A delegate to the Socialist Labor Party's 1896 convention, she was expelled in 1897. Konikow helped found the Socialist Party, serving on its Woman's National Committee. Identifying with the Bolshevik Revolution, she participated in the 1919 underground convention that formed the Communist Party of the United States.

In 1928 Konikow opposed Trotsky's expulsion from the Communist International and once again found herself expelled. From that point until her death she was associated with Trotskyism.

KUNSTLER, WILLIAM (1919–1995). From the late 1960s onward William Moses Kunstler was the personification of the radical lawyer. In his defining trial, that of the Chicago Eight, he received a contempt of court sentence of four years and thirteen days. This was in tune with the times and a radical break with what had been accepted as the progressive lawyer's role: working within the system respectfully to change it. Kunstler was proud of the contempt sentence. He was not just representing his clients; he was fighting and being sentenced with them.

Kunstler was born in New York in 1919, graduated from Yale with a degree in French (and as a Phi Beta Kappa) in 1941, and served in the Pacific in World War II, rising to the rank of major. He graduated from Columbia Law School in 1949 and opened a practice with his brother in New York. (Thanks to a friend from law school, Roy Cohn, he handled the writing of the will of Senator Joseph McCarthy, by whom Cohn had just been hired.) Kunstler's first political work came in the context of the Cold War, when he represented a State Department employee who had traveled to China and whose passport had therefore been confiscated. During the civil rights battles of the late fifties and early sixties, Kunstler was on the list of lawyers who could be counted on when needed. It had become clear to him that representing people fighting for justice was far more satisfying, and far more publicly rewarding, than a small civil practice in New York.

In Dombrowski v. Pfister (1965), argued by Kunstler together with Arthur Kinoy, the Court affirmed the right to move civil rights cases in the South from the state courts to the federal court system, thereby contributing to a string of legal victories in the civil rights struggles. As a result of Hobson v. Hansen (1967), the Washington, D.C. school system was desegregated.

Kunstler was in the thick of the anti-war movement as well. The Chicago Eight trial (for the media it became the Chicago Seven after Bobby Seale's trial was severed from the others; for the participants it remained the Chicago Eight) redefined the role of the movement lawyer. Kunstler's role in that trial was not just to represent his clients but to work with them, live with them, and, as an equal, fight an illegitimate legal system that, as part of the American structure, was responsible for war, racism, poverty, and oppression, both nationally and internationally. By receiving a jail sentence along with his clients, Kunstler showed that he was willing to accompany them all the way to prison. This was something new to the profession. At the same time that he was standing with his clients at sentencing, his clients were standing with him in determining trial strategy. No longer was the client just to sit quietly at the table as the lawyer decided what defense to use, which witnesses to call, and what questions to ask. All these decisions were made by the group working together. This had been done before, but never on the scale of the Chicago Eight trial, which, in effect, put the American legal and political system on trial.

Kunstler spent most of the 1960s and 1970s flying from one trial to another. He was involved in most of the major actions of the day: Chicago Eight, Days of Rage, Wounded Knee, Attica, Mississippi Challenge, Black Panther cases, and Kent State. In all of these cases and scores of minor cases the theme was that the system is not legitimate and that the people are right to resist. These were not the defendants to agree to a traditional defense strategy. For a lawyer to accept that the defendants had a right to determine the conduct of the trial was difficult, as it might reduce the role of the defense attorney as professional adviser. Equally difficult was discarding the rule that the number one goal is to see that the client goes free. Kunstler was a leader in the legal profession in exploring the implications of these issues and testing them in actual cases. The photograph most representative of Kunstler during these times shows him standing with the inmates at Attica Prison during the rebellion as they decide what to do next.

Kunstler wrote candidly in My Life as a Radical Lawyer about how important media attention was to him: "In many ways, I am still the little boy who always must act outrageously so he can remain outside the mainstream." Kunstler also acknowledged that his behavior had caused problems in his personal life—in his first marriage, his law partnership with his brother, and his relationship with his children. For Kunstler the rationale was constant: "Action is all."

Throughout the 1980s and 1990s, Kunstler continued to fight for and with his clients. He successfully represented Lemuel Smith, the last person on New York's Death Row in the 1980s, who had been accused of killing a prison guard. (The death penalty was reinstated in the 1990s.) In his defense of Larry Davis, accused of killing six police officers in the mid-1980s, Kunstler argued self-defense and put the police department on trial. Davis was acquitted of the murder charges. Kunstler successfully defended El Sayyid Nosair on murder charges in the 1990 shooting of Rabbi Meir Kahane despite a roomful of eyewitnesses who said they had witnessed the killing. At the time of Kunstler's death an appeal was pending regarding the government's successful effort to have him removed as a defense counsel in the Sheik Omar Abdel Rahman sedition trial that followed the World Trade Center bombing.

Kunstler's last Supreme Court argument was the flag-burning case in 1990. His co-counsel was David Cole. When it came time to decide who would argue before the Court, the attorneys asked the clients to decide. The clients voted 5–4 for Kunstler, and the Justices subsequently decided 5–4 that burning the flag was indeed a constitutionally protected activity.

LABOR PARTY A vision or chimera of a "broad front" led by the Left, the hope for a "Labor Party" remained recurrently an issue and source of deep controversy from the early 1870s onward. During the First International phase of Marxist activity, the "Lassalleian" wing, especially notable in Chicago, seized on the labor-party concept as means of reaching the masses. The "Workingmen's Party of Illinois," scarcely successful in electoral terms, became a medium for Chicago German-Americans to launch a local socialist press and begin the formation of socialist-led unions. In New York, political survivors of the anti-Marx faction threw themselves into the Industrial Workingman's Party mayoral campaign of 1874, and other local groups with socialist influence organized in Newark, Cincinnati, and Philadelphia. After the formal dissolution of the International, a brief flurry of electoral success in socialism's own name, and a general collapse of this effort, socialists supported the Greenback Labor Party of 1880, resulting in no success and bringing only political fragmentation upon themselves.

Nevertheless, socialists eagerly joined with local labor-party efforts in 1886–1888, in many places posting real (if temporary) electoral advances and a working relationship with nonsocialist labor activists. Of these, the United Labor Party campaign by Henry George in New York was the most spectacular and one of the most successful. By the end of the decade, the movement had disintegrated and labor political activity mostly moved back into the two-party system. Bitterly disillusioned with this experience, socialists for the most part (with temporary exceptions, as in Illinois of the early 1890s) opted out of nonsocialist third-party experiments. Populism attracted, however, many who would become socialists by way of reform movements.

The formation of the Socialist Party in 1901 sealed this rejection of nonsocialist parties for a considerable period. Individual local or regional figures defected to labor party movements. But only once—in 1910–1912, when the American Federation of Labor seemed to approach an outright endorsement of a labor party—did prominent socialists (including A. M. Simons and Robert Hunter) suggest the option of sinking socialist support into a broader movement. Party loyalists, Eugene Debs included, opposed this policy as political betrayal. The subsequent right-ward shift of the American Federation of Labor ended the controversy. Only with the virtual collapse of the Socialist Party following the 1919 split did many socialists (acting as individuals) support a Farmer-Labor ticket, with erstwhile Cleveland socialist editor Max Hayes as vice-presidential candidate.

During the 1920s, Communists reluctant to abandon their expectations of insurrection were brought into line by Lenin and by Comintern representatives such as John Pepper (J. Pogany), whose For a Labor Party (1922 and 1923) articulated a new official position. Yet this support for a prospective labor party remained abstract, as coalitions of labor reformers and radical intellectuals proved unable to create a new political movement. Only during 1934–1936 did the labor party prospect once again look hopeful, as unionists disillusioned with Roosevelt passed many local resolutions calling for an independent labor ticket. In this interim, Communists and many independent radicals expressed great hopes for the labor party prospects ahead.

Roosevelt's deft engagement of reform issues in the 1936 campaign, and the enthusiasm of ethnic constituencies for him, doomed the labor party effort. Communist complicity—through support for the American Labor Party, an indirect support for Roosevelt, and a mere half-step from the two-party system—seemed to end all serious prospects. Some observers, including Trotskyists, hoped that John L. Lewis, turning against Franklin Roosevelt's 1940 reelection bid, might lead a new labor party. Lewis supported Wendell Willkie instead. Thereafter, as Communists lobbied within the Democratic Party or attempted to create a transclass alternative (Henry Wallace's Progressive Party), discussion of a labor party became fanciful and remained, in sloganeering terms, largely to the Trotskyists.

By the 1970s–1980s, the discussion of a labor party had become an occasional warning by individual labor leaders to a Democratic party jettisoning its New Deal commitments, with only a few seriously arguing the point. Tony Mazzocchi, sometime high official and perennial influence within the Oil, Chemical, and Atomic Workers, led the formation of Labor Party Advocates in 1991, endorsed by several large unions. In 1996 the Labor Party held its first national convention in what had become the most serious effort since the 1940s to build such a movement.

LABOR RADIO. Radio broadcasting became a popular mass medium during the 1920s. Contemporary commentators proclaimed that radio could enhance democracy, obliterate class differences, and spread education and culture. Trade unionists and radicals, however, recognized that an emerging monopoly of corporate radio stations and networks threatened working-class interests. Chicago labor officials attacked network radio programming for manipulating the myths of consensus and individualism while promoting consumerism, the sacred marketplace, and business infallibility. Socialist party head Norman Thomas insisted that commercial radio tended “to make robots and Babbitts of the American people.”

Denouncing corporate radio's institutional structure and contesting it adverse cultural and ideological influence on the masses, radical and labor activists sought to use radio in the interest of working-class communities. Labor councils in San Francisco and Saint Louis, the American Fund for Public Service, and other groups considered creating their own radio stations during the 1920s in order to air the alternative perspectives of workers, progressives, and radicals.

The Socialist Party established a radio station in New York City in 1927. Named after Eugene V. Debs, WEVD dedicated itself to becoming “a fighting, militant champion of the rights of the oppressed.” Initially supported by financial contributions from party organs as well as the garment trades unions, WEVD became linked with the Jewish Daily Forward and the centrist wing of the socialist movement. Well into the 1930s, area labor unions used the station's facilities to educate and organize workers. The International Ladies Garment Workers Union, for example, produced programs that combined live entertainment with speeches by prominent labor and political leaders. WEVD also broadcasted a variety of progressive and radical political analyses and shortened versions of workers' theater productions. By the 1940s and 1950s, WEVD's labor orientation had yielded to “ethnic” programming, especially Yiddish entertainment and commentary on American Jewish life and the state of Israel. Although WEVD's political views became increasingly conservative and centered on Israeli concerns by the 1960s, the station never entirely abandoned its social democratic tradition. The Forward Association sold WEVD-FM for $30 million in 1988, while WEVD-AM remained on the air with a smaller audience.

Chicago station WCFL was the nation's first and longest-surviving labor radio station. Owned and operated by the Chicago Federation of Labor (CFL), WCFL began in 1926 as a listener-supported station, emphasizing popular entertainment and labor and public affairs programming. CFL secretary Edward N. Nockels became the “voice of labor”'s driving force during its first and most militant decade (1926–1937). He hoped to use radio to help organize workers, increase public support for the union movement, and enhance working-class consciousness and culture. Dependent on voluntary contributions and the resources of its parent body, WCFL suffered financial crises—exacerbated by the Great Depression—and continual harassment by federal authorities and corporate competitors. Nevertheless, WCFL served a broadly defined labor and progressive community. “Service” meant providing “not only entertainment but information; not only music but science, history, economics, and all the other things that make for human welfare.” A variety of labor, civic, consumer, and political activists and organizations utilized WCFL's microphones well into the 1940s.

Depression-era problems, commercial radio competition, grandiose plans for a Labor radio network, and pressure from the conservative American Federation of Labor, eventually changed WCFL, by the late 1930s and early 1940s, into a station dependent on advertising and mass entertainment programming for its survival. By the 1950s and 1960s WCFL had redefined its "service" to labor as funding its own operations and general CFL activities by maximizing profits. WCFL developed a rock 'n' roll format to attract a rapacious consumer audience and, consequently, big-spending advertisers. Successful for a short time, rock radio ultimately failed and led to the station's sale in 1978. The mere presence of labor radio, especially during the early decades of broadcasting, however, symbolized an alternative to the business-owned mass media and an oppositional force in American politics and culture.

LA FOLLETTE, ROBERT MARION (1855-1925). One of America's most consistent progressive leaders, Robert M. La Follette, Sr., fought throughout his career to resist corporate domination of American political and economic affairs. The clearest manifestation of his beliefs and ideals came in his independent presidential campaign of 1924.

Born and raised in rural Wisconsin, La Follette moved with his mother and siblings to Madison in 1873 to attend the university. Although a mediocre student much more interested in literary societies and debate clubs, La Follette was deeply influenced by university president John Bascom, who shaped the institution's strong commitment to public service. While a student, La Follette met and later married Belle Case, a significant intellectual influence throughout his career who usually pushed him in more progressive directions and was an important feminist leader in her own right.

After beginning a career in law, La Follette became active in the Republican Party. He was elected in 1886 to the first of three terms in the House of Representatives. Defeated in 1890, La Follette returned to private practice but remained active in party affairs. Throughout the decade, he watched with growing concern as Wisconsin railroad and timber interests began to dominate the Republican Party. Eventually he assumed leadership over a dissident group of Republicans known as the Insurgents, who attempted to wrest party leadership from the more conservative Stalwarts. The struggle was a contentious and bitter one. La Follette campaigned several times for the gubernatorial nomination and finally succeeded in 1900. In this campaign, as in all his others, La Follette campaigned relentlessly. He traveled throughout the state making hundreds of three- to four-hour speeches constantly railing against corporate domination. Drawing support heavily from agricultural and ethnically dominated regions, La Follette was elected governor in 1900.

As governor, La Follette began an ambitious program to limit corporate domination of state affairs and put more power into the hands of the people. Underpinning this drive was his leadership in the development of the "Wisconsin Idea." La Follette relied heavily on a close relationship between state government and the University of Wisconsin to create a set of legislative initiatives that became a model for progressive reform and was widely copied by other states. Over the first fifteen years of the twentieth century, Wisconsin led the way in enacting such progressive legislation as railroad regulation, child labor, corrupt practices, workers' compensation, public utilities regulation, state income tax, and the heart of La Follette's program, the direct primary.

These programs made La Follette a leading national progressive. Elected to the Senate in 1906, he attempted to provide the same type of leadership at the national level. Joining such other progressives as Jonathan Dolliver, Albert Cummins, and Louis Brandeis, La Follette pushed reform legislation. He also traveled throughout the country to attack corporate hegemony and to raise money for progressive causes. La Follette's determination and dedication to solving the problems of ordinary citizens earned him the nickname "Fighting Bob." Most of his campaigns were so intense that at the conclusion he collapsed into nervous exhaustion, sometimes having to spend months recuperating.

By 1912, La Follette, concerned with the growing hegemony of monopoly capitalism, decided to run for president. A disastrous meeting with newspaper editors and Theodore Roosevelt's entry forced him to withdraw. Roosevelt's duplicity encouraged La Follette to withhold support from the Bull Moose Party as well. As a result, La Follette concentrated on his own agenda and began La Follette's Weekly (later the Progressive) as a forum against corporate domination.

During the years before World War I, La Follette broadened his constituency. His legislative efforts focused more directly on working class and consumer interest issues. Although very much a loner in the Senate, La Follette was an effective leader in legislation that protected consumers' interests and expanded their rights. He was also a leading advocate of reforms that led to the Child Labor Act, the Adamson Act, and the La Follette Seaman's Act, all aimed at reforming conditions for American workers.

La Follette's greatest personal challenge came with the beginning of World War I. He fought against American involvement every step of the way. He was opposed to the use of force under any circumstance and was deeply concerned that American involvement would roll back progressive gains and end the hope for future initiatives. Equally destructive, La Follette believed, would be the growing domination of bankers, munitions producers, lobbyists, and lawyers. La Follette withstood relentless attacks inside and outside of the Senate and became the Senate's most outspoken supporter of free speech and civil liberties as well as the major critic of corporate profits gained at the expense of the working class.

After the war, La Follette continued to watch in disgust as the Wilson administration abrogated civil liberties and launched an offensive against radicals and organized labor. Equally troubling to him was the increasing conservatism of many of his erstwhile progressive colleagues. La Follette became even more isolated and more of a singular critic of U.S. economic and foreign policies. During these years, his view of progressivism changed. He became yet more outspoken in his criticism of corporate domination and called for stronger governmental regulation and even ownership of some industries. He worked assiduously to pass the Plumb Plan and was a catalyst in opening the Teapot Dome investigation.

By 1920 it was clear that progressive forces in America could not look to either major party for leadership. Both had become dominated by conservative, corporate interests. The entire spectrum of the Left, from the Socialist Party to the stodgy and conservative American Federation of Labor (AFL), realized the need for some sort of third party or independent candidacy. Gradually, several different groups coalesced to develop a platform upon which La Follette could base his campaign. At the heart of this organization was the Conference for Progressive Political Action (CPPA).

The CPPA provided an umbrella for a variety of organizations including the railroad unions, the United Mine Workers, the Socialist Party, and many intellectual progressives. Inspired by the success of the British Labour Party, these leftists looked for common ground to establish a movement that would lead the way to a fundamental redistribution of economic power and end corporate domination of political and economic affairs. La Follette himself traveled to Europe to meet with labor leaders and leftist political leaders and returned invigorated by the possibilities.

With the specter of the Republican Calvin Coolidge and the Democrat John W. Davis looming large, the CPPA met in convention on 4 July 1924 to pick a presidential candidate. They chose La Follette, who quickly accepted. Burton K. Wheeler, now an independent senator from Montana, was chosen to run for vice president. The platform was a relatively simple one and was designed to include as many leftist groups as possible. It called for the abolition of the injunction, a child-labor amendment to the Constitution, public ownership of railroads and of water power, the right of Congress to overrule Supreme Court decisions, a popular referendum before Congress could declare war, and direct nomination and election of the president.

Although most participants including La Follette believed the campaign to be the first step toward a major realignment of political parties, the presidential candidate argued vehemently against launching a third political party at this time. La Follette believed his best hope was to split the vote, thereby forcing a vote in the House of Representatives where progressives could elect him president. If progressive Democrats or Republicans had to run in local elections as a third party, they would lose. In the long run, however, this strategy proved fatal. Without establishing party machinery, the coalition failed to survive the death of La Follette in June 1925.

The promise of La Follette's candidacy looked bright as the campaign began. He was endorsed by almost every large union, the Socialists, virtually every central city and state labor federation, almost every farm-labor organization, and all of the non-partisan leagues. Most surprising, La Follette was endorsed by the AFL. Polls as late as early October showed La Follette outdrawing Davis heavily and not that far behind Coolidge.

But in the end, several factors contributed to the poorer-than-expected showing by La Follette. Most important, lack of financial support and La Follette's physical condition contributed to his defeat. Expected revenues from unions and the AFL never materialized. Gompers's support, after a promising start, waned rather quickly. In total, the campaign raised about $200,000 while the Republican campaign raised almost $15 million. From the beginning, the Coolidge forces focused their attacks on La Follette not Davis. He was painted as a radical and a Bolshevik. "Coolidge or Chaos" was the most prominent Republican slogan. These factors combined with La Follette's physical condition hurt the campaign. He was sixty-eight years old and ravaged by decades of hard-fought political wars. Finances and ill-health further limited his travel. He was unable to travel to the Far West, the location of his strongest support, or to the Deep South.

La Follette carried only Wisconsin but finished second in eleven other states. His five million votes was the strongest showing ever by a third-party candidate. Despite the limited success, La Follette continued to meet with progressive leaders to plan for future activities, but a heart attack shortly after his seventieth birthday in 1925 ended the hope for a strong third party.

La Follette's legacy is a strong and important one. He was a catalyst or a participant in most major state and federal reforms that took place in the first two decades of the twentieth century. No other mainstream politician worked harder to resist corporate domination and champion the rights of industrial workers, consumers, and farmers.

Another important part of his legacy was his family. Belle, who had been very active in the suffrage movement, continued to participate in progressive circles until her own death in 1931. Robert, Jr., finished "Old Bob"'s term in the Senate and was then reelected for two additional terms. His work as chair of the Senate Civil Liberties Committee from 1938 to 1940 was the highlight of his career. As chair, he doggedly pursued a complete hearing on the abrogation of workers' civil liberties by capital and called the nation's attention to a series of corporate atrocities. Philip chose to continue his father's legacy in state politics. He served as Wisconsin's governor for three terms, from 1931 to 1933 and from 1935 to 1939. Much more like his father, Philip was a crusader who passed state legislation that anticipated much of the New Deal and then tried to launch a third political party when he thought the New Deal had become too conservative. Both brothers continued to carry the important legacy of the father into the late 1940s, meaning that the La Follette influence remained strong in Wisconsin and the nation for over fifty years.
